"Now, gentlemen of the press and gentlemen, what do we want with British capital when we have Irish capital enough, and to spare, and is not forced in industrial enterprises? True, it is laid up in hoards in banks, which carry off Irish capital to London, to be paid into the security of Irish legislation, and this wealth remains in the hands of Irishmen, rivaling those of England, and often surpassing them. Then came the Union, and Irish capital no longer had Irish security — it had the security of the English Parliament — and it had been taught to know that that amounted to when its factories were destroyed and its exports blockaded? Where, then, was the use of Irish capital, as regards capital? Not British capital — for Ireland has plenty, and to spare. What then? Simply the solid security of an Irish Parliament. — Dublin Irishman.

turnout was very large and respectable, and the En mel Guard, Capt. Dan Williams, made a fine display, not only in numbers, but in their manly and dignified bearing as they marched in couples through the streets, after the banners of the different societies, to the Shaslog Rink, where the oration was delivered. The procession formed in front of the Catholic church, and marched around the square in the following manner:

The exercises at the Pavilion consisted of an Address by the President, T. Leonard; Oration by H. T. O'Connor, President, of San Francisco, and a Poem by Miss Mary Sullivan, of Oakland.

Singing by the pupils of the School of the Holy Cross was well executed.

The address by Mr. O'Connell Fresch was logical and well delivered.

IN BODEGA.

At an early hour on the evening of March 17th, the hall in Bodega Corners was filled with a large and appreciative audience, anxiously awaiting the commencement of the literary exercises, given by the Bodega Dramatic Society, in honor of Ireland's patron saint. The following programme was well presented, and rendered by the orchestra; Comedy, "A gentlemen from Ireland;" Song, "Kathleen Mavourneen;" poem: music by the orchestra; oration, The brother, by Master B. Quinlan, was a model of Irish patriotism and eloquence. We have heard competent judges say that it was the ablest prod uction ever produced in the town of Bodega. Mr. Quinlan's delivery did not detract from the merits of his composition; for every word was distinctly heard in all parts of the house, and the ovation he received as he closed was a most flattering one. We feel proud that such a small town as Bodega can justly boast of so much talent as much larger places.

IN LOS ANGELES.

LOS ANGELES, March 17.—St. Patrick's Day was duly celebrated by our Irish fellow-citizens with a parade and flags and banners to-day. The Ancient Order of Hibernians turned out in full war regalia, and made a creditable appearance.

IN THE EASTERN STATES.

NEW YORK, March 17.—St Patrick's Day in the morning" was dark and dreary, but after a heavy shower the sun shone on these time honored Shrines and flags and banners to-day. The Ancient Order of Hibernians turned out in full war regalia, and made a creditable appearance.

CHICAGO, March 17.—St. Patrick's Day was duly observed at the same time as the anniversary of the evacuation of the city by the British, one hundred years ago. In Washington and other places South and North there was the old time commemoration of Ireland's patron saint.

Conversion to the True Church.

The Galveston (Texas) Catholic of March 5 says: Our conversions to the true Church from the Millerite shape of the Protestant Protestants are manifested to Old Episcopacy. In Texas may justly claim a prominent place in that line, to clearly demonstrated by the return to the fold of many wandering sheep and prodigal sons. The celebrated missionary priest, the Rev. Father Manucy, after a laborious and fruitful mission in Rev. J. A. Forrest's district, Galveston county, after preaching eight days at Lamar, went to Bernardsville, and two days at Yellow-stone, where he was most successfully laid the foundation of distributing the Bread of Life to 120 communicants; to a number of whom had for years professed their religious desires. On the same occasion thirty-eight adults were baptized and received into the Church. Thirty-eight converts in a single mission, and in a sparsely settled country! This is certainly a sign of the times worthy of notice. We call to it the attention of those who are always ready to ring the death-knell of the Catholic Church. Further we consider that Father Westinger's success at Lavernia is by no means unimportant, but is only seems so though the Church, in Texas is slow here, we do certainly live a little longer. It is mentioned some months since that the congregation of St. Mary's in this city, numbered at that time two hundred converts from the various Protestant sects. Since then about a dozen more have been added to the fold, and others are preparing to imitate them.

Mrs. Belknap's Wretched Plea.

The New York Herald's Washington correspondent says: Mrs. Belknap said a day or two ago to a friend, who relates her conversation, that she did not consider her self a criminal or that she had done any thing partic ularly wrong; at least she did not feel that she was committing a great sin when she used her friends' positions, as "But," said she, "if I have sinned, others have doubly sinned; if I am guilty of crimes, others are guilty of double crimes."

She went on to say that she had done only what others had been doing for years, who were not near many people in her place would have done far worse than she, and need their influence to the fullest extent. The conviction is of Mrs. Belknap says that Mrs. Belknap and her friends make no secret in their private conversations of these things. According to their admission the practice is one of long standing.

Mrs. Belknap says that her case is of little importance compared with the situation of the others. The names of prominent men are threatened as having secured offices for their friends through the influence of their presents and their money. Mrs. Belknap says that astounding facts will be brought to light if the Committee are at ious for them, and that she is for them deserving the deep condemnation that has been heaped upon her by the public.

Behold that pale, emaciated figure, with downcast eyes, lackadaisical look, as she walks along the street nervous, distrustful look, as she walks along the street with a slow and measured step. SENTENCED TO DEATH.

"With the skies of the cross on my forehead, as I kneel on this cold dungeon floor,
As I kneel as poor Nell, reverse-d father, with no one to hear my last prayer,
With my hands bound behind me, my head bent, my hope or thought of release
From the death that at daybreak to morrow is stare me straight in the face.
I have come to you the Battle of my boyhood—the fields here as' one of my youth—
As' one of this crime of my manhood I'll speak with the same open truth.

You can read in the war our people's for ninety good years, as' their toil
What fruit was to have but of mountain fragrant toil good wheat-bearing soil;
'Twas their hands raised in the walls of the cabin, where our children' we born as' bred,
Where our wordin's as' cheerin's as' merry, where we raised and hovered over our dead;
We were honest as' fair in the landlord—he paid him his rint in the day—
As' it wasn't our fault if our hard sweat he squandered, cheated, as' stole away.
In the Parliament, as' the rest, of course, as' others in corpse, Government,
That no tongue could raise without bringin' a token in an honest man's face;
But the day came at last that they worked for, when the occasion, the manshion, the hand
They should hould but in thrust for the people, in their manes passed away from their hands.
As' our place, sir, is, that is nacion—for many the years
Of our history that parsecuted, when Under on the good soil he hoped for—
The cold fists' our parsecutors—black tool for it—where throttle or arms can't position
Sent the hot lov'ing eyes lingering on the form
—What was I to do?
Am I thought, I'll go spake to the new man—I'll tell him of me as' of mine!
The tyrant, The' poor old Home his money, and maybe hould for a time—
But the accumulated that bought the thief's pen—
Sure appeal to his pity for paper that meld.
I chased him in homes as' in offices, wherever I thought he'd be met,
I offered him aid, he'd put on a—but on, 'twas the land he must not get!
I prey'd on man only to God pray—my prayer was ignored and derided,
As' what mattered how ever in my poor right was, when the law was on his side?

I was young, as' but few years was married to me with a time that I did—
When she sang the sold songs of our country, every
Her voice strongly suggested
'Twas often with pride that I watched her, her soft
Pure Irish beauty, as' her
As' I thought to myself in her red lip, as'
I wondered the song of her joy.

What, father, have patience a while, let me wipe
The sharp drops from my brow—
What, father, I'm not to see him; but I tell
For I have words to say to him!
Master myself? Yes, I know it; but the story is
Of the years of need,
Father, your only son home is—see to the
Of the years of need, as' of
What, his threatened—he cannot see—he cannot
Tried to afford in the peace
That his father—yes, for more than 'twas his, sir; I hold him so up to his face!
Let the bitter—I'm entitled from me in manly the fight for my own.

As' a beggar, with three helpless children, out on the wide world thrown,
As' I have would soon have another—another that could not be spared,
Than that I should be as' slave—but no, I'll not until they do agree dared!
For my wife is in her grave before me lay dead, as' he Still they war'kit!
As' as I'm kneelin' before you, to owe no or share of the guilt,
I laughed hell in Kildare by force, I didn't mind much
What I said,
Like a corpse in the barn, on a bundle of straw with a head
Wrapped in my veins boiled to madness—do they'll see that a man is dead?
I thrashed him once more—'twas the last time—as'
I gave that night like a log.

Yes, I did it; I shot him; but, father, let him who make bare for the lord
Look in it, with they come to judgment, for the hand that fired on my breast
Did I choose it? Not they pricked it, that left him unprotected world on the sod.
Let him who has children, as' sisters, I appeal to the bad they love
For the justice I never got from him, for the right to their being a dog to me—sors.'' He did die, his mother witnessing his dying agony-sion, and sweetest, herself don't know he was fair!

WHAT CRIED MRS. MARSH.

Fashionable Life in New York and in Washington.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel]

Ex-Parkies passed through the city yesterday en route to Kokomo. Knowing that he had spent much time at Saratoga as correspondent of this paper, the undersigned applied him for an interview on the subject of the late Secretary of War and his successor, and the women who had brought about the crisis and the change. In an informal interview the following facts and fancies were gleaned from the genial little gentlemen:

"Did you know Mrs. Marsh?" asked our reporter.

"Yes, very well, sir. She lives in a most beautiful brown stone house on Fifty-seventh street, near Fifth avenue and Central Park. For years Marsh and I had the finest suite of rooms in the Fifth Avenue Hotel. Her carriage and footmen are the most stylish in the Park."

"And the lady herself?"

"Beautiful, sir—one of the most stylish ladies in New York. She is petite in stature, and has a head of silver hair that Mother or Washington would have envied. All the ladies in New York go to the wild oats Marsh's gray hair. She wears it pompadour, and displays it with pearls and diamond dust on all ball occasions, and, goodness! when she rides in the Park or promenades at the theatre! but don't tell those people sirree!"

"The Marshes are rich, then, Mr. Perkins?"

"Yes, Caleb Marsh is a rich man. They don't live on less than $50,000 a year, but never have wells in New York. To be sure, Mrs. Marsh never cared for high society. She went in a respectable but in a second-rate set—a set of moneyed aristocracy, and was happy. The husband of Mrs. Marsh and live in opera boxes and at the big public balls in winter—and when they can be the focus of fashionable excitement and the center of wonder. Poor Mrs. Marsh never enjoyed that. Mrs. Marsh, she seldom went with her husband. Caleb must always occupy a box and stand around the outside of a ball room, while Mrs. Marsh generally appeared in society's brightest circle, and was always found in the richest of Worth's dresses, but hanging on the arm of some dashing county beau. She liked to be admired by gentlemen. She had no lady friends—didn't want them; but when it came to young beaux, why, Mrs. Marsh just took them right away from the young ladies."

"Perhaps that was the trouble between Mrs. Marsh and Mrs. Belknap?" suggested our reporter.

"Yes, that was just it. Mrs. Marsh was stylish, but personally cold and selfish. Mrs. Belknap was not so stylish, but she was full of sentiment. Her figure was well rounded; she always wore low dresses, and with her personal charms she could and did win gentlemen away from Mrs. Marsh, who only had the use of her stylish ways and beautiful and costly toilettes. Mrs. Belknap was a widow. Everybody said, 'old Baker is dead—how his wife will grieve!' And she did shine. She mourned two months and went to Europe. She laid siege to every man she met, and came back somsant was ever cuff on bonnet than she was. Belknap hadn't seen much good society, and he fell a victim at the first fire. And she brought his ruin."

The Conversion of Dr. Ratisbon.

In 1842, on the 6th of January, a certain Alphonsus Tobias Ratisbon came to Rome. He was the son of a wealthy Jew in Strasburg. Having terminated his studies in his native city, he went to Paris to study philosophy and law in the Central University, and concluded his course by taking his degree as Doctor of Laws. There he made the acquaintance of a young Roman, who, no doubt, induced him to pay a visit to the Eternal City before he settled in the world. On his arrival he renewed his friendship with his former friend, and was introduced to his brother. This brother was a good Catholic—a fervent, practical Catholic. At first sight he conceived a strong friendship for Ratisbon. There was in the Jew a frank, generous, gay, witty disposition which rendered his society entertaining and pleasing. His new Roman friend recognized this and appreciated it, and he consequently felt a desire to convert him to the only true Roman religion. His conversation constantly turned upon the subject, but the only answer he received was that the impregnable Jew was, that it was impossible. Numerous friends joined in the assault. A Jesuit Father took his turn, but to no purpose. Numerous friends joined in the fray. A secret Father was also brought to bear upon him, but he remained unconverted. He would not listen to reason. He would not hear of it. He would not be persuaded. He would not be convinced. He would not be converted. He would not be anything but a Jew. He would not be a Christian. He would not be a Catholic. He would not be a Roman. He would not be anything but a Ratisbon.

Mr. Justice B——— was scarcely less exasperated than the rest. He was determined to be obstinate, and on one occasion compelled the owner of a corn-mill in the vicinity of the Cork Court house to stop the working of his mill, as the noise disturbed him. The mill-owner obeyed the order, and, as the judge omitted to give him permission to resume his work as the commission of the Assizes, he kept his machinery idle for several months, and then brought an action against his landlord for the loss he had sustained in consequence of his order. The excellent but irritable judge was the only wearer of the judicial ermine to have been thoroughly frightened, and his terror was occasioned by the following circumstance: There is, or was, some ten years ago, in the town of Navan, a half-crazy blacksmith, named Mick Cahill—as history a disciple of Vulcan as ever wielded hammer. Mick was in the habit of periodically absenting himself from his native town and in a numberless of his cure spots, a long lagged visage, who was popularly known by the sobriquet of "Big Biddy;" and on his return after each disappearance, he was wont to narrate his "bravels and adventures" to every one who was generous enough to give him a drink at the price of his story. A perfect Munchausen in his way, Mick's stories were often highly entertaining, and indeed, he was a good-humored fellow enough, except when his "fighting fit," as he termed it, came upon him, when he was perfectly ungovernable, and a dangerous opponent, even for the muscularly built Mick. On his return from one of his mysterious journeys he announced that he had spent the previous night in the house of the Lord Chief Justice, as a guest, breakfasted with him in the early morning, and, in the midst of which the voice of the judge could be occasionally heard, transmitting his orders to the cook in the larder of the court before him. But this was no story to be told to ordinary ears. It was a true, fine stalwart fellow; but Mick Cahill was a giant in strength, and before he was overpowered by numbers he had laid two of his opponents to measure their lengths on the stern pavement of the floor. He was finally carried by the legs and arms on to the west-table, kicking and cursing as vigorously as a true Irishman could curse and kick. The judge commanded the policemen to leave Mick alone to his fate, in order that he might bear his sentence—a command which they very reluctantly obeyed, for they knew the terror with which the judge inspired Mick, and sooner did he find himself erect then, with another shout of victory, he sprang upon them and error from the table, tumbling them over the barristers and attorneys who were seated around it. Then he began to demolish the benches as best they could, and with prodigious and energetic power he laid open into the outer seats. The clerks vacated their seats, the reporters abandoned their desks, and the judge, pale and trembling with fear, escaped to the door behind the bench, where he breathlessly held, while the victorious blacksmith danced a wild dance on the now empty table, and volunteered a fight all the prize fares of the world for a pint of whisky. The terrified judge, with unemployed Mick's next overnight guest, he was upon himself, rallied out the police to "let the madman git!" and ties on their heels (by the way, being police fees), but Mick refused to go until his valuable chapeau was restored to him, when, having received it at the respectful hands of the bewildered judge, he placed it jauntily on his head, and, with a flourish of his cudgel, and a whistling "The Fox-hunter's Jig," and disappeared from Cavan for another month. The judge was a magistrate, among the many other offices he held there, and he could not help thinking that Mick's visit to the kingdom of Rhin, he met and repeatedly conversed with Ratisbon, and was, with a coterie of pervious, Too case created considerable amusement in the Roman Court, for Mick volunteered to repeat his statements upon oath, and there was now person in the assembly who did not wish to hear them, but when it came to young beaux, why, Mrs. Marsh just took them right away from the young ladies."

"Perhaps that was the trouble between Mrs. Marsh and Mrs. Belknap?" suggested our reporter.

"Yes, that was just it. Mrs. Marsh was stylish, but personally cold and selfish. Mrs. Belknap was not so stylish, but she was full of sentiment. Her figure was well rounded; she always wore low dresses, and with her personal charms she could and did win gentlemen away from Mrs. Marsh, who only had the use of her stylish ways and beautiful and costly toilettes. Mrs. Belknap was a widow. Everybody said, 'old Baker is dead—how his wife will grieve!' And she did shine. She mourned two months and went to Europe. She laid siege to every man she met, and came back somsant was ever $300,000. Mrs. Marsh says Mrs. Belknap caused scandal in Europe and disgraced herself. But Mrs. Bower was too smart to be caught in any scandal if she was engaged in it. No widow in a play ever flourished like her as soon as the grass grew on Colonel Bower's grave. But failing to marry a fortune she came home and made up her mind to scoop in a Cabinet Minister and make a fortune. Any smart rebel woman can carry off an honest man—if she sets about it. Belknap hadn't seen much good society, and he fell a victim at the first fire. And she brought his ruin."

A Wild Irishman.

For the sake of its interest we take a passage from "Random Recollections of an Irish Reporter," by Thomas P. MacCathie:

Mr. Justice B——— was scarcely less exasperated than the rest. He was determined to be obstinate, and on one occasion compelled the owner of a corn-mill in the vicinity of the Cork Court house to stop the working of his mill, as the noise disturbed him. The clerks vacated their seats, the reporters abandoned their desks, and the judge, pale and trembling with fear, escaped to the door behind the bench, where he breathlessly held, while the victorious blacksmith danced a wild dance on the now empty table, and volunteered a fight all the prize fares of the world for a pint of whisky. The terrified judge, with unemployed Mick's next overnight guest, he was upon himself, rallied out the police to "let the madman git!" and ties on their heels (by the way, being police fees), but Mick refused to go until his valuable chapeau was restored to him, when, having received it at the respectful hands of the bewildered judge, he placed it jauntily on his head, and, with a flourish of his cudgel, and a whistling "The Fox-hunter's Jig," and disappeared from Cavan for another month. The judge was a magistrate, among the many other offices he held there, and he could not help thinking that Mick's visit to the kingdom of Rhin, he met and repeatedly conversed with Ratisbon, and was, with a coterie of pervious, Too case created considerable amusement in the Roman Court, for Mick volunteered to repeat his statements upon oath, and there was now person in the assembly who did not wish to hear them, but when it came to young beaux, why, Mrs. Marsh just took them right away from the young ladies."

The Alleged "Intrigue" with Rome.

In a letter to the London Times, Dr. Pusey says: "The late lamented Bishop Forbes and myself had framed statements on the true relations between the Anglican and the Roman and the English Church. Our statements represented the theology which the Anglican communion had received from the Fathers. Could they have been approved by the Roman authorities, they would have enabled us anyhow not belonging to the faith; the large popular system which it has issued with its own hands, and the unquestionable hints of the policemen to re-arrests its head gear—a desperately dilapidated old beaver hat, which had once been very white in its crown, and was on extraordinary large brim, which, in the laugh a policeman gently removed it with his baton, and no sooner had he done so, than Mick, with a wild war-whoop, knocked it down over his eyes, and whole fisticuffs commenced, and Mick took to his heels once more, and was not heard of for a few days longer. In a long conversation, that evening, with a coterie of pervious enthusiasts, whose zeal for his conversion knew no bounds, he solemnly laid bare the real state of his mind and heart on the subject. There were three strong reasons why he did them, he said, which, though she spoke not a word to me, seemed so full of compassion, and softness and love, that my heart was penetrated and filled with anguish for my sins, and so ardent desire to be reconciled with my God."

Thus was he discovered by his companion, who, yielding to his entreaties, took him to a Jesuit Father. Nothing was wanting to the conversion of that whilom, obstinate Jew. He was now by one grace, of which Mary had been the agent and the bearer, a fervent, docile, humble, valiant soldier of the holy Catholic Church. He was soon ordained and did with gentlemen away from Mrs. Marsh, who only had the use of her stylish ways and beautiful and costly toilettes. Mrs. Marsh was a widow. Everybody said, 'old Baker is dead—how his wife will grieve!' And she did shine. She mourned two months and went to Europe. She laid siege to every man she met, and came back somsant was ever $300,000. Mrs. Marsh says Mrs. Belknap caused scandal in Europe and disgraced herself. But Mrs. Bower was too smart to be caught in any scandal if she was engaged in it. No widow in a play ever flourished like her as soon as the grass grew on Colonel Bower's grave. But failing to marry a fortune she came home and made up her mind to scoop in a Cabinet Minister and make a fortune. Any smart rebel woman can carry off an honest man—if she sets about it. Belknap hadn't seen much good society, and he fell a victim at the first fire. And she brought his ruin."

The Conversion of Dr. Ratisbon.

In 1842, on the 6th of January, a certain Alphonsus Tobias Ratisbon came to Rome. He was the son of a wealthy Jew in Strasburg. Having terminated his studies in his native city, he went to Paris to study philosophy and law in the Central University, and concluded his course by taking his degree as Doctor of Laws. There he made the acquaintance of a young Roman, who, no doubt, induced him to pay a visit to the Eternal City before he settled in the world. On his arrival he renewed his friendship with his former friend, and was introduced to his brother. This brother was a good Catholic—a fervent, practical Catholic. At first sight he conceived a strong friendship for Ratisbon. There was in the Jew a frank, generous, gay, witty disposition which rendered his society entertaining and pleasing. His new Roman friend recognized this and appreciated it, and he consequently felt a desire to convert him to the only true Roman religion. His conversation constantly turned upon the subject, but the only answer he received was that the impregnable Jew was, that it was impossible. Numerous friends joined in the assault. A Jesuit Father took his turn, but to no purpose. Numerous friends joined in the fray. A secret Father was also brought to bear upon him, but he remained unconverted. He would not listen to reason. He would not hear of it. He would not be persuaded. He would not be convinced. He would not be converted. He would not be anything but a Jew. He would not be a Christian. He would not be a Catholic. He would not be a Roman. He would not be anything but a Ratisbon.

St. Peter's Chains.

The following interesting article is translated from a German paper, which published it under the caption of "A Word Regarding St. Peter's Chains:"

Our readers have doubtless already seen a so-called chain of St. Peter; many, perhaps, possess one to wear it as a watch-chain. It may be, therefore, of interest to receive some information respecting these chains. In 1256 there were brought to Rome from France a quantity of relics of a new style of watch-chains, which, beautiful in shape, were sold for a handsome sum, and there was a little bell, fashioned like a cannon bell. Many, especially young persons, bought and wore them without thought just as other things are worn when it is the fashion—without having the remotest idea what these watch chains meant. It was a season which the revolutionists had laid for the well-disposed of the Christian cities. When the spoilers of revolution could draw the cheek of a man by spread about they made known their meaning. They declared that the chains were symbols of the (so-called) slavery in which the clergy groaned under the yoke of the Papacy," and that the time for emancipation would represented as Orsini bomb; that Orsini who had occupied again Napoleon III ,in order to free Italy from the Austrian yoke, and by disclosures, which in the beginning was not known to all well-meaning persons to secretly was made the conversion of revolt, and only a small number of persons knew it, therefore seen to prepare for the secret adherents of the revolution. The universal indignation which had been expressed the young Roman at this opportunity to again renew devotion towards one of the most venerable monuments of Rome, to spread more than ever the veneration of the Chains of St. Peter, by having watch-chains made similar to the original and with her two blessing bands, pushed him appeal to his glorious time. Then the lower tempter was not to be thus baffled. With an ingenuity worthy of a fiend incarnate, he turned his weapons against the very chains which were intended to be used for the defense of Christendom. Such time the villainous proposal was received, and such time rejoiced with scorn.

But the murderous weapons were baffled after all. During the delay created by their refined tortures they were surprised by a troop of Lord Douglas' horse hastening to the scene. The Parisi Relief.

The devotion, self-sacrifice and sublime heroism exhibited by the women of Ireland, in every struggle which their native land maintained against the detested foreigner, are matters of history. The heroines who rushed with their husbands and brothers into the red breach at Limerick, found worthy successors in the devoted maids and matrons, who, a century later, braved the red-headed ruffians of black-hearted George," as they swept in their career of murder and rapine over the doomed land.

Nor in the annals of mankind either ancient or modern wanting in our own day, for never may be said of her sons, Ireland never yet produced a race of braver, purer or more devoted daughters than the proud-spirited women of the west, who, in the face of foreign tyrant and native traitor, by word and deed, nourish that sacred fire of liberty which all the powers of darkness leagued with England have for centuries failed to put out yet.

Well may our Mother lead be proud of her daughters! Well may her true sons cherish them in their heart of hearts!

We shall speak to-day of one well-authenticated occurrence which took place in Ireland during the dark and troubled days of '98. We give the facts of the story as they were related to us by a valued friend of ours by a deeply-interested eye-witness of the tragedy—Rev. Father John Halpin, the P. P. of Robbes, in county Wexford, where the shocking event transpired. Father John was, at that time, a divinity student and also a captain of the United Irish-men. He was the first priest ordained in Ireland since the passage of the "Penal Laws." The hero of the story, Charles Halpin, was his cousin and a fellow-parishioner, under another relative, the celebrated Michael Boylan, afterward executed at the Thatch, Dundalk, and whose gallantry of death was a sore disaster to the best men of Wexford, across which, under Holt, made that wonderful forced march from Wicklow to the Boyne.

The heroine and mother was a near relative of Lord Gormanstown. She was a most refined and accomplished lady, and devotedly attached to our country. She had become captivated by the sterling worth and manly attributes of a true-hearted lover of Irish liberty—Charles Halpin, of Nobber—and married him. Their son Charles, or, as he was affectionately called in Irish, "Chaleter ban Oi Halpin," was in all respects worthy a descent from such a noble sprung. Six feet in height; strikingly fair, as his name implied, he was the best wrestler, hurler and pike-driller, as well as pikemaker, in the country.

The Halpins were celebrated antiquarians in true; and the beautiful wrought-iron gates of Whitehead, Rebood and Rebaldron, are still pointed out as monuments of their artistic skill. Fair Charles Halpin had long been what in those days to denominated a "sweetheart," and one morning in spring of 1798, his house was surrounded by a troop of Colonel Frail's Black Horse Cavalry, and himself arrested by the brutal commandant, who swore that "if he found anything in the shape of a pitchfork on his premises, he would hang him from the old tree before his door." The undaunted young man replied to this threat of the Orange bully: "I defy you, sir." The search was immediately instituted, the Colonel himself throwing his arm to the golden epaulette in a heap of coals in his eager search for pike heads. At length a trooper struck the butt of his carbine forcibly on a broad flag covered over which ran through the forge, and the hollow, metallic sound led to the discovery of the pikeheads of pikeheads which were stored therein. "Chaleter Ban" was instantly dragged to the nearest tree. His mother, the noblest of women would melt the heart of a savage, pleaded for the life of her noble boy. He is dragged, she hastened her darling son to close his eyes to such a horror. And when she saw his loving eyes lingering on the form of his distracted betrothed, and a thought that he hesitated entered her brain, she actually helped to adjust the rope round his fair neck, and kneeling before him, pointed to the ladder at the tree's root. Kissing and with her two blessing hands, pushed him appeal to his glorious fate. Then the lower tempter was not to be thus baffled. With an ingenuity worthy of a fiend incarnate, he turned his weapons against the very chains which were intended to be used for the defense of Christendom. Such time the villainous proposal was received, and such time rejoiced with scorn.

THE FOX-HUNT.

stand together, sportsmen all!
Hunt together, hunt together!
Unite the hound's whooping ring
Peals cheerily through Croker's glen;
And hark! what a burst they sing!
Hunt all together, hunt together,
Now together, sportsmen all!
Ride together, hunt together—
Hunt all together, Riddell fair!
All together, sport together
Hunt all together, sportsmen all!
Let stout or powder our dogs
Straight he's made for Baltinglas,
Off together, sportsmen all!
John Sportsman, sportsmen all!
Ride together, hunt together—
United stand divided fall—
All together and Ride together!
See that bitter from out the covert,
Hauler, Pinder, are all there!
No close one shout, the parish would corner,
Ride together, hunt together—
Forward, forward, sportsmen all!
Ride together, hunt together—
Hunt together, sportsmen all!
Up together, all together!
Echoing hunt from rocks and caves
See the bounds like shadows fly—
Hear that cheering, sportsmen all!
From all together, joined together!
And a general success together!
All together and Ride together!
Oh! another fall, another!
Hunt together, hunt together—
Hie to Dunrosa. See how they war;
Your wings and spurs never more spare,
For each he strives for all Daisy's owner.
That Huntsman all together!
Hark to the cry and Ringing shout!
Look, how the hounds in a body yonder glow—
"Mount Ida-ara!" is the sweetest "note"—
Hunt together, sportsmen all!
All hark! Who has to the ground—
No! Doncella has lost—noble hound!
Hunt together, hunt together!
New leased together, all on together!
Hunt Daisy's death! Look yonder!
For Aeneas's bed his course he steers;
Oh, make for the Ocean Mackey,
As Clubhouse gives pilots and hooks he avers.
Now, sportsmen, all together!
Flout on the spot, quick from each lash,
Hunt together, hunt together!
Hunt all together, sportsmen all!
Hunt together, hunt together!
Hunt together, sportsmen all!

THE MONITOR & GUARDIAN:
TWO ONLY
Irish and Catholic Journal in California.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

SATURDAY.....APRIL 1, 1876.

SUBSCRIBERS will please specially look at the printed label on the margin or wrapper of the paper; the date thereon shows when the subscription expires.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for neglecting or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. Thus we would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

THE CHINESE DIFFICULTY.

The anti-Chinese movement continues to develop itself. It is now engaging the attention of all our California newspapers, irrespective of politics, and of all classes of citizens without regard to creed or race. In short, the movement is a genuine and spontaneous outburst of feeling on the part of the Caucasians settled on this coast recognising the imminent danger in our State which lies hidden beneath the steady and insidious encroachments of the coolie tribe.

We are to have a mass meeting of the citizens of San Francisco, on Wednesday evening next, at which the Governor will preside, and the interior towns will hold similar demonstrations as soon as may be convenient. The upshot, we suppose, will be that a number of strongly-worded resolutions will be forwarded to Washington, and that some sort of a deputation will be got up in Congress about the matter. But what will come next? What will follow this oratorical display? Nothing whatever so long as the Radical faction remain in power; and the sooner and more thoroughly the people of California, at once put this fact the better it will be for themselves.

The "party of great moral ideas" have taken up the "universal brotherhood of man" as a distinctive principle of national policy, and they are bound, for consistency's sake, to act up to it. According to their at present and repeated declarations, a Chinaman has just as much right to come to this country and earn a living here as a German, Frenchman, Englishman, Italian or Irishman, and they will not discriminate against him in legislation any more than they will against either of the others. They make no account of a common origin, a common civilization, a common religion, or of the facility with which all Caucasian races blend and fuse into each other, so as to form but one people, in a few generations. They will not listen to arguments about the intolerance of the Chinese, their unwillingness to adopt American manners, their obstinacy in clinging to their own customs and traditions. Nor will they pay heed to remonstrances about the Chinaman's filthy habits, immoral and debasing practices, and total absence of living, disregard for all sanitary regulations and contempt for all our institutions. "One man, especially a foreigner is as good as another," is a maxim which they have elevated to the rank of a religious tenet, and they regard it as a complete answer to all protestations.

The radical organs in this city have belligerently claimed that we have no redress to appeal from Congress, and they do not tell us whence we are to procure it. There is not the least use in our Legislature, much less in our Board of Supervisors, enacting small regulations for the purpose of obstructing the Chinese in their financial pursuits, or compelling them to do business after the fashion of those who surround them. The, though laudable in intent, has unfortunately the air of persecution, and will by no means advance our cause here or in Washington. The BULLETIN was truly to the true source of our annoyance, and from its derogatory or queendment alone have we any remedy to expect. That must be the main object of our attack, and let us not flatter ourselves that we shall have easy work in overthrowing it. The Eastern capitalists and merchants are half crazy about the "Oriental trade." They imagine that China is a veritable mine of gold, which can be worked with immense profit by American commerce. For its advantages, real or suppositious, as they may be, we are afraid they are quite willing to sacrifice the happiness and prosperity of the whole Pacific Slope. Besides, they really have no adequate idea of the mischiefs inflicted upon us by the influx of the Chinese, and they imagine our complaints are founded upon nothing better or more accessible than mere prejudices, or, at the very best, an aversion to competition with cheap labor.

The Democratic party have undoubtedly smarter opinions on this matter and other things of a kindred nature. They do not believe in the "universal brotherhood of man," but in the superiority of the Caucasian over all others on this globe. They maintain now, as they always have done, that this is a white man's country and a white man's government, and that there is no illiberality in keeping out any uncongenial race that threatens to come hither in sufficient numbers to imperil our society and civilization. The Chinese undoubtedly do threaten both in California at the present time, and there is no telling how far they may not extend the plague of their presence. If we could secure the appointment of a Committee to come out here and honestly investigate the Chinese question, it seems to us there would be good prospect of obtaining some revision of the obnoxious treaty. It should be well understood in Washington that the people of the Pacific Coast have not the remotest idea of permitting themselves to be martyrized and their civilization to be blotted out by a horde of Mongolians for the sake of upholding the maxims of the "purity of great moral ideas."

HUNTING A BISHOP.

Prince BISMARCK is out after the game o which he is most fond. He has hunted a bishop near half of Europe, and at length forced him to take refuge in England. He has run other bishops and a very large number of priests into the welcome prisons of the German Empire, of which Kaiser WILHELM is head jailer. He has deprived a yet larger number of ecclesiastics of every degree of the means of living, and is trying the experiment of reducing them to starvation by the slow process of starvation. After all, he is tormented by the fear that he will not succeed, that when there is not a Bishop or priest in the world, and the very name is forgotten, the Catholic Church will be as strong, as respected and as unbending as ever. His fears are manifested in his abhorrence of the sending opposition from any quarter, in the coarseness and brutality of his utterances on of the Catholic party and all belonging to it, in the tenacity with which he clings to office and power, in the severe punishment which he gives to fanaticism and infidelity because they are opposed to Catholicity. Of course we know he will not succeed in his wicked designs. He may suppress, he may persecute, he may create schisms, but he will never expel the Church from Germany, nor even loosen its hold upon the hearts of the people. The Bishop of Paderborn, the latest victim of BISMARCK'S fury, is a prelate beloved by his own flock and respected by all classes. His piety, his charity, his apostolic gentleness, are everywhere in Prussia even as household words. Rumor said and his Imperial master say he must be Bishop of Paderborn no longer because he is too Ultramontane to suit their ideas. They have deposed him, and are resolved to punish as treason any attempt on his part to govern his diocese except after the spiritual interests of his flock. His answer is, in substance and effect, that he holds his ecclesiastical office through the grace of God and favor of the Apostolic See, not by the pleasure or good-will of either the Chancellor or the Emperor, and that their deposition is altogether null and void. He will continue to rule his diocese, and to instruct his priests and comfort his faithful flock just as if there were no such persons as BISMARCK and Kaiser WILLIAM in existence at all.

This, according to Prussian law, is treason and contumacy, and a prison awaits the Bishop of Paderborn if he can be caught. Some short time ago he passed out of Prussia and settled in Holland. There he thought he was near enough to his people to transact his business. But BISMARCK complained, and demanded that he either be delivered up to the police or be driven out of the country, and, as Holland had not the spirit to resent this tyrannical pressure, the hunted prelate was ordered to quit within fourteen days. He obeyed, because it would have been vain to make resistance, and sought refuge in England, where he remains at present, fully resolved to fulfill he duties as far as lies in his power. Beyond doubt he will be protected. His letters will be opened in the Prussian postoffices. All persons suspected of holding communication with him will be narrowly watched. None of his addresses to his people will be permitted to be read in the churches. BISMARCK will elect another bishop—that is to say, he will select some poor, wretched, apostacised ecclesiastic, and send over to him the ecclesiastical buildings and revenues of Paderborn. The Catholics, however, do not believe in Prince BISMARCK'S appointing power; they do not believe he ever received a commission from the Almighty to ordain prelates of the Church; they will never recognize the intended "bishop," but will hold him to the utmost abhorrence. So, in the end, the despotic Chancellor will gain nothing by his bishop-hunting. The Church will triumph, no matter how long or bitter the struggle may be. If BISMARCK read history aright he would know this well enough, and to would think it errant folly to engage in the work of prosecution.

COMPLIMENTARY.—Although only a sample of the many gratifying tokens of esteem we are constantly receiving of the course pursued by THE MONITOR, we select the following for publication, because it was written by a lady whom we have never seen and who resides in a far-off State—Mrs. Isabella S. Crough, of 169 Porter street, Detroit, Michigan. The letter from which the extract is taken was written to her nephew, Charles H. McCurrie, of the firm of McCurrie, Weber & Co., 113 Post street:

"I was afraid you would not continue to send it [THE MONITOR], but I have received it so far. I should miss it very much. I love to it like an old friend who comes to me once weekly."

AN HONORABLE ACQUITTAL

Some months ago the ecclesiastical difficulties which have made the Church in town of Callao in Ireland unhappily notorious, were the cause of a disturbance which newspaper accounts magnified into a sanguinary riot. It cannot be necessary for us at this date to recapitulate the details of the struggle between Father O'KEEFFE and his bishop for control of the parish church, because it is only fair to presume that our readers know enough about the matter already. But we may say that the contest was one of rebellion and contumacy, nearly amounting to heresy on the part of the misguided priest, and one of most gentle and forbearing exercise of authority on the side of the bishop. There has been no case tried in open court for many years that gave the public such an insight into Catholic ecclesiastical discipline, or whereby Church vindicated the wisdom, clemency and justice which animate all the relations between the Church and her erring children. Jurists and judges, the reverse of friendly to Catholicism, were forced to confess that Dr. MORAN'S position had given him no unfair advantage over Father O'KEEFFE, and that the matter at issue between the two had been discussed and decided as freely, legally and honestly as it could have been before any lay tribunal in the world. If such the case, and we hope, it could be only be found in the excess of forbearance shown by the Church authorities.

In a down at least of law suits the foolish old man who set his ecclesiastical superiors at defiance, endeavored to create schism in a pious community, and caused grave scandal to the whole Catholic world, was ignominiously defeated, although he was supported by the money and influence of prominent individuals in Ireland and England, who would lose no opportunity of inflicting a blow upon the Church. Perhaps the most signal trumps of justice has been the last. The disturbance to which we alluded in the beginning of this article was brought about chiefly by the quarrel some pertinacity of the misguided priest himself, and therefore he should have been held accountable for it and for its results. The good people of Callao, who, with the exception of a exceedingly small minority, had all along remained true to their Bishop and the cause of order, had, after an immense amount of trouble and vexation, obtained possession of the church, and duly installed therein a clergyman appointed by Dr. MORAN. But it happened, unluckily for peace, that the rope attached to the bell in the steeple descended through a portion of the house in which Father O'KEEFFE resided, and as a mere piece of spitefulness, for it could be called nothing else, he had the rope pulled up so that the people could not get at it, nor ring the bell. The extenuated the patience of the parishioners, and the police forced an entry among them gathered together, burst into the house and replaced the rope in its old position.

It will be seen that the quarrel at this stage was a very small one, scarcely worth mentioning in a newspaper, and yet it was made the groundwork for a hundred serious denunciations of the "tyranny" and "brutality" of "Irish papists," and for a hundred doleful lamentations over the "persecutions" suffered by poor Father O'KEEFFE. About thirty persons were arrested for participation in the forcible entry, and their trial is reported in the last Irish papers to hand. They were charged with "wrecking" the priest's house. The defence was that the house did not belong to Father O'KEEFFE, and that he had no right to be in it at all. It was the people's property, set apart by them for the use of the parish priest of Callao, and as Father O'KEEFFE was certainly not the parish priest, having been removed by his bishop for lawful cause, he could claim no damages. The legal battle was fought almost entirely on this side, a most imposing array of counsel being engaged; but the summing up of the judge—who, by the way, has the reputation in Ireland of being the most learned Catholic Church—was clearly in favor of the defendants, and they were unhesitatingly acquitted by the jury. From the evidence adduced, both oral and documentary, there is much reason for believing that Father O'KEEFFE is really not in his right mind. Indeed, it may be assumed that few sane men would be guilty of the singular behavior to which he confessed. It is a charitable supposition to think him mad, for that is better than believing him to be a willful creator of schism and dissension, which he must be if he has any intelligent idea of what he has been doing for the last year.

"T. H.," San Francisco.—You are correct. In your surmise. It is the same gentleman, and what prompted his silence we do not know. We find no fault on the score of religion—an Irishman is an Irishman, no matter what his creed. Yet a person having some sympathy with the cause of Ireland might surely have been chosen, and could deliver as good an oration.

MR. M. GRAY, 105 Kearny street, has just published three musical morsels by Alois F. Lejeal. "Chanson aux Paroles," "Gavotte," and "A Scherzo Impromptu." They are very pretty and harmonious. From the same house we have also received No. 1 of Franz Schubert's songs, "The Echo," with original English words by David Nasfield.

A CORRECTION.—In our issue of March 25th the name of the gentleman who was elected consulting physician to the French Hospital was given as Doctor Holden. It should have been Doctor W. Holder of 310 Montgomery Avenue.

HON. S. D. Murphy has been unanimously recommended for the third term by the citizens of San José for the position of Mayor, and James Y. Tisdall for Chief of Police.

OUR JAPAN MISSION.

The appeal for our Japan mission, coming through Father Pellier, is one having special claims upon the Church in America. For more than twenty years past quite a large number of Catholics under our flag have resided all the advantages of Church privileges at the open ports. Many of the sailors of our fleet stationed in Japanese waters have not only received the consolations of our holy faith on Sundays and holy days, but numerous converts have been made—in prosperous circumstances, some stranded there in misfortune—have been received with that kindly attention which Catholic missionaries everywhere display towards their co-religionists, and even towards those unhappily separated from us in belief and practice. The Catholic Church, true to her original instructor, and being the world Church, knows neither race nor nativity, nor any nor riches, but welcomes all to her portals—week day or Sunday, night or day. In Japan hundreds of our citizens have been converted and strengthened at the hour of death—their bodies, once temples of the Holy One, laid away to rest amidst the redeemed—the sacraments administered, and the holy unction of preparation which the Church throws around her weak and erring children in the sacred tribunal of the penitents, have all indeed been without money and without price. For our citizens in the country. Not one dollar has been asked over received on account of their services, nor has a dollar been asked. If, then, assistance is asked of American Catholics for the purpose of sending out to Japan a priest who is really one of the faithful missionaries who, braving every peril, thought it but gain to give up home, country and life, if need be, that they might be a blessing to others.

Father Pellier, who has been laboring with his whole heart in the midst of the Japanese for ten years, is now in this city, and will be glad to receive any contributions that may be made for the purpose of sending out to Japan a priest who is really one of the faithful missionaries who, braving every peril, thought it but gain to give up home, country and life, if need be, that they might be a blessing to others.

THE BALDWIN ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The past week at Baldwin's Academy of Music has been one of more than usual interest to play goers. Mr. Barry Sullivan still more firmly established his reputation as a tragedian of the very highest order by his renditions of King Lear, the Gamester and Othello. King Lear, although abounding in passages of rare beauty and pathos, and consequently giving the actor a wide field of the grandest histrionic talent, will never be a favorite with the public. It is too sad to be even tragical. Mr. Sullivan played King Lear admirably, as we consider in part well suited to his abilities. In the "recess scene," which may be taken as the critical test of the entire play, he was simply magnificent. In the scene with Edgar during the feigned insanity of the latter, he was almost equal to Edwin Forrest in the "Moor of Venice" was fully up to the standard of his merit. The support, by no means all that could be desired, is unmistakably improving; and in some of the minor parts, and those of the female portion of the company, there is a degree of excellence that will soon place them in the front rank of our dramatic corps, but the evidence he brings to bear is as strong as his charges are grave. There are other articles well worthy of attention.

THE CATHOLIC RECAP, March number, comes to us laden with good things, and claiming its portion of our reading hours. Among the articles in the present issue are "Irish Catholic Colonization in the United States and the Centennial," "The Martyred President of Ecuador," a story, "Every Medal has its Reverse," a sketch of Cardinal Barnabo, and "O'CONNOR'S Case." The Apparition of Monsieur Bodry," "Stuff and Stream," and the usual editorial notes and criticisms.

The Late Mrs. O'Connor.

A solemn High Mass of Requiem was offered up at St. Peter's church on Thursday for the repose of the soul of Mrs. Margaret O'Connor, late of Lismore, county Kerry, Ireland. Mrs. O'CONNOR is the mother of Rev. Father O'Connor, Secretary of the Archbishop. She attained a good old age; God spared her to her loving family to their joy and consolation, and she had the happiness to realize the highest ambition of every true Irish mother—to see her son, the anointed of the Lord, officiating at the altar of God, and to hear the solemn ministry of reconciliation for the salvation of man. How beautiful, how refreshing, how consoling must be the remembrance to the of the true Irish Catholic mother; that faith, her piety, her pure, her love of God's holy name and worship she transfused to them, all about that she has chosen for her own portion the better part, the Virgin Mother. One of the best supporters through the good Catholic mother is the profound veneration she has for the Church, from which she hesitated not to receive, and which she hesitated not to receive, and which she hesitated not to receive, and Most Rev. Dr. Dorrian, Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, lectured on Wednesday night week in the opening of the new Catholic Hall, St. Mary's, Belfast. The "Right Use of Reason" was the theme of his Lordship's lecture, and he treated the subject in a most delightful, learned and instructive address.

The death is announced of Mrs. Dorrian, of Lisnaree, at the age of 105 years. More than four years ago her native village, Kirkeeble, congratulated her on the anniversary of her birthday, and offered her twenty-five ounces, wishing her as many happy years.

ARMAGH.

The Church Commissioners have recently bought twenty acres of land, being forever, on note about half a mile from Armagh, forming part of the farm belonging to Mr. Field Trimble, proprietor of the Charlemont Arms Hotel, for the large sum of £1,000.

CORK.

A meeting was held at Youghal on Saturday last, under the auspices of the new total in the case of the Duke of Devonshire. The Rev. Thomas Magrath, P.P., was called to the chair. Governor Hall, Mr. Thomas Keating, Mr. Sidney Wrixon, and Mr. Thomas Hall, Esq., were among those present. The Governor, on rising to move the first resolution, was received with loud cheers. He said he had a large party of the York and Limerick Railroad went down the river by steamer a step to see how far the tide goes in the lower waters, which they consider are injurious to their interests. Besides the landed proprietors, invited, Mr. Hall, M., and Alderman Power, for trial at the assizes.

WESTMEATH.

The man John Coughlan, who was recently injured by a mass of rock falling in the house and property destroyed at Garryduff, still lies in a very precarious state in the county hospital. So terrible was the stroke that two car wheels which were lying within a few feet of the injured man were burned to a cinder. The damage to the poor fellow's property is estimated at over £100. Last week a collection was made in the district to assist in rebuilding the house and purchasing some cattle.

At the last meeting of the Enniscorthy Guardians the case of a pauper who recently changed his religion from the workhouse authorities to the Protestant religion, or, in his absence, his estate, of the admission to the workhouse of any Protestant patient."

The resolution was, after a long discussion, put and lost, 20 voting against 1 and 17 for.

How the Creeds Wrought Ruin to a House-hold.

It is seldom that a separation of a man and wife occurs under such strange circumstances and in the manner given hereafter. This was an actual occurrence a few days since, however, the parties being well known, not only in the county where they resided, but in this city as well, and we might give names, but withhold them for prudential reasons. This much we will say: They lived on the edge of Plymouth county, and, we believe, in Lincoln township. The particulars are related to us very substantially as follows:

The parties referred to were united in marriage perhaps a couple of years since, and in order to consummate this end the young man was compelled to renounce Protestantism and avow allegiance to the Roman Catholic faith, the young woman whom he desired to marry being a staunch Catholic. This step he took. In due time after marriage a child was born to the prosperity happy couple in more than one of their hearts it bore for some time. The little event did not have a tendency to weld the cord. Soon after the birth of their child one the wife expressed a desire to have baptised in the Church and in the faith she had espoused. To this the husband sternly objected, saying he would as soon see the criminal records as compared with what he had seen on the occasion of previous visits. There were only four cases on the calendar and none of them of a serious character.

LOUTH.

At the petty sessions held in Dundalk on Friday week, before Captain Keogh, R. M., and J. Murphy, Esq., David Minhear Henderson, as present engaged in a house-to-house canvass in this town in favor of the Sunday Closing Bill, summoned Mr. Patrick Rooney, publican, Port street, for destroying the peace under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff called on defendant on Tuesday week, and asked him to sign the petition, which he took from him, apparently for the purpose of doing so, and went behind his counter, when, instead of writing his name, he wrote the words "Some Drank," and in the act of taking down his spectacles and handing the paper to the plaintiff he spilled the contents of the ink bottle over the paper, thus destroying it. The defendant fined defendant 20s and 6d costs.

On Thursday week, says the Drogheda correspondence of the Freeman, the interesting ceremony was witnessed in St. Mary's Catholic church, Drogheda, when for the third time in the short space of seventy-five years, the gallant Fusilier Long, marshal of the Drogheda Corporation, and leader of Hymen a blushing bride—a young maiden of only nineteen summers, named John Ledlow—and girl of his affections. The marriage ceremony was performed by Very Rev. Edward Allen, Adm., Mr. J. Monaghan, T. C., being one of the witnesses. A large crowd was collected outside to welcome the happy couple. Many years to the bashful bridegroom, and many and long were the condolences of the ladies of Sans Doubt. The gallant old marshal is one unknown to fame, as in 1848, on the Hill of Tara, and at the O'Connell meetings, his well-known figure was seen marshaling the bands, and, later on, at the assembly meetings and Young Ireland meetings in Dublin on the 5th of August, his figure was rather conspicuous as in the van of the Drogheda tradesmen marched, carrying in his hand the marshal's baton, and wearing a gaudy sash tied with a piece of feathers, and on his breast a cost decorated with medals.

At the local meeting of the Drogheda Board of Guardians, says the Freeman, the clerk read the copy of a letter from Rev. James Fowler, P.P., of Ballyer Head, to the Local Government Board, requesting that body to direct the Guardians to order the removal of the monument erected in Mayne churchyard to Paddy Ward. In the course of a discussion which followed Mr. Gerrard observed that if such indulgence were a crime, then "God help us all." In this view of the question the Board approved of Mr. Collier observing that the matter was likely to turn up in the Queen's Bench.

KILDARE.

On Saturday Mr. John Mears, auctioneer, College Hill, Templemore, sold by public auction, at Hayes Hotel, Naas, the interest in a farm of land containing 64 statute acres, held under a lease for 42 years of which are unexpired, as the annual rent of £62, the property of Charles Tenglly, Esq., Calva Castle, Tuarles. After a spirited competition, it was knocked down to David L. Cambie, Esq., Tuarles, for the sum of £620.

KILKENNY.

Mrs. Elizabeth Quinn (nee McGuire), a widow, died on the 17th ult., at the age of 101 years. The venerable woman left behind an offspring of 129 souls surviving. These comprise ten children—five sons and five daughters—all of whom are married; eighty four grandchildren and thirty-four great-grandchildren.

KING'S COUNTY.

A man named Michael Hackett, says a Waterford paper, who recently held a farm at Queen's Cross, in the county Waterford, was arrested last week on a charge of having posted threatening notices on the premises of Mr. Henry Ridgeway and Mr. Peter Reid, J. P. The notice was to the effect that any one holding anything with his farm might order their coffin. Hackett held a farm at a rent of £66 from the Ridgeways, and it is said he had not paid any rent since 1870, and had in consequence been served with an ejectment. A quantity of forty policemen had to accompany the Sheriff in his possession of the farm. Hackett was brought before Captain Mahon, R. M., and Alderman Power, for trial at the assizes.

ARRAGH.

The Church Commissioners have leased, nearly bought twenty acres of land, lately forever, on the above half-mile from Armagh, being part of one of the farms belonging to Mr. John Hughes, proprietor of the Charlemont Arms Hotel, for the large sum of £1,400.

CORK.

A meeting was held at Youghal on Saturday to raise funds for an application for a new trial in the case of the Duke of Devonshire against the Municipal Council. Mr. Thomas Morgan presided. It was decided to memorialize Government.

On Wednesday night week, says the Cork Herald, a large party of the Cork and Bandon Fox Harriers went down the Lough, and were rowed up to the one or two drift nets in the lower waters, which they reason has information in their interests. Some time last night fishing between Monkstown and Ballyloo was seized, their nets and all the fish on board. Information of the apprehension of the persons engaged in the affair was sworn in at Queenstown.

At the last meeting of the Guardians of the Cork Union an application was received from Denis Hurtile for an increase of the salary allowed to the Catholic chaplains. The two clergymen who at present discharge the onerous functions of the office are paid only £100 each; and Dean Neville pointed out that for this salary two attendances were required to divine service, the whole of their time to the inmates.

The farm known as "Wood Lawn, Belfast, with the dwellinghouse and offices thereon, comprising 27a. 3r. 35p. statute measure, held under lease for 900 years, subject to £167 2s. 7d. per annum, was sold, after a spirited competition, to Thomas W. Ryan, Esq., in trust, for the sum of £4,100.

DOWN.

A circumstance which shows the great amount of good feeling which exists among the tenantry in the county Down is the fact that in the few days when upwards of eighty light, consisting of a few ball-cases only, and for the first time within the memory of the oldest inhabitant there was not a single prisoner awaiting trial in the county jail when the commission was opened. Mr. Justice Lawson noticed this remarkable fact in his address to the county Grand Jury, and congratulated them upon the marked improvement observable in the criminal records as compared with what he had seen on the occasion of previous visits. There were only four cases on the calendar, and none of these of a serious character.

LOUTH.

At the petty sessions held in Dundalk on Friday week, before Captain Keogh, R. M., and J. Murphy, Esq., David Mulholland, Esq., Clerk, Castle Bellingham, a tenant engaged in a house-to-house canvass in this town in favor of the Tenants' Compensation Bill was assaulted by Patrick Rooney, publican, Park street, for destroying the petition under the following circumstances. The plaintiff called on defendant on Tuesday week, and asked him to sign the petition, which he took from him, apparently for the purpose of doing so, and went behind his counter, when, instead of writing his name, he wrote the words "Home Rule," and in the act of taking down his spectacles, whether by accident or otherwise, he spilled the contents of the ink bottle over the paper, thus obliterating it. The magistrates fined defendant 20s. and 6d. costs.

On Thursday week, says the Drogheda Conservative, a most interesting and interesting ceremony was witnessed in St. Mary's Catholic church, Drogheda, when for the third time in the history of the Lee and Hancock fraternity went down the Lee, marshal of the Drogheda to the altar of Hymen a blushing bride—a young maiden of only nineteen summers, named John Lardner—the joy of his life's affections. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Very Rev. Thomas Lalor, Adm., M.J. Maguire, T.C., being one of the witnesses. A large crowd was collected outside the residence and when the happy pair left for the bonnie bridegroom, and many and loud were the congratulations and showers of June and December. The splendid marshal is not unknown in fame, as in 1848, on the Hill of Tara, and at the O'Connell meetings, his well-known figure was seen marshaling the people with such skill, and at the same time regulated the forces on the occasion of the Queen's visit to the Boyne.

WEXFORD.

At the last meeting of the Enniscorthy Guardians the case of a pauper who recently changed his religion in the workhouse came before the Board. Mr. Roberts, J. P., moved a resolution to the effect that no pauper be instructed in future to acquaint the Protestant chaplain, or, in his absence, his curate, of the admission to the workhouse of any Protestant patient." The resolution was, after a long discussion, put and lost, 20 voting against and 17 for.

How the Creeds Wrought Ruin in a House-hold.

It is seldom that a separation of a man and wife occurs under such strange circumstances and in the manner given hereafter. This was an actual occurrence a few days since, however, the parties being well known, even only in a county where they resided, but in this city as well, and we might give names, but withhold them for prudential reasons. This much we will say: They lived on the east of Plymouth county, and, we believe, in Lincoln township. The particulars as related to us are substantially as follows:

The parties referred to were united in marriage perhaps a couple of years since, and in order to consummate this and the young man was compelled to renounce Protestantism and avow allegiance to the Roman Catholic faith, the young woman whom he desired to marry being a staunch Catholic. This step he took. In due time after marriage a child was born to the apparently happy couple to more firmly unite their hearts in love for most other. But this event did not have a tendency to wed that end. Soon after the birth of their babe one the wife expressed a desire to have it baptized in the Church and in the faith she had espoused. To this the husband sternly objected, saying he would as soon see the child dead. Therefore, as the wife could not prevail upon her husband to accede to her request in the matter of the baptism of the little babe, the subject for the time being was dropped.

A little later the babe sickened and died, and, in justice to the effect it does, we will presume that they took him as deep sorrow near the long as a father or mother could feel at the death of any child. They were very naturally demanded that a Catholic priest at the last end, which was denied by her husband strongly and very unreasonably. It appears to us, indeed, to very much thwart and assisted that a prominent and good neighbor, who oftentimes preached, which is a Presbyterian, should conduct the funeral ceremony. The parents of the young wife, we believe, also endeavored to get their son-in-law to comply with the wishes of his wife in this respect, but stubbornly refused to yield, and so the one was laid away to its last rest, we believe, without any formal Christian rite or ceremony.

Here, at the grave of the child, was the origin of the struggle, of the whole proceedings. In view of what had already occurred, the husband refused to do his duty of her now childless daughter to turn home to the parental roof. Separation followed, and the husband left the city, and there, over the fresh grave of their babe, the former husband and wife stamped hands and bade each other farewell. —Sioux City Journal.

AN ATTRACTIVE GEM!—Noting the returns of Sichrook, of Stewart and of Turk, the New York Nation observes: "When there are all in Washington, the Indians and the gravestone men, and the Indian agents, and the borrowers of the Freedmen's savings, the managers will be one of the choicest the world has ever seen, and we regret the Centennial Commission to try and get them lodged and exhibited in a separate building in the grounds. Only Colonel Forney and Babcock as superintendent and reporter. We venture to assert that no feature of the exhibition would draw as much or prove as profitable."

L'HOMME COMMODE.—The late Commissary, who was buried from St. Patrick's church, New York, recently, had many respectable positions in his long and active naval career. Christian Union says of him: "During the war he was for a time stationed at the New Navy Yard, and when his services were closed, after a fabulous number of months, being seemingly inspired with the belief that they have a perfect right to own all they please, gone, in the absence of no being able to collect, are compelled to refuse payment, but honest to keep people out of their premises. Tore seems to be no longer any end to the kind of stinking fish we are supplied with. Need for proper credit. This is not as it should be. Can be had at less than one-half the price charged for Pacific fish, and is much superior in quality to any.—Maritime Trade Review.

No Salvation Necessary.

In a sermon on "How in got Saved," delivered at Harlem, the Rev. William T. Sabine said:

"I do understand every Catholic and Methodist church in the world, and hereby declare that there is no salvation in any of them. Salvation is not superstition. Belief in a purgatory is a superstition. He preaches orthodoxy with the modern improvements. Episcopalian and Congregationalist and Methodist and Lutheran sinners and divines have dropped hell out of their faith. Christ and Satan quarrel with each other when they speak of it. It is distinguished volcano, a tasteless blight, a fiery superstition. Belief in a place where the devil has gone its nauseating way, and is starving for the want of souls to feed on, is the abhorrence of science and civilization and humanity. The belief blasphemes God, and sees in Him its own character as an essential Christ as doctrine it makes Him a fiend. Christ is not in general people. It is an old form of superstition. It is more effective in credulous ages than in ours. It is not a belief that will save a man from hell, but from the real dangers and vilenesses and curses and sadness."

The sermon, it seems, is to have a dose pamphlet form, entitled "Easy Salvation," or "No Damnation or the like. But we do not notice that it is likely to be much in demand. It is merely what is draw the attention of the world to the superstitions of the extravagant self-admiration which is used to be, more than to mechanical or to the ordinary sense, a piece of work.

The unconscious self-assertion laughs at its presence, and goes forth boldly and gayly on the way of progress. Yet there are those who think preaching any use.

They were not as skillful chemists as they might be, and mechanics by no means up to the present time. They were certainly ignorant of the whole meaning of Scripture, centuries ago, than this boast of gentleman, Clark.—Catholic Review.

MY LOVE AND I.

I find it sweet to think of her,
When solemn thinks, perchance, of me;
For many lovers part but fair,
And many rivers seek the sea.

I find it sweet to think of her,
For thoughts by day bring dreams by night,
As earth no sorrow comes to share
Or shadow my supreme delight.

I find it sweet to think of her
That of the words I found so sweet;
And, like a charm to lull my care,
My lips their music still repeat.

I find it sweet to think of her,
Whose gracious praises make me strong
To win the crown those praise wear,
Whose love and passion spoke in song.

I find it sweet to think of her,
And, through the azure autumn days,
A sense of peace pervades the air
To her heart-straw turns the woodland ways.

I find it sweet to think of her,
And, through my heart's day happy break
When hope surrenders to despair,
The pain were sweet for her sweet sake.

I find it sweet to think of her,
If on occasion's high purchase, of me—
Though many lovers find her fair,
And many rivers seek the sea.

Money to Spend and None to Pay,

"No money—hard times!" is the almost proverbial reply to every request for the payment of little bills—the merchant, the mechanic and the laborer uniting to sing the same song. Let a man spend a day in trying to collect money on bills against respectable men of any class in the community, and he forms the opinion, and justifies it by distressing experience, that there is no money in the place. Another man, who has spent the day taking payments on his shops and bills, and has had some place of amusement, forms the opinion, and knows it on his own character, that all sorts and conditions of people are more money than they know how to make a good use of. Here are two extremes coincidences drawn from experience, and never arising from the fact that the experience in each case not being broad enough. This evil of the non-payment of small bills is one of the worst that afflict the city or any other city, and should be abated by every measure, if possible. Every class of people are afflicted with it and by it, ours are so constituted that they don't mind being in debt, but with many it is different. Many incomes are wholly dependent on small transactions—many business men to small online: Don't forget the value of running expenses. Those are they wisest in personal expenditure who put off the payment of everything less pecuniary than a legal execution of a note in the bank under-reasons the name. Many a man is wearing instead of diminishing, and the nonpayment with which most men are blessed to be never without money in their pocket till their credit at the bank plead lack of funds, so as cause for not paying little bills is astonishing. Many of these gentry would be shocked at the idea of duns as insults, being seemingly inspired with the belief that they have a perfect right to owe as long as they please, dunn, in the absence of no being able to collect, are compelled to refuse payment, but honest to keep people out of their premises. Tore seems to be no longer any end to the kind of stinking fish we are supplied with. Need for proper credit. This is not as it should be. Can be had at less than one-half the price charged for Pacific fish, and is much superior in quality to any.—Maritime Trade Review.

NOTICE OF SALE BY BRIDGE.—NOTICE IS hereby given that I, the undersigned, Bridge Keeper of the City and County of San Francisco, will, on the 15th day of April, A. Written for THE MONITOR.

A FAIR SPRING DAY.

The March, but the voice of the storm is hushed;
It's more with a quivering wail
Do the leafless oaks of the woodland bend
Their cross to the sweeping gale.

But the sun looks down from a cloudless sky,
And the green grass peeks to hide
The piping wounds to the sailor's breast
Which were bare by the rushing tide.

When the river, leaping its narrow banks,
As a steed which no hand may rein,
Was borne pale and fast through the silent night
Sped over the fertile plain.

The air is filled with the Robins' song
And the skylarks' bursts of glee,
While the humming bird flits from flower to flower
With the butterfly and bee.

And, charmed by the scepter which Flora waves,
The lilies put on gold cloth new,
And league after league o'er the land to-day
The Sun of the Fresh is here.

With what to order voices earth's breathes rail
To the keenest heart to-day!
Pleading for praise for the Hand that strewed
Such blessings around our way.

And a cloud of incense is wafted up
From the fragrant grass of the sod;
O, fair as a dream, is this sweet Spring glow,
Is the wondrous footstep of God.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— Died March 6th, at Kilterbeid, diocese of Armagh, Rev. Henry Kennedy, P. P.

— Rev. John McGrath, Administrator of the Cathedral, Thurles, died on Sunday, February 13 h, in Templemichy, at the residence of his relative and friend, Rev. Wm. Power, P. P., in the forty-fifth year of his age and the seventeenth of his ministry in the priesthood.

— His Lordship the Most Rev. Dr. Ryan, Bishop of Kilkenny, has made the following change among his clergy: The Rev. Martin Maher, C. C., has been transferred from Mullinge, West of Clara, to Clonghjordan; the Rev. Denis O'Brien, C. C., has been transferred from Clonghjordan to the adjoining parish of Moonsie and Clonghprior; and the Rev. John Sonsiie, C. C., Templederry, has been appointed to that of Kenaley, rendered by the death of the late lamented Father O'Mara.

— On Sunday, March 19th, Bishop Gilberry was consecrated at Hartford, Conn., in presence of a large number of bishops and priests from all parts of the country. The consecrator was Archbishop Williams, of Boston, assisted by Bishops O'Reilly and Wadhams. The sermon was preached by Bishop Lynch of Charleston. On the same day, in St. Paul's cathedral, Pittsburg, Bishop Tuigg was consecrated by Archbishop Wood. Archbishop Gibbons and Bishops Domenec and Mullen. The sermon was preached by Bishop Shanahan, of Harrisburg. Both ceremonies were grand and impressive, as become the edmicis-trvion of so solemn a sacrament.

Another of Grant's Friends.

A most extraordinary piece of evidence has fallen into our possession. It goes to show that a costly present, worth $4,500, was privately given to Mrs. Grant, wife of the President of the United States, and that the giver was subsequently made Assistant Quartermaster-General of the United States by the President. The present consisted of a splendid set of diamonds, originally intended for Queen Victoria. It was purchased of the maker in Paris and brought to New York, where a very expensive sheath was added to it by Messers. Tiffany & Co., and then the whole thing was given to Mrs. Grant by General Quinn Ingalls, who was at that time an Assistant Quartermaster-General, stationed in this city, and was afterward appointed Acting Quartermaster-General of the United States Army at Washington.

At this time the present was made, Gen. Mudge was Quartermaster-General. After a great deal of delay and difficulty in getting General Meige out of the way, that faithful and incompetible officer was finally ordered abroad on a tour of inspection in Europe, and General Ingalls was transferred from this city to Washington, a larger field for the exercise, with great power over contractives, and larger opportunities than he enjoyed here, for doing favors for those who knows of this present. The watch strikes the hours and quarters, and he must have heard it many times.

This present to Mrs. Grant, though not technically a present to General Grant, was in substance, the same thing; and while the acceptance of it by her might not have been an indictment for bribery, yet his connivance at it would constitute a sufficient ground for impeachment.

It is true that General Ingalls did not get his reward until several years after he had made the present. But congress or a Judge does not decide a case until four years after he receives a bribe to do it, does the distribution become bribery. General Ingalls was appointed to this position out of order, and at the time of his transfer to Washington there were two Assistant Quarter-master Generals above him on the army register.—*N. Y. Spiritism in Medicine.

(From the Toledo (Ohio) Blade.)

We publish on our eighth page a lengthy article describing the cures of some remarkable, artists describing the cures of some remarkable, Dr. S. P. Ashley, of Toledo, N. Y., in which he sets forth his extraordinary feats and clairvoyant powers. Dr. Ashley is the man to whom time and space is no obstacle, a single dispensary of medicine—the treasures of the spring elements excepted. The same article tells how by the help and aid of spirits, thousands of consultations are given, and sent to the invalid. Dr. Pierce is the medicine man to whom we have already pointed a few remarks.—"The People's Common Sense Medical Advisor" is the name of the book, a large octavo, nearly three hundred pages, and devoted to Medicine in all its branches, and more especially to the diseases of our country and the people at large, and treats every branch of it in popular style, and explains it so that any one can understand it, and treat themselves either. Dr. Pierce has now been before the people for years, and probably as much is known of his remedies as of any patent medicine of the day. We have used them in our family for years, and are glad to know, has been extensively favorable in both.

Dragging Out Existence.

The fact occurs, many people do not enjoy life, but merely "drags out existence," as the phrase is. Unfitted for the active pursuits of life, and incapable of its pleasures, they linger on, to whom health alone can give a zest; disinclined to social intercourse, and a prey to melancholy, the valetudinarian becomes a burden to himself and friends. Yet there is nothing in all the list of maladies to which the human flesh is heir to that may not be remedied by prompt and persistent attention to the first symptoms of disorder, which experience dictates should be given to the digestive system, and proprietors these hotly irregularities as will restore the stomach to healthful action. No more important organ than the liver, and no disease of the kidneys and bladder, more speedily expelled and thoroughly cured than by these agents. Their combination however, before offering it to the public, was submitted to the test of years, and has won approval practically as well as theoretically. Dyspepsia, biliousness, nervousness, rheumatism, and kidney complaints of a malarious origin, are not less promptly and effectually removed by this fine tonic and alterative medicine. Its mildness is also a recommendation.

It is now thought that the destruction caused by the freshets in Worcester county, Mass., in 1 ely, will amount to $5 000 000, while there is reason to believe three times have been lost—two in Clinton and one in Worcester.

but if you will accept my protection, I engage to take you in your friend's without further ado hence."

"Le bon Dieu reward you, monsieur! she answered, as she let him draw her hand through his arm. "But ought I to permit you to go so far out of your route for a person you know not—a person, too, who can make you no recompense but her thanks?"

"I, is the duty of the young and strong to aid and succor the old and feeble. But more seriously, "I should be sorry if you were I refuse such a trifling service from me. It is better that I should go a mile or two further on, than that you, at your age, should be wandering here all alone."

The old lady made no further objections, but trotted along beside him on her high-heeled shoes, while he accommodated his pace to hers with much thoughtful consideration of her infirmities. A little while, and she was sighing so loudly that he stooped to ask if he was hurrying her too much.

"No, no, monsieur. I was but thinking that if I had a tall, stalwart son, a young man like the good friend of mine who lets feel me his arm so courteously, I should grieve to know that he was in these dark, dangerous streets at such an unholy hour as the turn of midnight."

"And so would my dearest mother if he were about any where that shamed me," he pleasantly replied. "But I have been at no greater risk this night than visiting an old servant who lies dangerously ill at his poor home in one of those streets you are justly blaming, and it was going back to my lodgings that I lost myself."

"Then monsieur has a mother? Ah! but she is very happy!"

"Yes," he answered, simply; "nor she is one of the best of women. And you, mademoiselle, have you no children to take care of you?"

She shook convulsively at the question, and did not answer it till, fearing he had grieved her, he apologized for his indiscretion.

"Nay, monsieur, you have not affected me as much as you suppose, although it is quite true I have neither sons nor daughters. But we will not speak of myself. You are a habitant, a resident of the great Londres?"

"No; I am an Irishman, and merely here for a few days or weeks, as the fancy takes me."

"But doubtless monsieur has many acquaintance in the quarter to which we are going?"

"A few," he admitted.

"Then it is well that the heavens are so dark, or he might blush: he seen pacing the trottoir, or pavement as you call it, with a poor, little old woman like myself."

"Why should I blush at doing an act of common politeness to a female?" asked the noblemen brusquely.

"Why, indeed? And yet confess that it would not be pleasant for you to find yourself at this moment face to face with any of the gay monsieurs who swagger to and fro in the Palais Royal (which you take me)?"

"Why so?" he asked, again detecting the merriment she was trying to conceal, and beginning to suspect that some way or other he was being imposed upon. A temporary disarrangement of his mustaching cloak had enabled him to see that the dress of the crouch was of some light, luxurious material, and that it glistened as if bro-caded with silver. Buckles, too, were glistening in the rosettes of her shoes, although they were set with diamonds; and altogether he felt considerably mystified, especially at the sound of his question she broke into a little peal of laughter.

"Monsieur is pleased to jest," she told him, with a reique into gretty.

"Not it is a fact that as we passed under the lamp I caught a glimpse of a pair of eyes too bright to be set in the face of a decrepid old dame."

"Pardon," she answered, readily. "Monsieur forgets that the orbs of Nonon de l'Enclos retained all their brilliancy when she was nearly seventy years old, and why not she?"

"And did her lips look as rosy and pouting as those I beheld when your hood slipped back a minute ago, or her little hand feel as smooth and plump as the I now make prisoner in mine? Confess, mistress fairy, you have been masquerading, and let me have a fuller view of the features that I will wager forty kisses to your one that you are neither old nor ugly!"

But the unknown began to sob in such unmistakable terror as soon as he would have pressed back her hood, that he desisted, although he could not mend to hold the head that would have struggled out of his clasp.

"Be merciful, monsieur," he said at last, and continue to protect me as you have hitherto done. If I have resorted to a stratagem, it was simply because I was frightened of being set upon in the street alone."

"But you will tell me who you are?" he urged.

"Ah yes! Why should I not?" she answered after a moment's reflection. "I am Pamela Capet, the adopted child of Madame de Genlis, and the governess-companion of her pupils, the princesses of France, with whom I have been educated. I am dated that I am of English birth, and it was to gratify my wish to see my native country that Madame—who is called here by her subjects—permitted me to accompany her. It was on returning from a ball, to which she had been, that I discovered that the man who carried my sedan were spies. They quarreled, and set down the chair to exchange blows; and I, already alarmed by their language, jumped out and fled I know not where, whilst something on me by appearance of my rashness. Now, monsieur, you will be good and generous, and restore me to my friends, n'est ce pas?"

She put back her hood as she spoke, and permitted him to behold so arch and lovely a countenance that he was entranced. He could no longer doubt that she had been telling him the truth, and raising her fingers to his lips, he assured her forgive his rudeness with such earnestness that Pamela was quite reassured, and all her gayety returned.

"I have no fears now," she declared, "and to-morrow I shall be able to make merry over my adventure. It has been a veritable one, has it not? only I regret that it is permitting monsieur to learn my true character too soon. If I had kept up my assumed one most cleverly, you would have evoked a blessing on my veritable head at parting, and I should have quavered in reply, 'Fare thee well good youth! Avoid this wicked town, and do not lose thyself again in the streets of Paris, less worse mischief befall the thee being tricked a little by a woman.'"

"Indeed! like that name would end—and I am greedy your debtor, my lord, as I am sure you will be glad to grant to you I know me."

"He could do more than that!" he cried, agitatedly. "You could send me from you the happiest of men, if only you would promise to pardon me for the liberty I have taken in confiscation. He was going to say more, but she checked.

"Exemption! Ah, no! I could not forgive that! And yet I owe you so much! But no; I have lingered here to long. Good-night, and for love Dieu prayer to you, my lord. I do not think we shall ever meet again, but my prayers for you shall always be yours—always!"

Yet she crossed the road to the opening of her friends. Indeed, he added Lord Edward had joined, was committed. For one moment his arms enfolded her slight, but just emerged from the house, torch in hand, are he turned his step towards his own lodgings, to draw on his cloak for the rest of the night in visions of the beautiful Pamela; who the object of the most romantic and exaggerated fancy joined her friends, who had been anxiously awaiting her return, her mind full of bright fancies regarding her protector.

CHAPTER II.

A PROMISE FULFILLED

The young lady embarked for France with Madame de Genlis on the day of the morrow, and at Tourney rejoined the daughters of the Duke of Orleans, and shared their studies and amusements as before. She had much to tell them concerning her travels, and description to give of the scenes of her recent place; but she had one secret from her merry companions, which, although they learned her repeatedly about her nocturnal adventure, little dreamed that it was to influence her future life. She had visited Paris in company with Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and how she had indeed been the means of helping her escape from all her own amusement at her success betrayed her; but of his declaration of love he would seek her in France, she said not a word, although it was always in her thoughts.

It was a picture of maternal high spirits she began to have fits of pensiveness, and assigned as the reason that, I discovered that the man who carried my sedan were spies. They quarreled, and set down the chair to exchange blows; and I, already alarmed by their language, jumped out and fled I know not where, whilst something on me by appearance of my rashness. Now, monsieur, you will be good and generous, and restore me to my friends, n'est ce pas?

THE MONITOR & GUARDIAN:
THE ONLY
Irish and Catholic Journal in California.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
SATURDAY..... APRIL 8, 1876.

SUBSCRIBERS will please specially look at the printed label on the margin or wrapper of the paper; the date thereon shows when the subscription expires.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for negligence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so wipe it clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

THE RIGHT WAY AND THE WRONG WAY.

There are, of course, a right way and a wrong way of doing everything. Sensible people will, therefore, in every precaution to insure that they adopt the right plan for effecting whatever they desire to do. Now, there seems to us to be some danger that the Chinese question, which is at present so profoundly agitating our citizens, will be forced in an issue that can only result in disaster to the city, and for that reason we desire to give a word of warning to our friends. The movement against coolie immigration, whatever its ultimate result is to be, must be within the law, directed by law and controlled by law; and the men who attempts to transfer it to the domain of human passion or race prejudice should be treated as a public enemy by all loyal and order-loving persons. No only should the law be supreme in this country, but, thank heaven, it is, so they who attempt to transgress it or defy it will surely find out to their sad cost.

The Chinese who are in the State now have come hither under the permission of law and they have just as much right to be here, and to live here, and to work here after the fashion, as men of any other nationality under the sun. But, even more than this, citizens, we have a perfect right to object to California if they please, and no Chinaman, nor body of men, dare venture to prevent them. We cannot comprehend anything more ludicrously inconsistent, or, in view of a more serious way, more invariably to the dignity of the Government of this country, than for one class of immigrants to rise up in indignation and say that another class shall not be permitted to touch these shores. The people of the United States, acting through and by their constituted authorities in Washington, are now, and ever must be, the sole judges of what classes of persons shall or shall not be allowed immigrate into this country, and as long as they make no distinction of race or kind, all must be equally free to come.

Now these things being so, we look upon the formation of "Anti-Coolie Clubs" by unauthorized and irresponsible individuals as a most mischievous proceeding. These "clubs," and all others of their kind, are, as a general rule, got up in associations not of the most respectable character. They are presided over by individuals who happy in the love of eloquence and notoriety, and seek to obtain a little notoriety, although they are completely lacking in sense and discretion. They are recruited from the ranks of the ignorant and unthinking, who are not in the habit of curbing their passions when once aroused. Of course the locality in which the "club meetings" are held renders it nearly a certainty that the oratorical powers of the speakers will be largely stimulated by strong drink. The natural and inevitable consequence is, that while such organizations are utterly and miserably powerless to have the slightest possible effect upon the solution of the Chinese difficulty, they are only too likely to create a riot that would seriously endanger the safety of the city.

To prove that we are not speaking too strongly, we need only call attention to the language that was used at a recent meeting of an "Anti-Coolie Club" by a man whose name is Irish, but who is evidently anything but Irish in his nationality. That individual's oratorical enthusiasm might be somewhat cooled by a brief sojourn in the city prison for inciting to a breach of the peace, and we should like to see him experimented. We consider persons of this character as little of an acquisition to our city as the most enslaved and degraded coolies that ever landed on San Francisco wharves. But we would remind such men that there is plenty of powder and ball in this city, and plenty of trained men who know how to use them, to blow them and their misguided followers—if any there should be—into the hops and believe there will not—out of existence.

The United States of America, we would most respectfully suggest, is not the country where riot or violence will be allowed to settle any great public question. There is no nation in the known world where the law is entitled to more respect or stricter obedience than it is here. It is not framed by any privileged class, and then forced upon the masses as elsewhere, but is the direct emanation of popular will, and is respected by people only respect themselves. And there is no grievance under which any section of the population may labor which cannot be remedied quietly, legally and constitutionally in the course of a little time. All we require is patience and wisdom in the method of urging our demands. We have borne twenty years with the presence of the Chinese, and it will not trouble us very much to endure them somewhat longer, until Congress takes action.

We would strongly advise our fellow-countrymen in San Francisco to shun "Anti Coolie Clubs" as they would pest-houses, and to laugh down any frothy-mouthed fellow who talks about "ricepaper" or "shanghais." If they will only reflect for a moment they will remember that the very newspapers which are now agitating the Chinese question, and trying to get up popular excitement, a few years ago thought a coolie a much better immigrant than an Irishman. It would answer the purpose of these partisan sheets admirably if a riot could be got up in which the Irish would be participants to such a degree that, by a little dexterous juggling with facts, the blame could be cast upon them exclusively. And if a dozen or a score of Irishmen were shot down by the militia for attempting to wreck a Chinese quarter, they would get an amount of political capital out of the occurrence which would last them to their Know-Nothing diatribes for twenty years to come.

Now, we can honorably and honestly claim that THE MONITOR was one of the very first papers in every out against Chinese immigration, and to demonstrate the fact it is there stood to our State. And when an attempt was made to saddle opposition to the coolies upon the shoulders of our countrymen, we conclusively proved that there was no class upon whom Chinese labor had less effect, and that they could stand their presence longer than any other nationality. All we said has come true. The present agitation is not an Irish one, so we trust the Irish will not allow themselves to be made cat's paws by unfriendly and designing politicians. They should cheerfully aid every legitimate endeavor to free coolie immigration, whatever its ultimate result is to be, must be within the law, directed by law and controlled by law; and the man who attempts to transfer it to the domain of human passion or race prejudice should be treated as a public enemy by all loyal and order-loving persons. Not only should the law be supreme in this country, but, thank heaven, it is, so they who attempt to transgress it or defy it will surely find out to their sad cost.

WAR AGAIN!

No sooner have the illustrious potentates who commend, we might with even more propriety say own, the huge armies of Europe taken a brief rest after a season of their royal pastime of slaughter, than they once more find a hunger for more war and to lay plans for another exciting game of murder by wholesale. It really seems as though these Kings and Emperors could never weary of the shedding of blood, as though there was for them some irresistible fascination in setting their fellow-creatures to kill and maim each other. It is only about a dozen years since the latest fields of France were drenched in human gore, and unnumbered thousands of her gallant sons perished in a war which truly had no better origin than the ambition and jealousies of two old men, one of whom governed France and the other ruled Prussia. The former died unhonored and in exile from the land of his birth; the latter could dress a despot, who is more feared than loved. The people of France and Prussia never had any quarrel; they bore no enmity towards each other; if they had been left to their own inclinations they would not have fired a shot in anger; but their sovereign majesties, NAPOLEON III. and WILLIAM, bade them march to the battlefield, and, like loyal subjects, they obeyed. If they had the courage to refuse and stop at home, what an amount of misery and destruction both nations would have been spared! How many widows and orphans whose daily bread is now bedewed with tears, would be happy in the love of husbands and fathers that fell useless and senseless in fight.

One would imagine that after such sickening carnage there would be enough and more than enough of war for the remainder of their lives, and would make up their minds to permit their subjects dwell at home in peace. But no! the Emperor of the dead have not yet mouldered into dust; the fields whereupon they fought have not yet been cleared of the wreck of battle; the ruined and abandoned homesteads that were given to the flames are not yet re-occupied by their terrified owners; but, for all that, their most gracious and sovereign majesties are making preparations for another slaughter. We are told there are "war alarms" in Europe. The whole continent looks like an enormous camp. In every direction arsenals and fortifications bristle with engines of war. What cause for bloodshed exists now? None that any honorable or conscientious man would acknowledge to be sufficient. But some pretext can always be found for a quarrel by those who are anxious to engage in one. And in the present instance the pretext is Herzegovina against Turkish rule in the reverend gentleman a just and well-deserved tribute when we say that as clergyman ever held official position in San Francisco who obtained a firmer hold upon the affection and esteem of the Catholic community. The culture and scholarship evinced in his sermons, lectures and addresses, upon various topics and occasions, have made his co-religionists feel an honorable pride in him and won respectful attention from those who were not wholly in religious opinions. The best testimony to his priestly zeal and strict fulfillment of duty is to be found in the cordial recognition awarded to them by the Archbishop, as illustrated by the honorable dignity to which he has been advanced. Of his estimable social qualities, his unfailing courtesy and affability, it is unnecessary to speak, because they are well known and have endeared him to all who have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for a brief period. He has, indeed, well-earned his rest, and in addition to the spiritual wants of the parishioners of St. Mary's has been unremitting, and we trust he will have a pleasant time and return to us with renewed health and spirits.

Rev. Father P. GRAT come to California in 1856, first officiated at Columbia, Tuolumne county, and was subsequently President of St. Mary's College for some years. He was then located in St. Patrick's parish, with which he has been connected ever since. Father GRAT has been remarkable as an indefatigable worker, and has been equally faithful in everything relating to religion since he came there has been truly wonderful. The magnificent church which he has erected on Mission street is a lasting and noble monument to his zeal and activity for long age to come, we hope. Father GRAT is very popular with those among whom he has labored, and, although they will doubtless grudge him the few months of relaxation awarded to him by his Grace the Archbishop, they will zealously await his return.

To both gentlemen we tender our most respectful compliments. We wish them pleasant days, an agreeable journey and a safe return to the city which we trust will be their home for many, many years.

ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS.

We have been favored with the following by the ret ring State Secretary of the Order, Mr. Thad. Finnegan: At the regular yearly meeting of the delegates from the various Divisions of the Order throughout the State, held at Hibernia Hall, last Monday evening, after the usual business pertaining to the Order had been transacted, the report of the Secretary for the year was read, showing that $15,309 45 have been expended during the year for sick dues, $26,947 91 for funeral and other incidental expenses, leaving on hand $23 882 65. To members ship and funds the A. O. H. had increased during the year in favorable comparison with past years. Seven new Divisions had been organized, etc., showing much prosperity in the Order. At the election for State officers Thad. Finnegan was elected State Delegate; Jas. F. Meagher, State Secretary, and Henry Monahan, State Treasurer. The Order is increasing day by day, and promises to be one of the largest and most influential throughout the entire coast ere long.

The announcement that the venerable Father Boson, of Santa Clara College, is hopelessly declining in health, will be read with sorrow by his many friends.

THE ANTI CHINESE MEETING.

The wide-spread attention and universal interest that the Chinese question is creating, was evidenced by the immense gathering of the citizens of San Francisco at Union Hall last Wednesday evening. All classes of society were there represented. The capitalists of the city, the officials of the State, those high in authority mingled with the mere mechanic and the laborer, all equally interested in the great question of the Chinese emigration was producing, and the means for its remedy. All the available space within the hall, from end to end in the other and throughout the galleries, was crowded to its utmost capacity, and the streets in front, from Third street to Fourth, were filled with people, many of whom were unable to get near enough to the stands to hear what was said, yet all interested, all anxious to know what was to be done in the matter, and how the condition of themselves and their brethren was to be freed from the weight that was bearing them down. Surely has such a gathering been seen in any city. In spite of the immense mass collected all was unusually orderly. All seemed to feel the importance of the matter and the necessity for immediate and thorough measures, and all were in a mood to aid and attentive to the proceedings. Not only was San Francisco fully represented, but a delegation of 12,00 from Oakland, with transparencies and torches, showed that the men of that city, too, were alive to the matter and anxious to take part in the work. Mayor QUINT called the meeting to order in a brief address, and nominated Governor Irwin for Chairman. The Governor addressed the assemblage in a few words, and Hon. A. T. Ryland of San José, Lieutenant-Governor J. A. Johnson, Hon. P. A. Roach, Dr. J. C. Shorb, H. E. Highton, Colonel Stuart Taylor, Hon. E. B. Ryan, Rev. Dr. COX, Colonel J. T. Doyle, Hon. P. J. Hopper of Sacramento, Dr. O. M. Wozencraft, General Winn, Col. Clarkson, P. M. Wallen, Alphabet Baudicé, C. C. Stickey, Hon. Charles Gildea, Hon. William Broderick and Hon. R. M. Clarkson. The speeches were marked by moderation and good sense, and the applause that greeted them showed that the vast assemblage indorsed their sentiments. Letters were read from ex-Senators Casserly and Hager and ex-Governor Haight, indorsing the objects of the meeting and reviewing at some length the danger certain to result from the continued immigration of coolies.

A large force of police were under arms all night to repress any outbreak on the part of the lawless element opposed, but their services were not needed. The Chinese evidently feared an attack on their quarters, for they kept within doors, and barricaded their doors and windows. The good order observed by the people is deserving of universal praise, and shows a secure an absorption of the offensive treaties than acts of violence. The latter would be certain to arouse sympathy for the Chinese, and thus defeat the objects all good citizens aim to secure.

The Great Pedestrian Feat.

Mr. Daniel O'Leary, the famous pedestrian who defeated WEST so easily in Chicago some time since, began his wonderful feat of walking five hundred miles within six days, at four o'clock on Saturday morning, at Platt's Hall, Stockton street, between Sutter and Post. He has, consequently, until Sunday morning at four o'clock to complete his wearisome journey. On Thursday morning he had walked three hundred miles, leaving two hundred more to be accomplished. From present appearances it is safe to assert that he will fulfill his arduous undertaking some hours before the expiration of the time. There is no room for doubt about the genuineness of the performance, the gentlemen who keep the records being above all suspicion and entirely disinterested. Mr. O'Leary. Each day the ball has been visited by hundreds of our best-known citizens, and every evening there has been a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen. There is no question whatever that the feat which Mr. O'Leary is now performing is one of the severest tests to which the power of human endurance can be put, and the man who accomplishes it must be gifted with most extraordinary pluck, activity and muscle. But O'Leary was evidently cut out by nature for a pedestrian. He is powerfully poised, and all his movements are free and supple. He seems scarcely to exert himself, even when walking at a rate that few could keep up even without much running. Scores all the interest in the performance centers in its conclusion. Any man can begin to walk five hundred miles, but how many men can finish the task? So we expect that on Friday and Saturday evenings Horticultural Hall will be crowded with persons desirous of witnessing the finale. Mr. O'Leary is a modest and unassuming young gentleman, who makes no boast of his astonishing powers of endurance, but has quite spirit enough to catch up the challenge of any individual sufficiently vainglorious to try conclusions with him. We understand that great inducements have been held out to him to go to England, where Weston has just failed to accomplish the five hundred miles feat, but he has not as yet made answer to them. His friends in Chicago are confident of his success, and are no doubt anxiously awaiting the telegram which shall inform them that, for the third time, he has accomplished his marvellous journey.

At the meeting of the Board of Supervisors on Monday night, Supervisor Wise, Gibbs and Strother scathingly submitted varied on the course pursued by Senator McCoppin in relation to San Francisco affairs.

HOLY WEEK.

The ensuing week, known throughout the world as "Holy Week," will be a season of prayer and fasting with all Catholics who are true to the ancient observances of their Church. Those who are fallen away from the faith and are a law unto themselves, will, of course, make no distinction between it and any other time of year, because the maxim of worldlings is, "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die." Protestantism, indeed, is now endeavoring to abolish Lent altogether, and with it also of necessity the observances of Holy Week; but they need scarcely go to so much trouble, inasmuch as they practically abolished both long ago. Mortification of the appetite could never find much favor with "reformers," whose leading motive in renouncing Catholicity was to get excuse for indulging their passions without restraint. But the true Church is unchangeable, and her faithful children in every clime will still maintain her time-honored discipline. We have copied from a standard work the following brief account of memories recalled by Holy Week:

PALM SUNDAY.

On this day the Church honors the triumphant entry of Divine Redeemer into Jerusalem, five days before his crucifixion. He was pleased, before the humiliation of his passion, to be acknowledged and received as the Messias, the Saviour of the world, and King of souls. This was a day of great joy and solemnity, and although it is now performing is one of the severest tests to which the power of human endurance can be put, and the man who accomplishes it must be gifted with most extraordinary pluck, activity and muscle. But O'Leary was evidently cut out by nature for a pedestrian. He is powerfully poised, and all his movements are free and supple. He seems scarcely to exert himself, even when walking at a rate that few could keep up even without much running. Scores all the interest in the performance centers in its conclusion. Any man can begin to walk five hundred miles, but how many men can finish the task? Direct and Positive.

U. S. Bell, a Government detective, and Chief Clerk in the Pension Office at Washington until the 16th of February of this year, testified as follows before the House Investigating Committee on the War Department:

Witness produced his appointment as first clerk in the Pension Office. He explained the duties of the office as special agent under the Interior Department, men acting as such being detailed for duty.

By CHAIRMAN—Under that appointment were you interested in the Babcock case?

A.—Well, I was employed in that case by Lackey, Private Secretary of the President.

Q.—What were you to do for Lackey?

A.—To make it as brief as possible, I was to look into the hands of the District Attorney at St. Louis, and see what evidence there was against Babcock.

Q.—How were you to do it? A.—I was to visit the District Attorney's office, as I had the run of the office there, and see what evidence there was.

Q.—Did you go there and get hold of it? A.—I did.

Q.—With the consent of the District Attorney? A.—No, sir.

Q.—You got it surreptitiously then? A.—I did.

Q.—Did you furnish what you got to Lackey? A.—I did. That was in November, at the Lindell Hotel.

Q.—Was there any other person concerned with Lackey that you know of?

A.—A gentleman named Bradley, of Washington, who said he was acting as one of the counsel for Babcock.

Q.—Did Colonel Dyer know you were the agent of Lackey? A.—No sir; not at that time. Lackey told me not to.

Q.—Was that the precise service that Colonel Lackey told you to render him? A.—It was. I was to report to him. That is what I mean by saying that at that time I followed from counsel, Judges of records, and the members of Congress for or against military affairs. Second—All petitions to Congress by officers relative to selling out, or to their character will be forwarded through the Secretary of the Army and Secretary of War, for their action and transmittal. Third—Any officer visiting the seat of Government, or making a business journey upon the application of the District Attorney there and others, and it looked that way. I believed I was employed by the Government. I believed that I thought the parties out there were acting in the interest of the Government, and I believed it till I was over-anxious, and I believed it till I came to Washington. When I came here I found I was employed by Lackey and I dropped the case, and took measures afterwards to communicate with the friends of the President that my idea was wrong.

Q.—That Babcock was not guilty? A.—That he was guilty.

Q.—You informed the President that Babcock was guilty? A.—I was employed to inform him that I believed he was guilty. I did it because the President himself told me that if Babcock was guilty he wished to know it; he wished nothing concealed, and he wished him prosecuted, and he wished it done by men who would be fearless and independent of all men, and I got my dismissal in three days afterwards.

Q.—Had you any conversation with Babcock with regard to this matter? If, at any time, Babcock admitted to you his guilt, please state it? A.—His admission was clear enough. If they wanted me to get evidence out of a man and destroy it it was clear enough.

Q.—Did he admit to you that he was guilty? A.—I told him what Bradley said he was to do in St. Louis, and instead of resenting he said he did not wish me to get evidence out of that office unless I could get the whole of it. I did get a part of it it would be worse than none. Bradley asked me to get the evidence out of the office and bring it to the Lindell Hotel and destroy it. The proposition was made after Lackey returned. This is the last part of November. I went down with Bradley, and Lackey went to take the train to come East. He told me to consult with Bradley; that Bradley was there in the interest of Babcock, and that this whole movement was not against Babcock but against the President; and for me to consult Bradley and act with him.

Q.—And Bradley told you to get the evidence out of the District Attorney's office and bring it to the Lindell Hotel? A.—He destroyed? A.—He did.

Q.—Did you succeed in getting it? A.—No, sir. I thought that was going too far in the matter.

Q.—When you came back here you say you had a conversation with Babcock? A.—I did not say that I related all I got while I was in St. Louis, and I told him of this proposal of Bradley's. The matter was talked over hundred and twenty days, and I replied at that hour. It has not verified the hopes of its friends, and yet it has not passed a really objectionable measure worth mentioning; its chief merit is that it has not passed a measure of a positive character. This has been remarkably the case with the Senate, from which the people expected a great deal; on the other hand the assembly has been more active, and is more regarded in a less favorable light, passed some excellent reformatory measures, that went to the Senate only to be killed—such as Archer's fares and tolls bill, Coffey's mechanic's lien bill, which effected a saving of many thousands a year to the State, and lopped off many sinecures and superfluous offices. Still some reforms have been effected. Bills have been taken towards repealing water rates, and O'Connor's railroad bill may be of some public benefit.

Among the bills lately passed by Governor Irwin was one for the relief of Henry F. Williams," and, another giving Alamo square to the W. Hum part of the Gift Street Bank, Captain Lees, John Nightingale and another person. Among those he should have signed and didn't was the one prohibiting the teaching of foreign languages and music in the public schools of low grade, and the one authorizing the opening of Fourthteenth street in Oakland.

MUSIC RECEIVED.—We have received the following pieces of music, and can speak highly of them: "Mardi-gras," march, as played by Thal Brothers' Band; "Hail Columbia," by Y. H. Brenner; "Pull, Pull, Pull," from the opera of the Grand Duchess of Gerolstein, by Strauss, and "The Social Schottische," by F. W. Helmick, of 278 West Sixth street, Cincinnati; and "The Social Schottische

ANTRIM.

The Belfast Corporation has adopted a petition in favor of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill.

A few days since a great tenant-right meeting was held at Ballygoy, a short distance from Ballymoney. Three presentations consisted principally of tenant-farmers residing on the estate of Major Gray, the revaluation of whose property has given rise to considerable dissatisfaction.

CAVAN.

At the Cavan assizes the trial of Owen Smith for the murder of John Flynn resulted in a verdict of acquittal.

CARLOW.

On Monday evening the Very Rev. Dr. Kavanagh, President of St. Patrick's College, Carlow, delivered a highly interesting and instructive lecture in the Town Hall, Carlow, for the benefit of the Catholic Institute, the subject chosen for the occasion being "The Sun." The attendance was both numerous and select.

CLARE.

At a coroner's inquest at Cork, last week, a verdict was returned, in reference to the death of Mr. Jones, bookseller and stationer, that he had died of an overdose of chloral. A bottle which had contained thirty two doses was found by his bedside nearly empty.

There is at present residing within five miles of Bantry, in the townland of Drumnatleen, in the parish of Carbargip, a woman who has reached the patriarchal age of 104 years. She has six children, and several grandchildren, and a few great-grandchildren. She can give an accurate account of the arrival of the French fleet in Bantry Bay, and can give a minute description of the person of the Liberator. She is in the full possession of all her faculties.

A man named Airey has been taken into custody by Constable Doyle, of Lisseasey, and lodged in Ennis jail, as accomplice of a man named Ryan now in prison as a "Boy of the Hills." It is said he was in connection with the murder of a equestrian statue to the defender of Limerick.

At the meeting of the Newcastle West Board of Guardians on Saturday the chairman, Mr. Edward William O'Brien, D. L., in pursuance of notice of motion, proposed, under the provisions of the Common Lodging-houses (Ireland) Act, that the keeper of every common lodging-house should at all times of day and night give access to the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who shall be authorized to enter such houses for the purposes of the Act, and that any keepers refusing, etc., should be liable to the penalties incurred thereby. Mr. Bennett seconded the proposition. Mr. McCarthy opposed the adoption of the new by-law proposed by the chairman, and denounced it as one which infringed on the rights and privileges of the humbler class of the community. In the face of what occurred when the police were empowered to enter houses by ministerial warrant under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, he asked them to pause before adopting the chairman's resolution, which would only result in raising an outcry against the landlords and the property class of the people. After some discussion, and a suggestion to limit the hours of visitation by the police, the matter was adopted, Mr. McCarthy and three other Guardians protesting.

LONDONDERRY.

On Friday week a meeting of the ratepayers of the city of Derry and neighborhood was held in the corporation hall "for the purpose of devising the best means of opposing the tax to the utmost by the ratepayers for the completion of the Londonderry Railway line, for which a bill is now before the Parliamentary Committee of the House of Commons." There was a good attendance, the hall being crowded in its entire capacity, and on the motion of Mr. Thomas O'Hanlon, T. C., the chair was taken by Mr. Samuel Hall.

LOUTH.

The appeal lodged by Lord Bellew against the chairman's decision at a quarter sessions at Drogheda has been withdrawn. Lord Bellew, it will be remembered, brought a process of ejectment against Miss Bradley, which the chairman dismissed on a technical point raised by the solicitor for the defendant. An appeal was lodged with which was set down for hearing at the present assizes.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the Louth Tenants' Defence Association, last week, the resignation of Mr. J. M. Johnson, read a circular from the Central Tenants' Defence Association, strongly censuring the proceedings of the committee. After some discussion, Mr. Patrick Taaffe proposed, and Mr. Henry E. Kelly seconded, the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted: "That this committee instruct secretary to proceed to make out an accurate list of all notices to quit which have from time to time been brought under the notice of the Association, as also of any cases of ejectments or particular hardship which have been imposed on any tenant or tenants contrary to the spirit and principles embodied in the Land Act of 1870, and forward the same as soon as possible to the Central Association."

MAYO.

The Commissioners of National Education have, on the recommendation of J. Molloy, Esq., head inspector, and J. W. Greer, Esq., district inspector, awarded Miss Sarah Carlisle and Bridget Hanlon, amount £6, to Mr. Patrick J. Heavey, teacher of Ballybunnin Male National School, county Mayo, for the year 1875.

MEATH.

Notwithstanding recent statements as to a settlement having been effected, Mr. Grudwell has obtained a decree, at the Meath assizes, dispossessing Mr. Thomas Silcock from the Ratoath Cheshire farm at Dowth. Lord Gormanstown has been unsuccessful in his appeal against the County Chairman's decision in one of the cases which are now so well known by his landship's name. In the land appeal case of Charles Taylor, M. P., against Heavey, the chairman had allowed the respondent had held a farm from the appellant, but that he went to America, and during his absence his farm was held for him, though in his own name, by a man named Bonnon, who paid the rents with respondent's money. The respondent returned from America, and became an insolvent, and in the schedule, which he filed in the Insolvent Court, he declared that he was possessed of no freehold or leasehold property, and his assets were set down as nil. Mr. Hamilton, as agent of the appellant, served a notice to quit on the respondent, evidentionally on his having a legal right in the holding. Baron Dowse said the notice to quit was of a most judicious character so far as the appellant was concerned, but it was certainly most moral and perjuring.

WESTMEATH.

At the assizes of Westmeath on Saturday, Thomas Cannon, tried for the third time for the murder of Richard Morse, was acquitted.

Baron Dowse, in opening the assizes for Westmeath, said there was only nine or ten cases for trial, and that only thirty indictable offenses had been reported by the police since the last session.

In an action tried at the assizes at Mullingar, on Saturday, the widow of a man named Brien, who was killed by the starting of a train as he was entering a carriage at Moate station, obtained a verdict for £500 damages against the Midland Great Western Railway Company.

WEXFORD.

At the assizes of Wexford, on Saturday, Mr. William T. Vernon has been appointed secretary to the Grand Jury of Wexford, in room of his uncle, the late Mr. St. George James Martin.

At the Sligo Grand Jury last week, Mr. Matthew Allen, cess collector for the lower half barony of Carbury, was called before the Grand Jury to account for an arrear of some £80 or £90, to be allowed to remain uncollected on the Island of Inishmurray. The island in question is the property of the Hon. Cowper Temple, and is situated eight or nine miles from the land. After some discussion by several of the grand jurors, Mr. Allen admitted he had not for the last seven years attempted to make any effort to collect on the island. The foreman stated that the arrear had been for years presented, and then Mr. Allen should make the deficiency good, as the tenants had sufficient property to pay the county cess, and assistance might be given by the constabulary where there was now a police station.

TIPPERARY.

A man named Paddy Foley, Curriswood, Glenahetty, near Clonmel, died on the 23rd ult., aged 107. He never had the use of his mental faculties and bodily power up to the day before his demise.

In opening the assizes for the North Riding of Tipperary last week, Baron Deasy said he felt extremely glad at being enabled to tell the Grand Jury that the duties at these assizes would be extremely light indeed as compared with former years.

TYRONE.

A meeting to inaugurate the Strabane Farmers' Club was held on Thursday week in Simm's Abercorn Arms Hotel, Strabane. The attendance was large and influential. Captain Stewart was called to the chair. Mr. Simms, the Secretary, then read the rules of the club, which were adopted. It was paid their entrance subscriptions. The following gentlemen were elected members of committee: Messrs. James McFarlan, J. P.; John Holmes, J. P.; Captain Stewart, J. P.; James S. Johnston, J. P.; Benjamin T. Herdman, J. P.; William Gamble, J. P.; William Hunter, Robert Gordon, Close Love, James Hamilton, James Clarke, Robert McKinley, James Baird, Alexander Weir, Jr.; William Dunbar, Samuel Dunne, Robert Wilson, John Clarke, Solomon Chambers, William Dermott, Robert McBeth, Andrew Taylor.

It is the best dressing in the world for children's hair, as it keeps it moist and glossy, and prevents dandruff from forming. COUNTRY GIRLS.

Up in the morning early,
In the peep of day,
Skimming the milk in the dairy,
Turning it round this way and that,
Sweeping the floor in the kitchen,
Making the beds up stairs,
Washing the breakfast dishes,
Dusting the parlor chairs,

Brushing the crumbs from the pantry,
Hunting the eggs in the barn,
Churning the cream for dinner,
Spinning the wool for the yarn,
Darning the willow-ing basket,
Down in the harvest below,
Practicing every meadow
Where the red wine cherries grow.

Shattering the "dishes" for Sunday,
Churning the sunny streaks,
Mending the pails and trainer
Down in the running stream—
Feeding the geese and the turkeys,
Making the pumpkin pies,
Jogging the baby to cradle,
Darning your stockings and mine.

Going to every section,
Music is every tone,
It, sung in fun and rapture,
Thousands might meet to some—
Chorus that will rapture rouse,
Teach the wildest of prairie,
Once if these country girls is worth
A score of your city girls.

Afraid of the Truth.

A recent occurrence in England illustrates how industriously Protestant writers have labored to cover up or pervert the facts of history, and how unwilling Protestants generally are to have those facts brought to the light of day. Mr. J. S. Brewer, a gentleman entirely competent by education and ability for the work, received permission from Lord Romilly, the present Master of Rolls, to dig out the piles of documents in the Public Record Office, and publish the story of the reign of Henry VIII. He produced from them sources of information—all but documents—three volumes of which he published, and which, like all his manner he recently completed and published the fourth volume. But in this fourth volume, Mr. Brewer, a Protestant at that, has had to tell the truth about the Reformers, as he had the official account of it in the papers and documents stored away in the Public Record Office.

This, however, has led to a number of persistent exceedingly unpleasant to English Protestants. The avowed object of Mr. Brewer's statements cannot well be impugned by Protestants. In facts they can scarcely be said to be history's enemies at all. They are the statements of the public records, made by Englishmen during the reign of Henry VIII., his own dependents, or those of Parliament. And from these documents it is clearly brought out that the Protestant theory of conscientious scruples on the part of Henry VIII. and of a change in his religious convictions having been the cause of his abandonment of Queen Catherine and of his marriage with Anne Boleyn is "true mother, as Henry VIII. is the father of the Anglican Reformation" was but the reflection of the light of Anne Boleyn's eyes that liberty had no thought of split ing off from Rome until his wicked passion for Anne Boleyn suggested it as the only means by which he could get rid of Queen Catherine. According to the official records, Anne Boleyn is "true mother, as Henry VIII. is the father of the Anglican Reformation" but the reflection of the light of Anne Boleyn's eyes that liberty had no thought of split ing off from Rome until his wicked passion for Anne Boleyn suggested it as the only means by which he could get rid of Queen Catherine. According to the official records, Anne Boleyn is "true mother, as Henry VIII. is the father of the Anglican Reformation."

Incidentally, too, a large amount of information is given respecting Cardinal Wolsey. The records show that, though he was by no means blameless, yet that his character has been grossly aspersed, and that which is commonly attributed to him (that he was solely guilty of the divorce from Henry VIII. ever had) and he supposed committed with Henry's adultery was simply a supposition of Wolsey's enemies. Because with the suppositions and of the Bishops of Lincoln and Durham, Wolsey, that is the statesmanship of Wolsey alone, that stribuled the elevation of England from the position of the Ancient Kingdom to power to a commanding rank among the first class powers; that Wolsey's fall from power and his death were caused by his refusal to consent to the King's proposed divorce; that Wolsey's fall determine was completed, and that the Reformation was engendered in it and brought forth fruit.

But now what must we think of English Protestants, who, on the publication of Mr. Brewer's fourth volume, have raised a clamor against any further investigat on of the records and publication of the facts they recite? They had nothing to say to the day of opposition to Mr. Brewer's labors, still be uncovered and disclosed to view the spring in which Anglican Protestantism had its source; but immediately upon this discovery, it became necessary to stifle the truth and prevent further investigation.

And so it did and prevented it has been. Protestant clamor, that the present Master of the Rolls, Mr. Hodgs Jones, has yielded to it, and now refuses to permit Mr. Brewer to continue his researches. The Liverpool Catholic Times, to which we are indebted for the above account pertinently remarks that Protestants must cease to call us "Papists" in fact, "Great is truth; it shall prevail," into us great is the fact against us it must at last be kept back."—Catholic Standard and Times.

How Parisian Toys are Made.

Any one who has ever walked through one of the great toy-importing houses in the city at holiday time, and perhaps wondered at the taste and ingenuity displayed by the French workmen in devising some of the most beautiful playthings, would hardly imagine that waxe and relive materials, very cold ones, too, sometimes, are largely used in the Parisian toy trade. Elegantly dressed dolls, rieked out in all the latest fashions, and with beautiful faces, which latch incredible prices on the side of the Atlantic, are frequently modeled in the cast-off stage costumes of actresses in the theatres, purchased for a mere song, or from the useless garments adorning the theatrical wardrobes after a play has had a long run. The invention of old papier mache and pasteboards, fished out of the gutters by sharp-eyed rag pickers, furnish the material for the doll boudoirs. Old wood, bones and cane yield their plate to the manufacturers of barrels for toy guns. The little wooden or metal wheels which support movable toys are oh ained from the refuse of any industry in which artificers having circular openings are made. French first-class, usually of wood and having holes for bodies, pivot through which the latter flows, removed in making the apertures. All soldier and pew ar that may be required from old roofing and water-spouts, or work scrap, is pressed into service for the manufacture of dolls' knives and forks, tea sets, etc.; and even the ancient lead coffin dug out of the old cemeteries of Nuremberg the French toy-maker utilizes in the manufacture of lead soldiers. No other nation equals the French in converting the ordinary refuse of the street and workshop into useful and ornamental products. It is this characteristic for saving which makes the French nation so prosperous.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—Miss Mary Jane McSherry, of Limerick (in religion, Sister Mary Benedict) and Miss Mary Ryan (in religion, Sister Mary Clare), were solemnly professed on Thursday morning, February 3d.

—With deep and sincere regret, we have to announce the death of Rev. J. L. Rhaligan, pastor of St. Augustine's Roman Catholic church, Brooklyn, which took place on the 23d of March at the parochial residence. Deceased was born in Ireland, and was 30 years of age.

—Seven new Cardinals are to be created: F. Franzelin, the Jesuit; Mgr. Nina, Mgr. Serafini (Bishop of Viterbo), the Bishop of Calvi and Teano; the General of the Franciscans, Mgr. Meisbere (Archbishop of Cologne); or Mgr von Ketteler (Bishop of Mainz), and another. F. Franzelin has received the notification of his approaching elevation. The Consistory was fixed for the 3d of April.

—The Most Rev. Dr. Ryan, Bishop of Killaloe, has made the following changes among his clergy: Rev. Martin Maher, C.C., has been transferred from Mullogh, West of Clare, to Clonoghjordan; Rev. Denis O'Brien, C.C., has been transferred from Clonghjordan to the adjoining parish of Monaee and Clonghprior; and Rev. John Scanlan, C.C., Templederry, has been sent to the nursery of Kenaliy, vacated by the death of the late Father O'Mara.

—On the 7th March, the Canon Baron von Hiel-ten died in Berlin. He had been a convert to the Catholic faith, and for many years labored as a zealous Catholic priest. Unhappily he was induced to join the Old Catholic movement, and actually accompanied Reinkens when he went all over Germany for Ecclesiastical Affairs to take the Episcopal oath. Soon after this fatal step Reinkens became disgusted with his new allies, and passed over to the old Lutherans! His friends have died in this sect as he had recalled, almost in his last moments, the speech which Melancthon addressed to his mother: "It is a good thing to live a Lutheran, but it is well to die a Catholic."

—The Cork Examiner of March 11th says: "We learn with sincere regret of the death of Canon Murphy, a venerable and exemplary priest and dignitary of the diocese of Cloyne. He lived to an advanced age in the conscientious discharge of his sacred duties, and in the practice of priestly perfections. Very rarely appearing outside of his clerical sphere of parochial duty, Canon Murphy was devoted in an extraordinary degree to the interests of religion, and in the face of many difficulties he accomplished for religion and education in his parish deeds which must have made him one of the greatest public benefactors of his time and diocese.

—The Roman correspondent of the London Tablet, under date of March 4th, writes: The Holy Father has held his accustomed audience during the past week. Many strangers were admitted to the Vatican. The attendance of cardinals and prelates was not so numerous as usual, for many of them left Rome to avoid the noise and disturbance caused by the Carnival. On Tuesday, the 29th ult., Dr. O'Callaghan, Rector of the English College, with the students, had audience of his Holiness. Dr. O'Callaghan presented to the Pope 49 from the Bishop and Diocese of Beverley, and when conversing with the Holy Father mentioned some particulars respecting the progress of Catholicism in England, which appeared to give his Holiness much pleasure. The Rector said that the present mission in Leeds, conducted by the Redemptorist Fathers in one portion of the town, is doing wonders. The attendance has enough to fill the immense church, and spoken, but of the celebrated Sheridan, who had been smitten with Pamela's beauty during her short sojourn in England.

Before evening was over the impassioned Fitzgerald found an opportunity of telling her then, backed by Madame de Genlis, whom his ardor delighted, he had been pleading to the Duke his prior claims to Pamela's favor, and that he had come to Tourney with the full permission of his noble parents to woo and win, if he could, the fair creature whose charms had taken so great a hold on his imagination.

It is not often that love of so sudden growth ends in a happy marriage, but the disinterest of Pamela and Lord Edward proved an exception to the rule. Both were young, virtuous and generous; their tastes assimilated, and the style of affairs in France just then was to make Pamela—a frequent auditor of the political debates carried on in the salons of the Duke of Orleans—thoroughly able to sympathize with the patriotic views of her lover. The Duke and Madame—by many supposed to be really the parents of the young lady—placed no obstacles in the way when Lord Edward pressed his suit. The disturbed state of France, and their own doubtful fortunes, made them prudently resolve to assent to a marriage which would give Pamela a home in another country, and, as they then imagined, relieve them of all anxiety concerning her future.

And so Edward Fitzgerald won his bride, and carried her off to Ireland in triumph, that their honeymoon might be spent amongst his own relatives, to whom he was eager to introduce her.

They found her so charming as he had described her. To her slight but well-formed figure and regular features, he added a grace only to be acquired in the best society, and when Pamela had passed and though very witty, she was too sensible and well disposed to wound any one by sarcasm. Madame de Genlis had found one fault with her—she was indolent—but the adoring husband was very soon aware of his letters to his mother, the Duchess of Leinster, no effort existed, in which he spoke of Pamela with the greatest tenderness.

"Everybody seems to like her," is one of his remarks, "if wish you could see how she dances!" he also proudly says; and then in another epistle he describes her as flitting about the room while he writes to his dear mother whom they both love, attending to the flowers and birds which had adorned it; but of those happy hours there was soon to be nothing but a mournful memory.

CHAPTER III.

THE SCREENING OF THE STORM.

Lord Edward Fitzgerald was naturally too sensitive to the sufferings of others to be long content with living for himself. Although his affection for his wife never decreased, he continued to speak of his cause as a perfect Paradise, he took a deep interest in all the political questions of the day. Brave and satisfied in his own mind that the views he had adopted were correct ones, he did not suffer any personal considerations to keep him silent, nor stay to consider how much there might be to risk by his imprudence. Others might; were him that he was rendering himself obnoxious to the ruling powers, and advise him to be more cautious, and to temporize for a while; but it was to no purpose. He could not brook to circumvallate; his high and haughty spirit disdained to stoop to it, and would not be induced to desert those whom the strength had in former days led to victory. Pamela shrieked him with womanly terrors, for she was satisfied that he could do no wrong; and as a fervent lover of freedom as himself, she was buoyed up with hopes of his ultimate triumph—hopes which were never to be realised. The long impending storm broke over their heads at last; the brief, sweet summer of their lives was over, and a blast wintry blast had succeeded. The order was given for the arrest of the leaders of the party with which Lord Edward identified himself. It was averred out by a magistrate named Swan, who seized several of them at the house they met in Bridge street, Dublin. Lord Edward was warned in time to evade the capture, and he also contrived to elude the search made for him, but he had friends in all classes. The humblest peasant would have purified his safety to secure that of the Fitzgerald whose head was as open as his heart was warm) and had he been prudent, he might have escaped the country at once, and lived abroad till better times.

But his friends were in captivity, his wife was in constitutionally as in life fate, and he disdained to fly. He learned that Pamela had borne the tidings of his danger with tolerable fortitude, but had immediately resolved to quit Leinster House, where, with her children, she was then residing.

"I will not live in luxury," she firmly said, "while my beloved husband is enduring privations and in hourly danger of imprisonment. I will take a lodging in a obscure street, and be ready at any time to join him, should he be able to escape with him from the pursuers or to share his captivity."

She insisted on being allowed to act on this determination, for the knowledge that Leinster House was closely watched, and that her residence there compromised its inmates, made her all the more eager to depart. With only one servant in attendance upon her children, Lady Edward Fitzgerald removed to a quiet street at the rear of Merrion Square, where the few who saw her, simply dressed and apparently in the days of her first bloom, dressed not that this stout woman had once been the ornament of Court, or that her air was constantly strained for news of her husband.

That he would make his way to her were means both felt certain, and that he had no reason why she preferred an obscure lodging to the splendor of a ducal mansion. There not a day passed in or out but was noted by unfriendly eyes; here they might meet, and soon be cognizant of it, save those whose fidelity there was no reason to distrust.

And so proved, for one evening as she walked her humble sitting-room slowly, to hush her infant to rest, the door opened and a Lieutenant sheriffs appeared; but the gesture that warned her to silence spoke volumes. In another moment the door was secured, the disguise thrown off, and Lord Edward was in his wife's rapturous embrace.

Anxiety and sorrow had much changed the face he loved; the ringlets beauty that had distinguished the belle Pamela of the French Court was marred by tears and constant watching; yet we question if she was ever so lovely in her husband's eyes as when she lay on his breast blushing for those she should distress him; and bravely hiding her terrors lest he should only gain her loving arms for the closet of those who were relentlessly seeking him! How tenderly she strove to smile away the sight of her own share in his troubles, may the better imagined than described.

"Did he know," she asked, ere he left her, "that a reward had been offered for his capture?"

"I do; and were it not for you, my precious, one I would no longer skulk in concealment, seeing a betrayer in every one who looks at me suspiciously. I still glory in my cause, and for that I am ready to die."

"But are to yield yourself a prisoner to your enemies," she urged. "Not to risk a long captivity and perhaps exile to some land where I should not be able to follow you. For my sake, Edward, be patient, and keep close."

"Ay,and play the coward a little longer!" he cried bitterly. "Nay, Pamela, it would be a more honorable course to give myself up to those who seek me, and let my fellow-men judge between me and my accusers."

But the dovelad wife shrank in dismay from such a dangerous step.

"You must not do this, my dearest lord," she urged. "If all men were like you, generous and honorable, I would not say this! But to let you give up your liberty and throw yourself into the hands of men incapable of appreciating your motives—ah, no, no, have patience a little longer. Think of our children and be merciful in a short time the angry feelings you have aroused will have subsided. The duke will then be able to obtain a pardon for you."

"Which I should never accept!" he interposed. "Could you, who have shared all my aspirations, who have dreamed with me of seeing old Ireland free, ask me with me of seeing old Ireland free, ask me to receive aught from my oppressors?"

And, Pamela, pale as if she were signing his death warrant, but still truthful and brave, bravely answered, "Ah!"

"But you will consent to leave Ireland?" she was answered the next moment.

"Yes," he replied, with despondency. "If I can be arranged without compromising any one, I will go to France for a while. It galls me to sneak away from old friends, I confess, but I will not refuse!"

When this plan had been discussed, the husband and wife felt it prudent to separate.

Lord Edward assured his lady that he was in safe hiding, and her hopes rose again, for she knew that his manner of preparations were made for his departure. Again the family circumstances did not admit of it, and was apprised that all was nearly ready. So secure were they both seen to those absent that they could bear to say, and that his escape could easily be managed, that Pamela, on the night appointed, smiled through her tears, and pictured the joy of the moment when she and those whom she loved first, should be together.

But they had lulled into false security. That very night Lord Edward was tracked from his wife's lodging to his place of concealment, and, within an hour after he had reached it his arrest was attempted.

He heard the stealthy steps on the stairs; he knew that a longdreaded moment had arrived, but he started up fiercely, determined not to be taken alive. At first with a sword, and, when that was broken, with a dagger he had about him, he bravely defended himself. A fierce conflict ensued, in which a few friends who were near rushed to his aid. With his own hand he disabled the officer in command of the men sent to arrest him, but was eventually overpowered. The brave, the handsome, the heroic Fitzgerald was carried to Dublin Castle a prisoner, and a desperately wounded one. Yet, though faint and bleeding, he encouraged his followers, and not a murmur escaped his lips. Had he succeeded in his sortie he would have been lauded as a hero and a patriot. Yet he never testified greater heroism than in the hour when he found death was inevitable, and that he would never more lift hand or voice for that dear, dear country he loved so well.

Whether his manly composure melted the hearts of those about him or not, it is certain that Lord Edward Fitzgerald was treated by all who came in contact with him with the greatest respect, and that even his enemies, as he urged, were compelled to admit that his cause was a righteous one.

But his efforts were made in vain. Neither for one moment was he indulged upon those his prisons and oft-repeated entreaties, procured her permission to visit him, but Edward Fitzgerald's property was declared forfeited to the Crown, and his widow and offspring left destitute. Pamela's efforts were of no avail; the harsh decree reversed, but without effect, and Pamela returned to France,to sad, but dignified.

She survived her husband for many years, but always tenderly cherished his memory. Until her death she retained the charms that first won Lord Edward's affections. Neither time nor grief did not lose with it the grace and vivacity, the sweetness of temper, and thought that had endeared her to those about her, that endeared her to all who knew her. One of the sincerest mourners at her grave was an aged negress who had known her happy, frolicsome girlhood—one who well remembered how proudly she had looked when, surrounded by a brilliant assemblage, she gave her hand to the gallant young Irishman, who won her heart on a dark night in the streets of the English metropolis.

The Indian Bureau.

Writing of the Indian Bureau, the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph says:

It was born of Protestant bigotry and its chastity of Protestant proselytism. The Indian Bureau was devised to drive Catholic missionaries from the tribes, among whom they had labored for years, and to put them out of the reward of their toil and self-sacrifice. They did drive them out, and the emoluments attached to them to inspire a zeal for the welfare of the Indian. Asking no pay and no assistance from the Government, De Smet and his brethren of the Society of Jesus civilized and Christianized hundreds of thousands of the children of the forest. They desired no worldly compensation—all they asked was the liberty to spend and be spent for these poor, ignorant children of the wilderness. A thousand times the Indians have testified their gratitude and love for their benefactors, but the testimony of Red Robes."

Before a salary was offered for the conversion of the Indianthe Protestant Church manifested not the slightest interest in the matter. The only public step approved was the policy of extermination. But the Catholic Church was even earlier than her friends had anticipated. Pamela had been heroic in her devotion to her spouse, and heroic and gentle under her own trials; but she was a veritable woman when the Duke of Rotunund told her that Edward Fitzgerald had expired in the prison to whom she was detained access. Her anguish penetrated her; and when the Duke of Leinster, the brother of her dead husband, came to mingle his tears with hers, she mistook him for the lost Edward, and suffered fresh agonies when undeceived.

Their union had been a very romantic one, but it was hallowed by a purity of love that knew no decay, and in those five years of her widowhood the lonely mansion was more felicity than often falls to the lot of mortals. It was this that made her loss so hard to bear. Not a reminiscence of her beloved one but filled her with the most poignant regrets that he should have been torn from her under such terrible circumstances.

Yet it was over that the divinest element in Pamela's character displayed itself. In the midst of her own overwhelming grief she could be thoughtful for others, and never forget that there were many besides herself who loved Edward Fitzgerald. For their sakes she at fled be own sorrow, wiping their sorrow and admiration by her fortitude.

As if fortune still resolved to prosecute her, Pamela found her self and children reduced to poverty, as well as deprived of their natural protector. By his attainder, Lord Edward Fitzgerald's property was confiscated

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for negligence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN IRELAND.

We have just received the Irish papers which contain reports of the different St. Patrick's Day celebrations in Ireland and England. There is enough to show that the national festival was honored very extensively and very enthusiastically, although parades and public demonstrations such as we have seen could not take place. The law is administered very strictly in Ireland, and either under pretense of obstructing the streets or tending to provoke a breach of the peace, a display of the national strength would be sure to be interfered with by the police authorities. But there were meetings and banquets and musical festivals, at which plenty of sound judgment, independent sentiments were expressed by those to whom the people have confidence. Even this is something, because, after all, it proves that the nationality of Ireland is not dead, or even sleeping, but strong and vigilant, awaiting the hour for its assertion. The Irish, like every people that think and reflect, are learning from experience. They are becoming acquainted with the true amount of their strength, and have a fairly accurate idea of what they can do to better their condition. They are not likely to engage in fruitless and unavailing rebellions, when only cost valuable lives, destroy the peace of many families, and leave a country more than ever at the mercy of its enemies.

The day is past, or very nearly so, when such sentiments, who calculate nothing but the goodness of their cause and the truth of their own devotion, could induce unarmed and undisciplined masses of their countrymen to play the desperate game of resistance to the armed battalions of England. The time may come, sooner than some imagine, when even that can be done without incurring the awful responsibility of creating a hopeless strife and without the golden opportunity arrives the people will remain perfectly quiet. Spasmodic outbreaks may be caused by the recklessness of impatient leaders, and these should be discountenanced if they cannot be prevented, inasmuch as at the very best they are a waste of strength; but any general movement of the people there assuredly will not be. The Irish people are very tame and slow to certain ardent spirits, yet it is only such prudence as is dictated by the wisest patriotism. Decay of the national sentiment, lessening of the popular resolve to acquire its independence, are things that will never take place in Ireland. Such feelings have lived too long and passed through too many ordeals to perish now. Therefore it is that we are astonished at the conduct of those Irishmen who display hostility to the Home Rule movement, and speak of the men engaged in it as being opposed to independence. Now, it seems to us that if every thing that the Home Rulers want were granted, the longing for national existence would not be in the least abated.

The British Government has too black a history, it is identified with too much wrong and oppression, to ever become acceptable, no matter how much it may be reformed, improved or remodeled. But Ireland would be in a better position to exercise what strength she has, and her chances of accomplishing separation would be correspondingly increased. A domestic Parliament would repeal the Arms Act, would abolish all the Coercion Laws, would authorize the formation of volunteer regiments, and would make the country a nation in all but the name. As there is not the remotest prospect of a successful revolution at the present time, Ireland not having one chance in ten thousand of defeating England, we think that the practical patriots are those who support the Home Rule movement. If Ireland had Home Rule, and a European war in which England got involved should break out, the connection between the two might be snapped with a facility which would surprise the world. The English know this very well, and that is the secret of their opposition to Home Rule. The British newspapers no longer try to bully or browbeat Irishmen; on the contrary, they speak them fair, and try to show how nicely everything would go on if they would only cease to plot and plan for independence. They would not ask them even to become West Britons! We cannot conclude more happily than by quoting the London Times:

> Englishmen have no reason to regret the rebellion, that of St. Patrick's Day. It would be a pity if Irishmen were in one way of that desperate nature only which the word symbolizes. Englishmen are the first to admit the moral characteristics, the fertility of resources and exuberance of sympathy which give to Irishmen a rank in that Irish and the Western. The moral wealth of the United Kingdom would be seriously impaired if the Irish were to be assimilated to the English people. Happily there is no fear that such a misfortune will be brought about even by the darkest future.

WHERE IS JUSTICE?

Revelations of malfeasance in office are daily pouring in upon us with all the speed and fury of a mountain torrent. It appears as if there is not a department of Government, nor a branch of the civil service, which can claim the honorable distinction of not having given shelter to a rogue. In Washington, no less than thirteen committees are engaged in investigating frauds and corruption of every description, and there is scarcely a State in the Union wherein the conduct of some official is not undergoing sharp scrutiny. But of the many thieves and peculators who have been exposed and disgraced before the people, not one is receiving adequate punishment, or is likely to receive it. When a scoundrel is detected, he merely resigns his position and retires into private life to enjoy his ill-got en gains. Society is not very scrupulous or exacting, and provided he has sufficient cash to enable him to live in good style, he will still be reckoned respectable. It is only your common thief or burglar, whose plunder rarely exceeds a few hundred dollars, that has any fear or dread of the penalties of the law. The men who can manage to get away with five hundred thousand or more, is seldom or never troubled by our courts. And if his proceedings should by mischance happen to be so awkward as to render judicial investigation absolutely necessary, he is treated with great consideration, and much care is taken not to hurt his feelings. Every chance is given to him to bribe a judge, buy a jury, pulsion damaging evidence and manufacture exculpatory testimony, so that stupid, indeed, must he be if he finds himself ultimately inside prison doors. Let us look at BABCOCK'S case for an example. When first it was whispered that he had been guilty of "irregularities," there was a howl of rage from the radical press. The accusations were the malignant coinage of Democratic hate, a miserable attempt to stab the President through his private secretary, a vain endeavor to make political capital for the next election, &c. BABCOCK was tried and acquitted, and the radical organs were jubilant.

We remember that the Chronicle of this city had a most high toned article on the objectives of its delight at this "vindication of a gallant soldier." How stands the case now? Is there an intelligent man in the country who believes him to be innocent, or approves of his acquittal? The manner by which that acquittal was obtained are now well understood, and they undoubtedly were such as to make the trial a disgusting farce. When the BELKNAP exposure came, we were assured only his wife was in fault, and that he personally had nothing to do with the sale of the post-traderships. He was unfortunate, his wife was extravagant, and her small feet were to be taken as mitigating circumstances—that was all! But the further investigation went, the more overwhelmingly conclusive was the evidence against him; and now the most election has taken place a grave him up as a very bad case indeed. "It is very evident," says the Sacramento Record Union, "from this and other disclosures, that there was nothing sudden or impulsive about BELKNAP's fall. He was a natural thief and rogue, and he laid his plans with cool deliberation."

This is all perfectly true, but the confession comes a little late in the day. But where is justice? Is there no power in the land to punish SCHENCK, or ROBESON, or PERSHFORT, or GRANT, or GRANT, or BABCOCK, or BELKNAP? There are honester men than any of them serving out life sentences in the State prisons of the republic. If even our highest courts are by some jaggingly rendered insufficient, whence are we to procure a remedy? All this comes from the excess of party feeling in our politics. As long as it is thought more important whether a man is a Republican or a Democrat than whether he is a rogue or a patriot, as long as office is held to be the proper reward for partisan services, reform will be impossible and the plague of dishonesty will extend. But as the people are the source of all power, they can remedy everything as soon as they really wish. So the present state of affairs is directly and emphatically a reproach to them, and they must wipe off the stain.

THE SCHOOL QUESTION.—The Catholic Publication Society, 9 Warren street, New York: This book is a reprint of several fine articles on the educational question which appeared in the early numbers of the Catholic World. As they were written at a time when there was no public excitement on the matter they may be cited as proofs that the Catholic position has not changed in the least, and that all our opinions are based upon cool judgment, not upon passion or prejudice.

THE CATHOLIC PERIL IN AMERICA.

There is a periodical published in England known as The Fortnightly Review. It is not a magazine of the first class, and its literary reputation is never likely to make a fortune for any one. But it exactly suits those Englishmen who fancy themselves educated, without knowing anything well, and who are fond of discussing questions which they are really unable to comprehend. So it enjoys a tolerably large circulation and its utterances are accepted as gospel by certain classes of our transatlantic neighbors. The last number we have seen, contains a paper entitled "The Catholic Peril in America," written by a Mr. FRANCIS E. ABBOTT, which we think will while noticing, because it is the echo of opinions and sentiments that we hear frequently spoken in this country. Mr. ABBOTT is alarmed at the wonderful progress of Catholicity in the United States, and he seems to fear that the day is not far distant when the Pope's bulls and briefs will have the force of law throughout this republic. He deals very freely with statistics and supports all his assertions with formidable arrays of figures. We have no fault to find with his calculations, since we believe them to be nearly correct, and we imagine he has understated rather than overstated the "danger" he speaks of. But the progress achieved by Catholicism in this country, wonderful though it be, does not even approach what would have been done under more favorable circumstances.

It is often stated that, in reality, taking everything into consideration, the Church has lost more than she has gained in America. The scarcity of priests, the want of churches, the absence of proper schools, the prevalence of mixed marriages, have, it has been alleged, alienated from three to ten millions of persons from the Church during the last fifty years. Indeed, this is nothing bold to claiming that if masses had been at hand for preserving the faith among the children and descendants of Catholics during the time mentioned, a majority of America at the present day would be Catholics. For it must be borne in mind that over and over again they have been proved to be the only multiplying race that ever settled on this continent. So, all we are doing now is winning back what should have been ours long ago. Mr. ABBOTT woefully prophesies that in twenty-five years the Catholics will start their own President, and as a matter of course elect their power to take the cabinet to the Legislature.

Now the question naturally arises—what is the Government of the United States bound in honor to do under those strange and startling circumstances? Are the present position be light? Is it to be passively submitted to, or must they be resisted by the power of the country? To decide this properly we must know who is responsible for Colonel STEINBERGER, his mission and his presents. By whose authority were the Gatling gun and the firearms taken out of United States arsenals as I shipped off to the Samoan Islands for the benefit of half-a-dozen Irish rebels? Was it by order of the Secretary of War? Was it by the President? Why was the Tuscarora made the means for conveying STEINBERGER and the presents to the islands? These are now very pertinent inquiries, because every spirited and patriotic citizen wants to learn how far this country is implicated in the quarrel between the "Prime Minister" and the British captain.

We have already had from Washington a complete disavowal of all government connection with STEINBERGER, but there is evidently a mystery in the whole affair which must be cleared up. We should like to be assured by facts that there are not some high functionaries in Washington playing fast and loose with the national honor, and engaging the country in a contemplate before the civilized world. The Tuscarora, we are told, has left Australia for Samoa. What will she do when she gets there? Will she demand the surrender and restoration of Prime Minister STEINBERGER? Will she require the annulling of the condemnation and sale of the "Peerless?" Tours may be a collision between her and the Barracouta, and then this country will have to seriously consider how far the Tuscarora's action should be endorsed and supported. It is evident there is considerable bungling and clustering of government carried on in Washington, and total lack of the dignity and steadfastness which ought characterize the foreign policy of a great nation.

ST. FRANCIS' CHURCH.—On Easter Sunday, Cherubin's Grand Mass will be rendered by an efficient choir, and in the evening there will be solemn Vespers with Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. The Vespers by Le Jeal will be sung.

THE COLLAPSE OF STEINBERGER.

The last steamer from Australia and Honolulu brought some news which should create a little excitement in Washington and give the high functionaries there something more gratifying to do than receiving fraud and rascality. If intelligences both public and private be at all to be relied upon, the commander of a British sloop of war has been guilty of a disrespect to the American nation and flag, for which his Government should be held to a strict account. Our readers will, no doubt, remember that some months ago a certain Colonel STEINBERGER went out, or was sent out, we do not know which, to the Samoan Islands to the United States man-of-war Tuscarora. The steamer also carried a Gatling gun and a large collection of miscellaneous firearms, which were said to be "presents" from the United States to MALIETOA, the dusky potentate who rules the islands. At or about the same time the "Peerless," a small schooner yacht well-known on the bay of San Francisco, sailed for Samoa and she, too, was understood to be a friendly gift from this government to the same powerful and dreaded monarch.

STEINBERGER arrived in due time, and then commenced a series of incidents exceedingly strange in character and by no means easy to comprehend by the American people whom they undoubtedly compromised. He was appointed "Prime Minister" of all the islands immediately. He drafted and got adopted a constitution whereby MALIETOA became the sovereign of his position, while it degraded poor MALIETOA to the level of a helpless and useless puppet. The "presents" were handed out, the Gatling gun was landed and fired: the "Peerless" was gally decked out in American and Samoan colors; there was in fine great holiday making, in which the Tuscarora and her commander figured conspicuously. The impression was left upon the mind of every person was, that if the United States had not actually annexed Samoa they had established a protectorate over it, and were more or less responsible for its future career. Now, we are informed, upon high authority from Washington, that that impression was altogether wrong, and that STEINBERGER had no connection with the Government of the country.

The Tuscarora sailed away, and in a little time difficulties began to arise between the Prime Minister, the King and his subjects. What was the cause of those troubles we know not, but it seems that English missionaries and the American consul of the place were sadly mixed up in them. A few months ago the British insisted that Barracouta steamed into Samoa, and her captain, NEVERS, set about adjusting the differences in a very high-handed and arbitrary fashion. He seized the "Peerless" with a prize, confiscated her and sold her at Sootchman for a quarter of her real value, giving the purchaser, moreover, a guarantee that he should not be interfered with by any power. He confiscated the property of STEINBERGER and sold her to a Sootchman for a quarter of her

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of March 19.

ANIMH.

On Saturday Mr. T. D. Johns, Town Clerk of Carrickfergus, held a Court in the Town Hall for the admission and enrolment of freemen of the borough. It was represented to the Town Clerk, to induce him to hold the Court, that there would be 150 claimants, but the actual number of claims lodged was 51.

At the last meeting of the Carrickfergus Municipal Commissioners several memorials were presented by tenants on various districts of the Great Commons, praying the Commissioners to construct roads in some instances, and to aid in constructing others, for the benefit and convenience of said tenants.

ARMAGH.

Chief Justice Morris, in addressing the Armagh grand jury last week, said:—Gentlemen, I cannot exactly congratulate you on the state of the calendar, or the character or number of the bills brought before you, for they are both subsistent and in number considerable, being over twenty, and show a variety of crime. However, looking over them in the short time I have had the opportunity of doing so, and taking them all in all, I do not at the same time think they present any appearance of crime in this county from which you can apprehend any permanent danger."

CARLOW.

According to previous announcement a meeting was held on Sunday at Kilkenny, the object being to adopt a form of petition to the House of Commons in favor of the ballot in the election of Poor Law Guardians in place of the present system of election by voting-papers.

CLARE.

At the last Ennis petty sessions the man named Berry, arrested last week at Cregg as an accomplice of Ryan, alias Rory of the Hills, at present in Kilrush bridewell, was brought from Kilrush by, who identified the prisoner as one of the two men who entered their house about nine o'clock at night, and were supplied with food, and of whom one fired a shot when departing. The prisoner was remanded for trial at the assizes.

At the last monthly meeting of the Board of Guardians of the district lunatic asylum, Colonel McDonnell, D. L., presiding, the application of the chaplain, Rev. Jeremiah Vaughan, P. P., for an increase of his salary (£50) to £60 per annum, was unanimously refused, the applicant's case having so impanelled with the resignation of office, as regards the non-residence of the duties. The application of a number of attendants for an increase of salary were also refused on similar grounds.

CORK.

At the last meeting of the Board of Guardians of the North Dublin Union electorate were unanimously raised to £125 each.

In the county Crown Court at Cork last week, John Henry Gleeson, clerk to the Bandon postoffice, who pleaded guilty to stealing a registered note from a letter which passed through his hands, was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

Judge Lawson opened the county assizes last week. He said the bills to go before the grand jury were neither numerous nor serious in character. From the constabulary returns he found that, with a single exception, the state of the county was satisfactory.

A meeting convened by circular of gentlemen interested in the promotion of science and art took place last week at the Royal Cork Institution, under the presidency of the Mayor, for the purpose of taking steps to secure for Cork some of the advantages about to be conferred upon Dublin by the provision of a museum and a school for the cultivation of science and art.

A special meeting of the Cork Farmers' Club was held on Saturday for the purpose of considering Mr. Butt's land bill. After a long discussion the following resolution was adopted: "That, while thanking Mr. Butt for his exertions in the cause of tenant right, we fear his bill does not come up to our expectations, being too cumbrous and tardy in its not placing a sufficient check on the growing tendency to or encourage grazing at the expense of cultivation."

DONEGAL.

At the Donegal assizes last week Chief Baron Pallas said he observed on the jury panel a list of names of gentlemen in high position, who apparently had determined not to sit—and to the criminal Court. He should therefore call them on every case. The panel was called on three of £60, which were recorded against a number of magistrates and gentlemen!—James.

The Chief Baron, in opening the commission for Donegal, congratulated the Grand Jury on the small number of bills to go before them—only nine in this large and populous county.

Last week, at the Donegal assizes, Judge Keogh had the land appeals of Michael Gallagher and others vs. the Earl of Leitrim. The chairman in the Court below had dismissed the claims of the appellants on the ground that their conduct in dogging Lord Erne had been of a character that would unnerved dissentient them to compensation on eviction. His lordship reversed the judgment, giving two years' per-chase in the first case.

GALWAY.

Sunday, says the Tuam "News," was the last day of the Archbishop's eighty-fifth year. His Grace addressed the congregation after High Mass for over half an hour in the vernacular in a truly eloquent and attractive discourse. Judging from the lofiness of his Grace's voice, the vigor of his gesticures, and the ease of his delivery in general, we could not believe he had passed his fiftieth year. His Grace presided at a conference of the clergy of the Dean-ery cemery on Monday, and of the Tuam deanery on Tuesday.

KERRY.

The Caherciveen correspondent of the Tralee Chronicle writes that, in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, vessels bound for that port with breadstuffs have been delayed some weeks, and the supply of provisions in the town at present is, therefore, very limited.

KILDARE.

At the last meeting of the Athy Board of Guardians Mr. Cosgrave proposed the following resolution, which was carried: "That the resolution arrived at by the Guardians at the board day, raising Dr. Swan's salary from £80 to £100, be now rescinded." Mr. Dr. George gave notice of a motion to rescind it.

KING'S COUNTY.

At the last meeting of the Tullamore Town Commissioners, Michael Joseph Moorhead, Esq., M. D., in the chair, and seven other members present, the following letter of thanks was read from Sir Patrick O'Brien in response to the vote of confidence passed at the last meeting: "House of Commons, Friday, February 11th—My Dear Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., enclosing me the very courteous and flattering resolution of your Board, conveying to me the approval of my Parliamentary conduct during the past session. Permit me to offer my best thanks. I trust that my act on in the future will be such as to warrant a renewal of their confidence, and obtain for me the approval of my constituents in the King's county generally. I have also received, and presented to the House, the petition in favor of Sunday-crossing, passed by your Board and enclosed to me by you. Believe me, my dear sir, most faithfully yours, Patrick O'Brien. Stephen Lynan, Esq., town clerk, Tullamore." The clerk was directed to insert the letter on the minutes.

LEITRIM.

A man named Dolan, says the Sligo Independent of Saturday, who murdered his wife about six years ago, at Glenfarne, in the county Leitrim, for which he got confinement for life, escaped two years ago from a lunatic asylum (where he was sent on account of his insanity) was arrested in Glenfarne on Wednesday night last, after coming home from America.

LIMERICK.

At the last meeting of the Longford Board of Guardians, Mr. Low, one of the Guardians, made an inquiry respecting two little children named Mahon, whom their mother had described a few days previously as "informed that no account of their father on a would be found. The father said he gave them a ticket of admission on last Saturday evening to the workhouse. The master said he knew nothing of the children, although their names appeared on the books. The porter stated that he admitted them on Saturday, and that they left on Sunday morning. Mr. Low said the matter was very serious, as no clue to the children could be obtained. The medical officer said he would not consider it an attack of fever. The case was passed from the Court of Queen's Bench against the Guardians, as an order under fifteen years of age was permitted to leave the house without protection. Inquiries are being made respecting the children.

LOUTH.

The death is announced of Mr. Henry Garvey, late petty sessions clerk of Dundalk.

Mr. W. Taaffe, of Ardee, has sent £40 to the Ballyclog Committee, whose exertions are continued by the people of Ardee and neighborhood.

In the Record Court at the Louth assizes, last week, Chief Justice Keogh disposed of three appeals and three records. Considerable interest was taken in the appeal of Michael Woods vs. Lee. It was an appeal from the decision of Mr. O'Connor Morris, chairman of the county. Mr. Green McCabe, Ardee, claimed compensation for buildings erected on and unexhausted manures left on his farm, from which he was ejected by Mr. Rutzin last November. The evidence was very conflicting. Mr. Rutzin swore the sale in which his houses, premises and lands were left by Mr. McCabe was "conducted fair." His lordship held that the land had not been properly tilled, and that the amount to which Mr. McCabe would be entitled for the retention of the laborers' outag ewould not be more than the sum required to leave it in a fair condition to a proper outgoer. His therefore affirmed the chairman's decision, but imprisonment with hard labor; and Peter Casey and Peter Devlin to six months each, the judgship (Judge Keogh) commenting strongly on the foolishness and impropriety of the people in this country interfering with our another's party processions and disp ays, however ridiculous.

WINNEBATH.

The Catholic clergy of Mullingar parish are evidently determined to do all in their power to check the increase of immoration complained of by Baron Dowse in his charge to the Grand Jury of this county. At the different Masses on Sunday it was announced that in future Christian burial would be refused in all cases where it could be clearly and unquestionably shown that the excessive use of intoxicating drink had nothing to do with the death of the deceased person. Lately several fatal accidents occurred here, and in the six last cases the evidence at the inquests went to show that five out of the six victims were more or less under the influence of drink.

Mr. O'Brien, Local Government Inspector, visited Arklow last week, to inspect the district in the matter of the proposed erection of the district into a township, under the provisions of the Towns Improvement Act, with a view to improve the harbourage there for fishery purposes.

A Jewish Reproach of Protestantism.

Take, for instance the divinity of Jesus. Is it Christian-like, whether Catholic or Protestant, believe that Jesus was God manifest in the flesh, and that Mary was his mother. It is clear that if Jesus is God and Mary his mother, Mary is the mother of God. And this is unhesitatingly admitted by Catholics. But talk to Protestants of the mother of God and they will be up in arms and cry blasphemy! The inconsistency is clear. Information should have either denied the divinity of Jesus or admitted that Mary was the mother of God. It has done neither. Can this be called Christianity to logic and consistence? Take another instance. Catholics and Protestants both admit the reality of the miracles recorded in the New Testament. They further believe that these miracles were performed by way of credentials in support of the teaching subjoined by Scriptural personages. The conclusion is therefore clear that as the performance of miracles in those days could only have influenced those in whose days they were wrought, and who either witnessed them or heard of them from those who witnessed them, the power of performing miracles must have continued in Christendom, since the necessity for them was a great stay of the teaching of those personages as it was in their days. And, indeed, the distinct promise was given to the followers of Jesus that

THE POWER OF WORKING MIRACLES

Would continue with them. Accordingly, the Roman Catholic Church has its saints and performed miracles, and claims to do so to the present day. Thus the stigmata of a Louise Lateau are considered by the Roman Catholics the effect of a miracle. Thus the conversion of the Jew Ratisbonne, in a church by the appearance of the Virgin to him, is ascribed to a miracle. Thus the appearance of the Virgin in the grotto of Lourdes to some children is declared by the faithful to be a miracle. But all these miracles are rejected by Protestants as mere pretensions or frauds. On what grounds can the evidence of those who witnessed and recorded the miracles in the Gospels be maintained? They both rest on the evidence of eye-witnesses; and, considering the public manner in which these modern miracles were performed, and the tests to which they have been subjected by men who lack neither candor, knowledge or opportunities for investigation, it is clear that the Protestant duplicity is decidedly on the side of modern miracles. Surely, in those several cases, both parties, even in our days, the number and credulity of the witnesses who testified to the reality of the miracles were formed by the relics of the canonized saints are at least as great as those of the confessedly illiterate early disciples of Jesus, or the simple minded women who acted such a conspicuous part in the early history of the establishment of Christianity. Where is Protestant consistency in receiving one set of evidence and rejecting the other? And why, if Jesus was really God, should not a piece of dough, if he willed it, be converted into His flesh as easily as water was into His blood? Is it because after the consecration the elements still possess the same appearance which marked them before the transmutation? Then what is the good of a mystery attached to it? Separate the same as by Romro Catholics, if it cannot cover such a phenomenon? Are they more unreasonable to admit the mysterious transmutation than to believe that three is one and one is three? Such are the points of comparisons, and the reasoning based upon them, must be

BEYOND THE LOGIC AND CONSCIENCE

Of many a thinking Christian, and the alternative which forces itself upon him is, either to abandon the study of the mysterious and incongruities taught by his Church, and to submit that the Jews after all were correct when they rejected the evidence to all those statements upon which the structure of Christianity is reared, or to admit them in their full length and breadth, as does the Roman Church, and consequently to embrace it. There is no way out of this dilemma, and secessions from the Anglican Church will continue, while the causes producing them will be accelerated. Nothing but another reform, ending in an approach in the direction of Judaism, can save Protestantism; and the sooner the new reform be undertaken, the better chance will Protestants have to save itself. If delayis much longer, it may be too late. It may in the interval have lost its chance of leading a mind, and there may not be sufficient earnestness, spirituality, and loyalism left among the gigantic sect.—London Jewish Chronicle.

GERMAN IRON CLADS ON THE RHINE.—The iron-clad gunboats on the Rhine, two of which have lately been on several trial trips, do not seem to answer the expectations they had been formed of them. The vibration is considerable, and it has proved too narrow to enable the boats to make any extensive manoeuvres, and the banks along the whole of the Alsatian frontier, Bingen and Coblence are so much higher than the level of the stream that the decks of the gunboats would be completely exposed to the fire of an enemy's artillery on the shore, while the places with which they are armed are not thick enough to resist the shells of even an eight-centimetre field-gun. It is also observed, says the Correspondent, that by stretching a few fishing nets across the stream the progress of the boats would be entirely stopped; their screws would be so entangled as to be useless, and they could then be easily boarded by the enemy. From all this it is concluded that the gunboats would only be useful for the defence of the Rhine fortresses—a duty, however, which could be equally well performed by vessels of a simple and less costly character.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—On Sunday, March 19, Rev. William Hall, pastor of St. Francis' church, Naugatuck, died in the fortieth year of his age.

—It is intended that all dignitaries of the Catholic Church in Boston shall be hereafter entombed in the crypt of the Cathedral.

—Monsignor Auguste Clusel, Superior of the Lazarists, has been appointed by the Holy Father Apostolic Nuncio at the Court of the Shah of Persia.

—The erection of a monastery for French Carmelites has been begun at Mount Olivet, near Jerusalem, at the very spot where our Saviour taught the Lord's Prayer.

—The latest piece of religious persecution by the Italian Government is reported from Mantua. The Bishop, Monsignor Rota, has been deprived of his residence, and turned out upon the street.

—A Catholic priest has established a mission among the Esquimaux of the Arctic circle. He travels over an immense district with a sledge, sleeping at night under a snow hut.

—In the year 1850 the tract of land now known by the name of Notre Dame, Indiana, was purchased from the Government by Very Rev. S. T. Badin, the first priest ever ordained in the United States.

—While the Catholic population of England, says an American print, does not greatly exceed 2 000,000, and the Catholic population of Ireland is 4 000,000, that of the United States is 6,000,000.

—His Holiness the Pope finds awaiting him in the Terrene Room the two gilded presents, Monsignor Mermillod and Cardinal Ledochowski. They accompany him on his walk on the conclusion of the audience.

—The Prince of Wales while visiting Goa was much surprised at the magnificence of the monument erected over the tomb of St. Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies, who is buried in the Cathedral of Goa.

—Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, of St. Patrick's church, Charleston, aged 58 years, died on St. Patrick's Day. He was a native of Limerick, and was ordained for that diocese on June 24, 1843. His funeral services took place on the 19th.

—The Right Rev. Bishop of Georgia, says the Southern Cross, by his timely appeal for charity has effected the conversion of his diocese to the Catholic faith. Let him continue to repeat his sermon, and, no doubt, many of his intelligent hearers will find out the infallibity of the preacher and the infallibity of the Pope.

—In Tasmania one thirteen hundred have been admitted members of a religious society united to the Confraternity of the Holy Family." Rev. Joseph Flood, C. S. S., spiritual director, and to his exertions the success of the association and the benefits conferred by it on the members are mainly attributable.

—St. Patrick's festival drew a large congregation of Irish residents to St. Isadore, the church of the Irish Franciscan Rome. Pontifical Mass was celebrated by the Bishop of Newfoundland, and followed by a sermon from Father Fitzmaurice, of Dromcliffe, and a glorious St. Patrick and denounced latter-day Materialism as equally conspicuous in Darwinism, in the mania for abolishing the school land endowment in the segmented number of crimes and violations.

—A telegram from Berlin states that the deposed Bishop of Paderborn, who has since his escape from the Wesel prison lay in Holland, has now suddenly left that country in secret. It is believed in consequence of a application made to the Dutch Government by the Prussians for his extradition or expulsion. The Bishop is reported to have removed to England. The Bishop was found guilty, and sentenced in the case of three hundred marks, or imprisonment in default.

MR. PARTON LEGALLY MARRIED.—In a very accommodating spirit has the Massachusetts Legislature legalized Mr. Parton's recent hasty marriage to Miss Eldridge, the daughter of the late "Fanny Fern," which has caused him so much trouble and vexation of spirit, and he now enjoys, on Trout stream, the society of his young wife in the fine old, but staid, town of Newburyport. The Legislature refused to declare the marriage null and void, but passed a special act approving his union, with the warning to other men not to marry their wife's daughter, for the Legislature may not be so accommodating next time. It is now about thirty years since "Fanny Fern," then Miss Sarah Payson, a young widow, was to walk Washington street, with her two dozen-haired young girls. She was then poor and well known by some.

THE COLORED CONVENTION.

NASHVILLE (Tenn.), April 7.—The Nashville Colored Convention was in session over four hours yesterday. The attendance by spectators, both white and colored, was very large, the galleries and lobbies of the House of Representatives being packed to their full capacity. The Committee on Resolutions has not yet been able to agree. The proceedings were unimportant, except two speeches from Pinchback and Smith of Alabama. Pinchback did not take the new departure expected, but his speech had a strong flavor of independence. He said the colored people are beginning to think for themselves, and will never again vote the Republican ticket in solid columns as heretofore. The South could never prosper while party lines are race lines. He wanted no more color lines in politics, but a division of parties on other than race lines. Senator C. S. Smith followed Pinchback, making a powerful speech in favor of the new departure. He advised the blacks no longer to remain in the Republican party, but make terms with white Southern friends, and hereafter to vote for honest and for competent men, without reference to party. The speech made a profound impression, and was received with great applause by the whites and blacks. There is a strong element in the Convention in favor of this departure, and canvassing is very brisk.

A DESERVED DISTINCTION.—The Paris Official Journal announces that a great distinction has been conferred on the young pastor of Chaudonlia, Louisiana, who, in 1870, left the seminary to serve in the French army. The following is the official notice: "At the suggestion of Viscount Paul d'Abaco, the President of the Republic, by decree dated March 7, 1876, has conferred the military medal on Rev. John Charbitat, formerly a soldier, who was wounded at the battle of Le Mans, January 12, 1871, and at present the pastor of Chaudonlia, parish of Terrebonne, Louisiana."

The following section was added to the Civil Code by the last Legislature: "Every corporation doing a banking business must keep in its office for public inspection a book containing a list of all its stockholders and the number of shares held by each. Also must post in its office a notice signed by a majority of the Directors, showing the names of the Directors and the number and value of the shares held by each. The articles in such book or such notice shall be conclusive evidence against each Director and stockholder of the number of shares held by each."

One of the most important land cases ever presented—one that involves 900 000 acres in Kansas—was decided on the 19th inst. by the United States Supreme Court to in favor of the settlers, who number about 15,000, and against the railroads. The Oasers, as might be expected, are jubilant and the land is selling to-day as a day for special thanksgiving.

The U. S. Senate has concurred in the House bill making silver dollars a legal tender up to $50 and half dollars up to $20, and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem fractional currency in local coin. The ought to raise silver to a par with gold for all practical purposes.

The General of the Army has removed his headquarters from St. Louis to Washington.

The new Los Angeles Cathedral was formally consecrated last Sunday, with imposing ceremonies.

The new silver bill which has just passed both Houses of Congress, makes silver a legal tender up to $20 in any one payment. It repeals the limit of $5 as now.

Dropping Out Existence.

The nervous, weakly invalid does not enjoy life, but simply "exists an existence," as the phrase is. Unfitted for the active pursuits of life, and incapable of partaking of its pleasures, to which health alone can give a zest; disinclined to social intercourse, and a prey to melancholy, the valetudinarian drags out a miserable existence. The best remedy to all this that cannot be remedied by that genial alterative, both and corrective, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which supplies deficient tissue, and thereby restores strength and vitality to the nervous system, which accounts for Weakness in most frequently attributable. Diseases of the kidneys and bladder, rheumatism, constipation, and dyspepsia are the forms matters of debility. Their eradication however, by the only master of nervous remedies, the Bitters, and others are upon manifestly need for that purpose. Appetite, sleep, and cheerfulness are restored by its good agent, and other debilitating forms complained of a remarkable manner.

VOL. XIX. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1876. NO. 29.

A MEMORIAL OF NANO NAGLE.

The hundredth anniversary is near at hand of an event then which we might look in vain for a happier or more important in the history of our people, especially the part of this city. On Christmas Day, 1777, was founded in Cork the Presentation Order of Nuns, and the establishment of the parent house in Douglas street, by Miss Nano Nagle. The story of this noble Christian heroine's life has been so well told by more than one writer, and as it is to be presumed that there at least it is now familiar to every one, there needless for us to enter into much detail concerning it. Suffice it to say that it reveals a marvelous spectacle of great deeds accomplished by a weak woman—deeds which, in their material magnitude, but far greater in their moral and social significance—a woman weak of body, but in spirit and in mind potent beyond what language can measure, in that strength which comes from on high, and which arms the weak ones of this world that they may overcome the strong. For thirty years Nano Nagle labored in Cork, within the reach of the children of the poor that religious and secular knowledge from which the operations of oppressive laws long pondered them; and in doing so she encountered perils and difficulties which so mainly human power could sustain or conquer, which read now, in the calm light of impartial history, like the sublimest scenes of a living being, so indeed they were, working by human means. But completing the extent of her labors and their fruits, we hardly know whom we should place beside her, save those of the philanthropists and public benefactors who were sprung from among ourselves who made our community the special field of their salutary exertions; for in the training of the children of the poor as a Christian people ought to be trained, we have a work which has at the same time the character of a sound social system. Such a work was that inaugurated by Nano Nagle, and such is the work that has since that time been so merely continued within the limits of her original boundaries; but its success become literally world wide. To estimate even approximately its good results would be impossible but we may form some faint conception of their extent by the consideration of a few facts. There are 74 houses of the Presentation Order in various parts of Ireland, England, America, India and the Colonies, with an average daily number of about 25 000 pupils. The parent house alone in the present house in Douglas street there are 800 children daily taught, and it has been roughly estimated that since its work was established half a million of children have there received the first bands of the good Nuns, the essentials of a

CHRISTIAN AND CATHOLIC EDUCATION!

Of such an education the Order specially in the minds and the hands of its recipients for the discharge of ordinary social and domestic duties, in the every day life, and better still, purifies the affections of the heart, and makes it a fitting shrine for eternal things which ought be in chief concern. If such be the influence of the Sisters' mission upon those who are the objects of their operation, when we think that each one of these whom it so influences becomes in her turn into a centre of like influence, and that its salutary effects are transmitted in ever widening circles throughout the masses that surround her, we get into a field of speculation in which all reckoning is lost, and the imagination is the only power exhausted. Her first religious foundation here was the humble cabin of which has been our mission is also to prosecute the work of Christian education, but chiefly among the orphans of the poor, and to educate a proper-tee classes. Their institute also has grown in large proportions, and a accompanying results such as would be important in the world which the Presentation Order is achieving and Ursuline Order is hardly surpassed. Blind our readers, were the first religious ship to which Miss Nagle committed her work of Christian instruction, and they were the first companions of the house in Douglas street in which the Presentation Nuns were instated on the removal of their predecessors to the present splendid establishment in Blackrock. Thus it is possible to recognize the dignity of such a character as that of Nano Nagle, or the veneration and gratitude which her name and her deeds must claim from us! The approach of the Centenary of her labors will suggest to the propriety of making it the occasion of some fitting celebration, of the providing a suitable memorial of her, at least in the scene of her early labors. The idea of a memorial church, or of a hall or institution we now, and, we should hope, may yet find the acceptance and take the practical form which it deserves. Such a memorial will be the fate of such a project, our present duty is to see that the necessary sum shall be given taken for the erection of a modest but lasting memorial of the great benefactress on the spot of the first scene of her labors, and is still the chief scene of that great work which Providence employed her zeal and devotedness in originating. Nano Nagle, while she scattered blessings upon many thousands of her kind, gave to her own person a wondrous example of

THE SANCTITY AND SELF-ANNIHILATION OF THE CHRISTIAN.

The closing years of her life were spent in the practice of self-denial religious perfection, and her death was a worthy of her life. She died in the Convent of the Presentation, bequeathing to her spiritual daughters their most precious inheritance, her example. With long white hair bowed by her sweetness

THE LAST WISH.

This is all; is it much, my darling? You must follow
Your path to the—
Have a head for its couches windings, a hand for its needle's eyelet;
The one will attire, the flowers will bloom, though my corpse mid them all is cold.
I would not have your dear loving eyes should light in their joy no more
Only lest for the sake of the happy past, and the golden days that have been.
By the love we have lived, and the hopes we have hoped, you will have my grave kept green?

Just a moment in the morning, to the sugar dash of the day.
To plant some creeping seed posehance, or train the white rose spray?
Just a moment made my visions from the glare of the miserable sun,
Just a tear and a prayer in the gloaming, ere you leave me with lingering feet.
Ah! it is weak and foolish, but I think that in God's heaven,
I shall know, and love to know, mine own, that you
Keep my grave so green.

I would fain, when the drops are pleading against your window pane,
That you should be thinking wistfully of my grassy mound on the wold;
That when the winter veil is spread over the fair
white world below,
Your tender hands twine the holly evasins that mark
my rest in the snow.
My clasp on life and life's rich gifts grows faint and cold, I wean,
Yet oh! I would hold it to the last—the trust of my grave kept green.

Because it is by such little signs the heart and its faith are read!
Because the material man most shrink ere he joins the fleeting dead;
The heaven I hope is bright and pure, and calm is the ocean there—I trow,
Yet the human love clings yearningly to all it has prized the here.
We have been so happy, darling, and the parting
pang is sore,
Ah! soothe it by this last vow to me—you will watch that my grave keeps green",

The Song and the Singer.

It was during the early days of the great French Revolution of 1789, when a young officer in delicate health took up his quarters in the city of Marseilles for the six months of his leave of absence. It seemed a strange retirement for a young man, for in this town he knew no one, and in the depth of winter Marseilles was no tempting residence. The officer lived in a garret looking out upon the street, which had for its sole furniture a harpsichord, a bed, a table and a chair. Little but paper ever entered that apartment, where food and fresh wood were scarce; and yet the young man generally remained in doors all day assiduously writing, or rather doing something on paper, an occupation he alternated with music.

Thus passed many months. The young man grew thinner and paler, and his eyes of absence appeared likely to bring no contentment. But he was handsome and interesting, despite the sallow hue. Long hair, full, beaming eyes that spoke of intelligence, and even gentleness, frankness of manner, all prepossessed in his favor, and many a careful look of kindness came to him from beautiful eyes that he noticed not nor cared to notice. In fact, he rarely went out but at night, and then to walk down by the beaming sea, which made a bridal of music he seemed to love. Sometimes, it is true, he would hang about the theatre door, when operas were being played, and look with longing eye within; but he never entered; either his purse or his inclination failed him. But he always exchanged with care the same of the piece and the author, and then walked away to the seashore, to muse and meditate.

Shortly after his arrival in Marseilles he visited, one after another, all the music sellers and publishers in the town, with a bundle of manuscripts in his hand; but his reception was apparently by no means flattering, for he left them all with a frowning air, and still with his bundle of manuscript. Some had declined him a long time, as if estimating the value of the goods he offered for sale; but those who were the most tempted thus the others to try the saleable character of the commodity. The house he lodged in had attached to it a large garden. By permission of the landlord the young man often selected the long evening walks, and, despite the cold, would sometimes sit and muse in a rude and field bower under the wall at one of the gables. Here he would occasionally sing, in a low tone, some of his own composition, as if he happened once or twice that when he did so a female head protruded from a window above him, seeming to listen. The young man at length noticed this.

"Pardon, lady," said he one evening; "perhaps I disturb you?"

"Not at all," she replied, "I am fond of music very, very fond, and the sound of it here is new to me. Pray, if not a rude question, whose are they?"

"Mine," he replied, diffidently, "they are my own."

"Indeed?" cried the lady with animation, "and you have never published them?"

"I shall never try—oprun," he murmured, uttering the last word in low and despairing tone, which, however, reached the ears of the young woman.

"Good night, sleeper," she said she and she closed the window. The composer sighed, rose and went out to take his usual walk and to his seat beneath; there, before the grandeur and sublimity of the ocean, and amid the murmur of its bellowing waves, to forget the cares of the world, of love and his friendless exile—the days of glory and success—the day-dream of all superior minds—a dream for oftener a punishment than a reward; for of those who sigh for fame, few indeed are successful.

Scarcely had he left the house than a lady hastened in a cloak and hood unseen it, and after a somewhat lengthened conference with the concierge descended to his room and remained there about an hour. At the end of that time she vanished. It was midnight when the composer returned. He entered with difficulty, the Cerberus of the lodge being asleep, and ascended to his wretched room. He sat ish it littered and dirty, without light, fire or food. To his surprise, a casket lines and it, placed beneath the door. He opened it, not without alarm, and found his apartment neatly ordered, a fire burning, a lamp, and on the table a supper, the young man stared, and looked slavish at the scene.

"Who dares thus insult my poverty? It is not enough that I am starving with cold and hunger, that I am refused by the world as a useless and wretched thing, incapable of wielding either sword or pen, but I must be insulted by charity! Fire light and food, all sent to me by one who knows my necessity! And yet, who can it be? Perhaps my mother may have discovered my retreat. Who else should have sent them? My mother, I bless thee for your fond action and for respecting my concealment!"

And the invalid officer sat down to the most hearty meal he had eaten for weeks. He had felt keen because his friends wholly disapproved of his making music a profession, and wished him to employ his love of eloquence in writing another oration. His mother so pressed him, that he saw no resources but a soldier's lot, chance—a retreat. For two months a grave of the fugitive had been seen—two months spent in vain efforts to make his chosen career support him; and now, doubtless, his mother had found him out, and had taken this delicate way of respecting his secrecy and punishing his pride.

Next morning the young man awoke with an appetite unknown to him of late. The generous food of the previous night had restored his system, and brought him to a natural state. Luckily, sufficient wine and bread remained to satisfy his cravings, and then he sat down to think. All his efforts to get his music sung, or played, or published had been vain. Singers knew him not, publishers declared him unknown, and the public seemed doomed never to hear him, because they never have heard him; a logical conclusion over injurious to young beginners in literature, poesy, music, and all the liberal arts. But he was determined to have one more trial. Having eaten, he dressed and went out in the direction of the shop of the Citizen Dupont, a worthy and excellent man who in his day had published more music, bad and good, than a musician could have payed in a lifetime.

"You have something new, then, citoyen?" said Dupont, after the usual preliminaries, and after apologizing to a lady within his office for hearing her exhibit "As my time is precious, pray pay it at once, and sing it if you will."

The young man sat himself at the harpsichord, which adorned the shop, and began at once to sing "A Song of the Army of the Rhine." The music publisher listened with the knowing air of one who is not to be deceived, and which his head and body continued ended.

"Diough—crude—but clever. Young man, you will, I doubt not, do something good one of these days; but at present, I am sorry to say, your efforts are but finish, pollish."

The singer rose, and bowing, left, in a shop, despair at his heart. He had not a son in the world; his rent was in arrear, He knew not how to dine that evening, unless, indeed, his mother came again to his aid—and all he was very unwilling to receive, the soul impugned from it, for he had parted from her to anger. His mother was a lyrical poet as well as a republican, and after numerous parleys with himself, the young man ascended to his room with a heavy parcel. His eyes was wild, his cheek pale, his whole countenance as he passed the door his was handed a ticket for the opera by his concierge.

"Citoyen!," said the composer, in a low, hasty tone, "let me want my plat."

Having gained the room, the unhappy and misguided young man sat silent and motionless for some hours, a victim of hunger, despair, and his dreamy visions, he drives every calm and good thought from his head, and then he dared quietly proceed to carry out his dreadful and desperate intent. He closed carefully the window, stuffed his mattress up the chimney and with a paper stopped every aperture where air could enter. Then he drew forth from his parcel charcoal and a burner, and lit it. Thus had the wretched man determined to end his sufferings. He had made his last effort, and now, in despair of success, himself garret, he laid him down to die; and poverty and misery, genius and death, have been bridal guests.

Meanwhile, amid a blaze of light, the evening's entertainment was held in the theatre. A new opera from Paris was to be played; and the prima donna was the young, lovely, and worshipped Claudine, the Jenny Lind of that time and place. The house was crowded, and the first act successful. Then the curtain fell, and the audience were in ecstasy.

"She is a jewel," said M. Dupont, who from a private box admired the great supporter of his theater. A roar of applause from the pit delighted at this compliment to good man's ears. Claudine, called before the curtain, was bowing to the audience. Suddenly she looked as though she would lose just signed to the orchestra to play. The audience in verse M. Dupont rubs his hands, and repeats twice between his teeth, "this is jaws!" with awe and rapidity the bard is commenced playing an enthusiastic air, and the impatient M. Dupont is sending up with a strange and wild look. Hushed and still was every breath: the audience looked at each other; not a word of communication takes place; men shudder or rather tremble with emotion. Then the first verse is sung, and then a fraught shout, a starting of all to their feet, and a storm of delight, a wild strain of rapturous thundering the chorus, showed how the song has electrified them

Sound, you mellow ears my grateful song.

Just a moment in the morning, in the eager dash of the day,
To place some creeping weed purchance, or train it with thine spray;
Just a minute to divide my visions from the glare of the noontide heat,
Just a hour and a prayer in the gloaming, are 70 hours' work and its lingering feet.
All I ask, and look for, but I think that is God the gracious,
Is to keep my grass a-green.

I would fain, when the drops are plashing sadly on your window pane,
Think that they should be thinking wistfully at my grave not in the rain;
That the dear therein shown when the schedule-tion expires.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for negligence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the idea that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

BRITISH POLICY TOWARDS IRELAND.

We may argue as long as we please against the practicability of the Fenian plan for bettering the condition of Ireland, and we may censure as heavily as we like the spirit displayed in some of their public proceedings, but the fact remains that the British policy towards Ireland at the present moment gives a coloring of justification to all that have been done or intend to do. The Parliamentary plan adopted by the Home Rulers takes for granted there is such fairness and love of justice in the English mind that, when it has been set reluctantly proven certain grievances exist in Ireland, Parliament will take steps to remedy them. It does no blood and but little treasure to make speeches in the hall of St. Stephens, and if the wrongs of Ireland could be righted in this way all sensible people would instantly adopt it. But we fear some of the Home Rule chiefs have too high an idea of British chivalry and magnanimity. Known facts do not show that English members of Parliament are in the slightest anxious to do justice to Ireland, even upon the most simple demonstration of cause of complaint, but rather indicate that they have a contempt for Ireland, and do not want to be annoyed by any grievance whatever. During the present session of Parliament Home Rule measures brought forward several bills which had the hearty indorsement of all classes of their constituency—we need only specify two, Mr. Butt's Land bill and Mr. Meldon's Parliamentary Franchise bill—and they were all rejected with scant courtesy or formality. No person doubts for an instant that, if Ireland had a legislature of her own, these measures would be passed by great majorities. None of them concerned England, or affected Imperial interests; they were for Ireland and demanded by Irishmen; yet they were without exception rejected because they did not agree with the ideas of Englishmen. So it is practically established that no matter how closely any reform may be identified with the welfare of Ireland, no matter how unanimous Irishmen may be in seeking it, the good-will and pleasure of Englishmen shall dictate whether it is granted or withheld.

GRATTAN laid down the law for one nation to be dependent upon the will of another was slavery. Patriots all over the world will indorse his sentiments, and judged by that standard Ireland is enslaved. As long as human nature is unchanged, men of spirit will not remain passive under treatment like this. They may approve the Home Rule programme, but they must know it cannot be carried on indefinitely. There must come a time when an end will be put to petitioning and speech-making which bear no fruit. Insurrection may be desperate and hopeless as it seems to day in Ireland, but brave men will prefer to take the chances rather than remain the sport of alien legislators. Talk to them of the battalions of their enemies, of cannon and cavalry, of the helplessness of undisciplined masses, and they will only reply that a just cause counts for something, and that the battle is not always with the strong. The Home Rule movement has not yet had, however, its full development. It has not been proved that it is doomed to be a failure. Patriots who are prudent and cautious will still prefer giving it their support to encouraging any attempt at rebellion, which under actual circumstances cannot be successful. But weak as Ireland may be, it would be foolishness for England to provoke her hostility. The outlook for the British Empire is not so promising that Queen VICTORIA can afford to make enemies of five and a half millions of a gallant and soldierly race. These things are the best reliance of the Home Rulers and not British love of justice.

O'DONNELL'S Zoological Gardens, at San José, are now open to the public, and will well repay a visit from the lovers of nature and art. The price of admission is merely nominal, and the proceeds will be devoted to adding new attractions to the museum and grounds.

PIPER'S EXPOSE.

We have received a copy of a speech on "The Impolicy of Government Subsidies to Railroads" delivered by Hon. WILLIAM A. PIPER in the House of Representatives in Washington, on 8th April, and read it through carefully and attentively. Such a high idea have we formed of its force, logic and lucidity that we must say we should like to see a copy of it in the hands of every intelligent voter in the State of California. A great deal has been said and written about the iniquities of the Union Pacific Railroad with its Credit Mobilier, and of the Central Pacific Railroad with its Contract and Finance Company; but, beyond vague idea that the country has been swindled and the people plundered by them, few persons have the slightest notion about the nature of their operations. To the vast majority of citizens it is just a profound mystery how half a dozen individuals who started in to build a great railroad with next to nothing in their pockets could become the possessors of untold wealth within ten or twelve years. Mr. PIPER, however, thoroughly understands, all the tricks and devices by which the great swindle has been accomplished, and he has the clearness to explain it in a way that can be easily comprehended by the dullest intellect. He does not trouble us with long rows of figures, nor weary us with dry statistics, nor fire us with pages of oratorical declamation. In a few well-chosen words, simply put together, he sketches the career of these gigantic swindling corporations, just as an artist with sweeping strokes of a charcoal pencil strikes out on his canvas the figures which his brush will afterwards make glow with life.

The story he tells is all but incredible; indeed, without the support of unquestionable facts and figures it would be incredible, and the moral he teaches is that it is impolitic to the highest degree for the Government of this country to squander the people's money and the people's land upon the promotion of the commercial speculations of private individuals. There is no reasonable doubt that the trans-continental railway was a great benefit to the trade of the United States; but it had all the elements of a successful venture, and in due course of time it would have been built, without costing the nation a cent.

In another column we publish Bulletin's correspondence summarizing Mr. PIPER'S scathing attack upon the monstrous Sanitlian claim, which has been one of the most grievous nuisances ever endured by the people of San Francisco. It is very interesting to the citizens who have houses upon the lands comprised in the spurious "claim," and who will be well pleased to learn how thoroughly the assertions made some time ago by this journal have been exposed. We are happy to see that Mr. PIPER is making an excellent record for himself and earning the gratitude of his constituents. It is an incalculable advantage to San Francisco to have a representative in Washington who is so conversant with the requirements, who is thoroughly devoted to its interests, and who is far removed from the faintest suspicion of corruption or partisanship.

A DISTINGUISHED VISITOR.

San Francisco is soon to be honored with the presence of a real live Emperor. As yet there is no great flutter apparent in our quasi-aristocratic circles about the important event, and the chances consequently are that when the distinguished visitor arrives he will be less annoyed with obtrusive civilities than he was in New York. If our city and State authorities would only let Dom Pedro alone, and not pester him with receptions, addresses and such stupid formalities, no doubt he would be very much obliged to them, and enjoy himself just as well. Had its wanted recognition of his rank he would not have chosen to come to this country as a private individual; but would have announced himself as "Emperor of all the Brazils." The quiet yet effectual way in which he disposed of the pretensions to dayship of the New York fashionaries ought to be a lesson to our local magnates how to conduct themselves when he reaches San Francisco. We cannot imagine with what consistency American—who are constantly boasting of the excellence of republican institutions, and to some extent to think that no people can really be free without them—can display such anxiety to honor one who represents monarchical, if not despotic, principles of government.

But we must remember that notwithstanding all the receptions, parades, addresses and presentations with which Dom Pedro may be honored, it some worthless fellow were to start a revolution in Brazil, and declare he wanted to establish a republic, the sympathies of nine-tenths of the people of the United States would be with him. They would be just as impulsive and illogical in this as they are now in letting the Emperor. They never stop to think that the same system of government cannot possibly suit every nation, and that, therefore, any republican, which is such a success here, might be a failure and a very decided nuisance elsewhere. Dom PEDRO is the ruler of the only portion of South America that has made substantial progress, maintained the integrity of its institutions and won the respect of the world. In that capacity, and as a return for the kindness shown by him to California's pioneers who visited his dominions, he is entitled to a hearty welcome and a generous hospitality from us; but it should be borne in mind that all he asks is to be treated as a gentleman. Let our officials and wealthy citizens show they well understand what that is, and they will reflect credit upon San Francisco.

IN MEMORIAM MICHAEL MOORE

As the career of Michael Moore, whose decease was announced in last week's MONITOR, was distinguished in various ways from the lot of common men, it will be fitting to sketch it briefly. When the full record of the fidelity, devotion and sacrifice laid on the altar of Irish liberty is made out, his name shall not be forgotten. Born in the city of Dublin, in 1839, of Wexford parents, he grew up a rebel. He flung himself with enthusiasm into the revolutionary organization which James Stephens had originated in 1858, and which some years ago promised to set the Green above the Red. He took the steps necessary to enable him to discharge a soldier's duty on the battle field. The study of military matters was indeed the only study to which he ever devoted much attention. When the road to Irish freedom seemed plain and straight, and beset with no danger that Irish heroism could not overcome, when the Fenians of America had pledged themselves to give their brothers at home the needful arms and other material aid; when hope was flashing in the skies, and treachery seemed called on to prepare for the supreme moment in which British despotism should go down in a sea of blood, he was not found at his post. Though possessed of means sufficient to reconcile beyond a doubt any weakly carnilage as a blackamith, and though quite young when he entered the I. R. B., his earnestness and enthusiasm soon attract a large number around him. Imparting the knowledge he had acquired, he most successfully ran a drill room in Dublin almost under the very eyes of the police; and when the funeral procession conveying the remains of Terence B. McManus moved on its way to Glasnevin, his "company" it was which was ordered to head the column following the hearse.

Soon after this he came to the United States, with the intention of entering the army for the purpose of reducing his military knowledge to stern practice, so that he might at length the more effectually strike a blow for Ireland. From this project he was dissuaded by John O'Mahony, who thought that the cause could be better advanced by his services at home. O'Mahony wrote in this effect to Stephens. Never at any time weighing his personal interests in the balance, where anything calculated to promote the welfare of Ireland was concerned, he received the decision of his superior officer as final, and early in 1863 returned to Dublin. He resumed his old work of organizing, drilling and otherwise instructing a circle of the I. R. B. Taking all the circumstances into account, it required more than an ordinary man to recruit a circle (or regiment) eleven hundred strong, to win their confidence and keep it—as kept it he did to the day of his arrest—to inspirit the drooping and check the impurdent, to partially arm his men and have them always ready, to run drill rooms without exciting suspicion, to act in such a manner as to earn the esteem and confidence of the chief officers of the I. R. B., and to do the hundred other things which he did so well in 1863, '64 and '65. He was peculiarly fitted by a happy mixture of caution and boldness, prudence and intrepidity, to be a revolutionary propagandist; and, if the expected struggle had come on, he would no doubt have proved himself an able executive officer. Whether work was assigned him to do he did well; and the only regret we have in that respect is that the great work which he longed to help in doing is yet to be done, and not likely to be done soon.

Neither Stephens nor Moore believed in the Pike except when no better weapon might be at hand; but as the Fenians of New York had promised to establish in the right time depots of arms at various points of Ireland (a thing they haven't done yet), and as pikes would be useful in enabling men to reach the deposits, it was considered to manufacture them to a certain extent. In Dublin this business was intrusted to Moore. His men and himself hammered out thousands of pikes which were distributed at the proper time. In the midst of the organizing and pike making, he yet found, like Michael Dwyar when on outlaw in Wicklow, time to get married. In one of the many raids made upon the grand smash of the I. R. B.; the Irish People office was seized, and Luby, Rosses, Rourke, Moore and many others were arrested. They came in for hard trials, and those speeches from the dock which reflected so much credit on the prisoners. Apart altogether from what might be regarded as the views of partial critics, the Dublin Nation pronounced the demeanor, tone and language of Michael Moore to be second to none in dignity and spirit. Being sentenced to ten years' penal servitude, he was taken off, handcuffed to Rossa, to the fore batch sent to Portsmville. His wanderwards made acquainted with the quarries of Portland. Thence he was sent to the penal colony of West Australia, the hot sands of which appeared to injure his health materially, so that after his release he could not follow his trade except with difficulty. After four years of torture came release; and in January, 1870, he came to New York with some other fellow-exiles, he arrived in San Francisco.

For a year or two he was, apparently, as full of life and vigor, energy and enthusiasm as ever. But he soon began to undergo the hardships of penal servitude. For a time he was sanguine in his expectations that the disasters which had befallen the Irish revolutionary movement might be retrieved; but as hope after hope of early action was quenched, and as each new organization proved the inefficiency of its predecessor, his spirits drooped, and he gradually lost the traits that first distinguished him. He frequently said that, as he had no longer anything worth living for, he would not long survive. For some months past, he had been in a poor state of health, evidently declining, but always rallying when over old friends were encountered. No serious apprehensions were, however, entertained till a few days before his death. Hemorrhage of the lungs then confined him to bed, and eventually carried him off. He died calmly as an infant, in presence of his wife and little son, and some sorrowing friends.

His remains were brought from Oakland to Irish Confederation Hall of this city, where during Sunday and Monday they were paid all the marks of respect which the affection of his brother nationalists could render. The funeral was most respectable, being attended by Irishmen of all classes. All his fellow-prisoners and such other I. R. B. men as were in or near San Francisco had the melancholy satisfaction of tendering their last tribute to the remains of as true a patriot as ever Ireland produced. While his few defects may be forgotten, his virtues — and they were many—shall be affectionately remembered. May the sod lie lightly on his bosom, and may the seasons in their course bring germs of worth and truth, patriotism and fidelity, be fruitful. He died in the peace of the Church, and let us hope his soul is in heaven.

HUGH DEL MORTE.

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION IN THE CONVENT OF MERCY.—On Monday afternoon three young ladies received the religious habit in the Convent of Our Lady of Mercy on Vallejo street. The ceremony, which was performed by Rev. Father Gibney, was attended by quite a number of the friends of the institution. The Rev. Father delivered in his usual very instructive and interesting discourse on the necessity of attending to the "one thing necessary," which all must acknowledge can be much more easily done in religion than in the world. The young ladies assumed the names of Sisters Mary Gonzaga, Bertrand and Euphasia.

WITHOUT more information than that afforded by the brief telegraphic dispatches, we decline to make any comment upon the collision which took place recently in Limerick between the Revolutionists and Home Rulers. There is usually a great amount of exaggeration in the first accounts of such disturbances which reach this country. We may instance the report of the disorder during the O'Connell centenary procession, which was magnified into a tremendous riot, and yet was so insignificant that not one out of every twenty process slonists knew such a thing had taken place until they read about it next morning.

THIS promises to be a year of plenty in California. Advices from all portions of the State are to the effect that the grain crop will be unprecedentedly large; but notwithstanding the immense prospective yield, our farmers can look forward to good prices, as the immigration which has already set in prevailed in the Eastern States and nearly all over the continent of Europe, will reduce the average crops there one-half, and they will require all the grain we can spare them.

WE acknowledge the courtesy of a complimentary ticket for the lunch grand dramatic entertainment and ball to be given at Platt's Hall, Wednesday evening, April 26th, by the San Francisco Literary and Dramatic Society, the object of which is to aid in forming a library. We trust a right pleasant time will be had by all who attend and hope that the pecuniary result will be satisfactory.

WE direct the attention of our readers to the admirable lists of "Publications Received" which will be found on one of the inside pages of the present issue. Coming from such a man it possesses great force, and it must be a severe blow to the secularist party.

DIVISION No. 8, A. O. H.—Also election held on Tuesday evening, 18th inst., the following officers were elected to serve for the ensuing year: President, John Sheehy; Vice-President, Daniel J. Daley; Recording Secretary, Thomas Flynn; Financial Secretary, W. M. Gillespie; Treasurer, Patrick Canavan.

A CHANCE FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.—The approaching harvest throughout California promises to be of unusual magnitude. In this valley we will have an unprecedented one, and the yield will run over one hundred bushels to the acre. Such an immense crop will require a large force to harvest it to. Calculating that there will be about one thousand bushels to the harvest men, Besides these there will be required a force of about 200 men for binding on the low land, where the grain is very heavy. This valley will therefore require say 500 harvest hands and 200 binders. Where can we get good, reliable men to do the work? This is a opportunity for the order of the Caucasians to take such a matter in hand, and procure and furnish hands to the farmers for the harvest.—Solinas Record.

A RIOT IN LIMERICK.—Limerick, April 17.—The Home Rule demonstration took place here to-day, and terminated in a riot entailing serious results. The Bishop of Limerick headed the demonstration. After the delivery of addresses, &c., the procession was formed and the line of march through the principal streets taken up. It was met and attacked by a large party of Nationalists. Both parties were armed with clubs, etc. A desperate fight ensued, in which forty persons were seriously injured. Several will probably die. Many others sustained slight injuries and bruises. The police finally restored quiet.

We understand that the saleswoman in the millinery store of M. A. Butler, 24 Montgomery street, are kept constantly employed in exhibiting the large and varied stock of the latest styles of millinery goods, which speaks well for the popularity of the house.

AT our request, Cragin & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., have promised to send any of our readers a sample of Dobbins' Electric Soap to try, and as such.

A SPLENDID stylish suit can be got from Kenny & Sheehan, at their new store, 101 Market street, Nucleus Building.

Rossa's Skirmishing Fund.

From the Irish Liberator.

PARIS, March 27, 1876.—SIR: It is with great pain I feel forced to speak out on a matter which most nearly concerns the honor of the Fenians and especially my old Fenian friends and associates. All speech on this subject is exceptionally difficult, but I believe that absolute silence on my part would be in a measure criminal.

I hardly know exactly how to enter on the matter in your columns; I am not a lawyer and cannot say in what exact is it is permissible to quote Rossa's words, or to describe what he means, even though I do so merely to repudiate his schemes (or dream) with something like horror. I say something like horror, for what is horrible in the plan is somewhat relieved by an almost strong element of the grotesque. I don't know that I can do anything better than give the heading of Rossa's letter to the New York Irish World. Here it is: "A number of Skirmishers must keep striking at England year after year, while the revolutionary organizations prepare for the heavier work." In the body of the letter he goes on to talk generally of blowing up everything—cities, castles, barracks, etc.

What is any sane man to make out of all this? I have not the least reason to believe that any man of the slightest consequence among the avowed nationalists, and one, in any way shares in these preposterous notions of Rossa, and I know that men more than competent to judge, will call he a compass, as Mr. Sephaus and Mr. Devoy, unmeasurably ridiculous. Of the likes of O'Mahony, Mr. Luby, Mr. Kickham, I can have no moral doubt, though I have not the honor of their personal acquaintance with them. As to myself, I find it very hard to express my feelings strongly enough on the subject. I am ashamed to use the wounding those of my friend Rossa, who have personally suffered [illegible] while I hope I am as ready as most men to risk life, I have a rather strong idea that one held dear in the cause of Ireland, there is one thing which I will not risk, much less throw away for Ireland, and that is my honor. When two nations are at war it is not easy to say what acts are or are not justifiable, but in the case of peace, as in case of violence, such as destruction of life or property, are simply crimes, and the man who commit these crimes serve not the cause they misrepresent, but the cause of the enemy, and give him a most obedient servant.

JOHN O'LEARY.

P. S.—I had written the above before I saw the last Irishman. Rossa declares he has not said a word about burning English towns. His whole scheme is beyond my comprehension. I have no doubt, however, as to what all the real friends of Ireland in this case, I want to have it clearly understood that I do not mean to have myself, set or part in the burning of cities, towns, barracks (by dynamite, or anything else), while Ireland is not in open insurrection against her foes. I cannot, of course, now pretend to say what I mean to do if Ireland is in arms, but I know what I do what he seems to mean; but I fear very much there are some others who might. I am sorry to have to say this, but I feel it (which is, perhaps, very little) to guard against.

Good Advice.

Archbishop Croke, of Cashel, has recently delivered to the Christian Brothers of his diocese, attached to his cathedral in Thurles, an exhortation and commendation which should stir up zealous recruits for that noble brotherhood wherever it exists. Unhappily it is not supported in America as it ought to be. Where hundreds belong to it, thousands and hundreds of thousands should work under the banner of St. Vincent. For the benefit of those who do not know of the Archbishop's address:

"If I never did any good act save this one—never any good work save being instrumental in the formation of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in this parish, I would be proud of the reflection that I did a good work." Then repeating the history of the St. Vincent de Paul Society in the first establishment in Paris in 1833, pointing out the thousand and one ways by which its members could do good—the power of consolation to the poor, their solicitude for the suppression of crime, their watchful care of the poor little ragged men, that they may be sent to school—in fine, the examples of their own life which would induce others to do the like for love of the Lord, the Archbishop continued: "It is not the priest alone who has to care for the salvation of souls. You may say such a person is a drunkard, such a person is a blasphemer, but what can I do with him? It is the priest who should look after him, it is the priest who should endeavor to put down the evil—should suppress the crime. I say you should as so, my brethren, in an army great and small, it is the glory or victory only a consideration for the general's, colonels and captains? Are they not also to be? Yes, my brethren, it is their glory and their duty to fight the battle which enables them to hold aloft the banner of victory; and it is true, dearly beloved brethren, that the duties of priests and people, and the bishop, that you will effect your purpose only when you are united in the good work you have so well begun; and therefore I am so glad to have you, brethren of St. Vincent de Paul Society—one of the best societies in the world. If there were no other reason why I should be glad to see you, the holy society, but that it was established in France ought not to be a sufficient reason for its existence for its Catholicity, where the first student was received and educated in the seminary in the good school as now so punishable with death? Yes, we should love France, the country that gave us the Society, and the priesthood. The first people could never forget France. He could never forget her kindness to Ireland, and seriously wish her freed from the neck of the ruthless tyrant."

DISASTROUS FLOODS IN MISSOURI.—Chicago, April 18.—The levee near Hannibal, Missouri, broke yesterday, and over 1,000 acres of the finest lands in the State of one hundred and millions of dollars worth of property destroyed. Thousands of dollars worth of cord wood and fencing, and hundreds of logs and rafts are floating down. Several hundred head of horses, cattle, sheep and hogs that were grazing on the bottoms have been drowned, and the supposition is that they are all drowned. The water has already interfered with the running of the railroad, and at many points the tracks are entirely washed out. The steam ferry Quincy is twenty miles wide, and the fall on the river is over ten miles wide. When the levee broke the people fled to the bluffs, and it is not yet certain that all escaped to places of safety.

THE WORST YET.

Ex-Attorney-General Williams Implicates the President.

NEW YORK, April 19.—A special to the Herald from Washington says important and trustworthy evidence directly implicating the President in the illegal and corrupt issue of the public money was taken to-day before the Committee on the Department of Justice, and it comes from no less a person than ex-Attorney-General Williams, and when in fact shields his illegal conduct behind the written order of the President. It involves the payment out of the Secret Service Fund, by order of Grant, of $32,000 to aid in carrying elections in the city of New York in 1871, 1872 and 1873. All of this money was paid to the notorious John J. Davenport, who was Chief Supervisor under the Enforcement Act, but who does not accept but it in a single instance as an officer of the government, but simply as John J. Davenport. In one instance he merely gives his own due bills for payments. The payments made to him for his official capacity are all duly receipted and audited in the Treasury Department, and are sworn to by Davenport. Attorney-General Williams says he was first called upon to pay Davenport $600 in 1871. He insisted on use the public money in that way, and called upon the President, who, after a brief conversation, ordered the payment by written order. In the fall of 1872, when the last Presidential election was held, $20,000 was ordered to be paid to Davenport, the Attorney-General testifying that the President assured him that the total order of the President before ordering over the money. Last fall $6,000 was paid, when Williams refused, and the money was not paid. Ex-Attorney-General Williams says he was appointed to the Supreme Court Bench, and that Grant was perfectly aware of the fact that he was about to resign the office of Attorney-General, and that he would not be responsible for the payment of any more money to Davenport. The Supreme Court has declared the claim unfounded, and the Philadelphia Land Association, on which the claim is based, has declared that they never owned. The generous offer was coupled with a request that the said Davenport is engaged in a great work by Congress for compensation. If the Trustees should succeed in establishing the validity of their gigantic title; and under this deceptive bill they hoped to lay the foundation of a claim against the Government for land, and that is my honor. When two nations are at war it is not easy to say what acts are or are not justifiable, but in the case of peace, as in case of violence, such as destruction of life or property, are simply crimes, and the man who commit these crimes serve not the cause they misrepresent, but the cause of the enemy, and give him a most obedient servant.

THE SANITLIAN CLAIM.

Its Fraudulent Character Exposed—Argument of Representative Piper.

Washington Correspondence of the Bulletin.

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1876.—The friends of the Bulletin were recently informed of the fact that Kelley's "Sanitlian bill" was making some progress in the House Committee on Private Land Claims, with a prospect of being favorably reported at an early day. Most of them will doubtless be gratified to learn that this prospect is not now so flattering. Representative Piper appeared before the committee this morning, and with a well-prepared argument and formidable array of facts bearing upon the case, dealt the claim some staggering blows from which it is hardly likely it will recuperate. The bill, it will be remembered, proposes to allow the Philadelphia Land Association of San Francisco" to represent the Sanitlian claimants to the Courts, and show by newly discovered evidence that it was a genuine and valid Mexican grant. It is provided, however, that the Association shall, as a pre-requisite condition, convey to the city of San Francisco all their right, title and interest in and to the lands embraced in the "Sanitlian grant" for the benefit of the owners and occupants.

The corporation now has a claim of $500,000 against the United States.

Mr. Piper handled the matter without gloves, and plunged right into it by asserting that the title of the proposition should be "A bill to encourage the subornation of perjury." This is drawn by Philadelphia lawyers, aided by San Francisco interlopers, and is a fraud. The Supreme Court had declared the claim unfounded, and the Philadelphia Land Association, which is based on it, had declared that they never owned. The generous offer was coupled with a request that the said Davenport is engaged in a great work by Congress for compensation. If the Trustees should succeed in establishing the validity of their gigantic title; and under this deceptive bill they hoped to lay the foundation of a claim against the Government for land, and that is my honor. THE CATHOLIC CENTENNIAL FOUNTAIN.

We have received from Philadelphia a chromo and a printed circular relative to the Centennial Fountain to be erected in Fairmount Park, under the auspices of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America. The design for the fountain is very elaborate and embraces statues of Father Mathew, Charles Carroll, Commodore Barry and Archbishop Carroll, and no doubt it would be a great ornament to the Exhibition grounds. The estimated cost is over $50,000, of which about half has been already collected. As it would be a pity and a reproach to leave the thing unfinished now, contributions are earnestly solicited by Rev. J. Beggs, Secretary of Centennial Fountain Committee, 242 North Front street, Philadelphia. All the total abstinence societies ought to respond cheerfully and liberally.

His Majesty Dom Pedro of Brazil, accompanied by the Empress and suite, attended divine service at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, at half-past ten o'clock, on Sunday. The Emperor and Empress were given seats in the sanctuary, within the railing. Solemn High Mass was celebrated, and Vicar-General Quinn, on behalf of Cardinal McCloskey, who is sick, welcomed their majesties to this country, and congratulated them upon their prosperous voyage. His prayed that the remainder of their journey may be equally auspicious and happy. A large crowd assembled in the outside and inside the church to catch a glimpse of the Imperial visitors. After After leaving the church they were driven through Central Park. In the evening his Majesty, accompanied by the Brazilian Minister, paid a visit to Moody's Hippodrome. They were given a seat beside the ravinetta, and were well bred enough to seem attentive and impressed. The Empress did not accompany him to the Hippodrome.

Hoped, you will have my grave kept in order.

Even a rumour in the morning, is the eager flesh of the day.
To pluck soon a creeping weed perchance, or train the white rose spray;
Just a moment to shade my violets from the glare of the ooncoming heat,
Just a text and a prayer in the gloaming, ere I leave but with lingering feet.
Ah! it is weak and foolish, but I think that in God there is mercy,
I shall know, and love to know, mine own, that I keep my grave so green.

I would fain, when the dews are pushing again the sweet primroses be thinking wistfully of my grave and in the rain;

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber owes find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for neglegence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small; our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a dollar would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

BRITISH POLICY TOWARDS IRELAND.

We may argue as long as we please against the impracticability of the Parnian plan for bettering the condition of Ireland, and we may censure as heavily as we like the spirit displayed in some of their public proceedings; but the fact remains that the British policy towards Ireland at the present moment gives a coloring of justification to all that they have done or intend to do. The Parliamentary plan adopted by the Home Rulers takes no ground but the barest fairness and love of justice in the English mind that, when it has been satisfactorily proven certain grievances exist in Ireland, Parliament will take steps to remedy them. It costs no blood and but little treasure to make speeches in the hall of St. Stephens, and if the wrongs of Ireland could be rightedin this way all sensible people would instantly adopt the plan. But we fear some of the Home Rule chiefs have too high an idea of British chivalry and magnanimity. Known facts do not show that English members of Parliament are at the slightest anxious to do justice to Ireland, even upon the most ample demonstration of cause of complaint, but rather indicate that they have a contempt for Ireland, and do not want to be annoyed by any grievances whatever. During the present session of Parliament Home Rule members brought forward several bills which had the beauty indorsement of Ad-vocates, but were promptly pooed town hall in Kingstown—137 feet, fronting the Royal Marine road—a term of 10c. per foot, on a 99 years' lease, provided a building approved by the Board of Works was erected, and the consent of Parliament obtained.

GALWAY.

The Galway Grand Jury have adopted the following resolution:—Resolved, That the Grand Jury request all the magistrates of petty sessions in or about this town to decline to certify for a ale-ar, for the conveyance of any prisoner, except a female or lunatic. That if a prisoner is unable to walk, a country cart be certified for and no other, the constabulary to march with their prisoners from one station to the nt. That a copy of this be sent to every magistrate in the county. Major Wilson Lynch seconded the resolution, which was adopted.

We deeply regret to record the death of Rev. Thomas Walsh, P. P. of Claregalway; which took place at the parochial house, Claregalway, on Sunday last. On occasion he was appointed parish priest of Rosmuck, where he labored assiduously for twenty-five years. It might be said that he found Rosmuck a wilderness, and left it an advanced state of civilization. He founded several schools, and seconded in driving out the proselytizers from his parish. He was removed to the parish of Claregalway a few years ago, where he labored with equal zeal up to the time of his death.

KERRY.

At the last Killorglin petty sessions, Mr. F. M. McGillicuddy, late major in the Kerry Militia, and petty sessions clerk at Killorglin, had Dr. R. Spottiswood summoned for using abusive and threatening language to the complainant, in the street of that town, on Sunday, the 17th of February. Several witnesses were examined in support of the prosecution, as were also several for the defence, whose evidence was to the effect that it was the complainant who brought the trouble on himself. The magistrates, after a lengthened hearing of the case, retired to their room, and on returning into court, the chairman (Mr. Rae) announced the decision of the bench, namely, that of fining the defendant £4 10s. and 10s costs, and ordered that he be bound to keep the peace towards the complainant for two years, himself in £50,and two sureties for £25 each.

KILDARE.

At the assizes at Kildare last week a police constable named Allwell was convicted of the robbery of £200. A farmer dropped it at Kildare and Allwell, the constable picked it up and put it in his pocket. When the man were suddenly searched a week after, he endeavored to get rid of it, but it was found without it could be stood. The severe sentence of five years' penal servitude was passed upon him by Baron Dowse.

At the Kildare assizes a young man named Doherty pleaded guilty to a charge of bigamy, but urged, in mitigation of sentence, that he had no affection for his wife who was much older than himself, and whom, he alleged, he had been forced to marry while underage. Both women were in court, and it appeared that he had on the second occasion improved on his choice of personal attractions; each of the women also had a baby in her arms. The youthful bigamist was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment.

KILKENNY.

In compliance with a requisition signed by every member of the corporation, the Mayor of Kilkenny has promised to convene a special meeting of that body for Wednesday last, to consider the best means of organising local aid in support of the Bait Destitution Committee, if there be any call for the requisition, "to organise subscriptions in this locality to compensate in some measure the last distinguished Irishman for his valuable services to his country." Among the signatories to the requisition are Edmund Smithwick, Esq., Aldermen and J. P. (first Mayor under the reformed corporation, Bait has since several times filled the civic chair); Messrs. Patrick Murphy, William O'Donnell, Daniel McCarthy and William Crosby, Aldermen; and Messrs. John Hogan, Moolan, A. McMahon, T. Shirley, A. Gibbon, ling, S. Morrice, H. Aylward, M. Brophy, M. Shortal and James Loughlin, own Councillors.

KINGS COUNTY.

The body of the young man, James McBrain, a shopkeeper in Ferbane, who suddenly disappeared four weeks ago, was found on Saturday floating in a mill dam.

A special meeting of the Tullamore board of Guardians was held a few days ago for the purpose of considering the propriety of acceding to a demand of increased salary for the workhouse chaplain. Notice at present paid for the land is £3 15s elect and the increase asked is £1 5s per acre. In the application the agent said that if the sum asked for was not paid proceedings for ejectment would be immediately taken. A proposal to send the whole correspondence to the Dublin Tenant Farmers' Association was withdrawn for the present.

LIMERICK.

At the petty sessions of Limerick last week Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe, Roman Catholic clergyman, and petty sessions clerk at Killorglin, had Dr. R. Spottiswood summoned for using abusive and threatening language to the complainant, in the street of that town, on Sunday, the 17th of February. Several witnesses were examined in support of the prosecution, as were also several for the defence, whose evidence was to the effect that it was the complainant who brought the trouble on himself. The magistrates, after a lengthened hearing of the case, retired to their room, and on returning into court, the chairman (Mr. Rae) announced the decision of the bench, namely, that of fining the defendant £4 10s. and 10s costs, and ordered that he be bound to keep the peace towards the complainant for two years, himself in £50,and two sureties for £25 each.

TIPPERARY.

A public meeting was held last week in the townland of Kille-nas, a few miles from Cookstown, county Tyrone, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament in favor of tenant-right, grand jury reform and vote by ballot in the election of members to represent divisions of the poor law boards The meeting was a very respectable and enthusiastic one.

WATERFORD.

Three young men named Ronayne, McDaniel and Nolan were drowned on Saturday night in Waterford harbor. A party of four had gone out in a boat to get some wild fowl, and it capsized in a squall. Only one of the four was saved.

At the Waterford assizes a Captain Winn was convicted of having sent a ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition. He was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

WEXFORD.

At a meeting of the Wexford grand Jury, last week, several members of the road to an item in the schedule for £83 5s. 1d., which was set down as being for extra police force. It appears that though the county is paying for four extra men, it is really eight sent. The grand jury agreed not to pass the presentment.

At the last meeting of the Board of Guardians of the Enniscorthy union Dr. Furlong called the attention of the Board to the case of Garret McCarthy, who was deported there last week from the Brownlow Hill union, Liverpool, altogether against his will, and on a representation that he labored under a sickness that will produce a permanent disability. The doctor states that he is only laboring under a small ulcer of the leg, and will be able to resume any ordinary duty in a few weeks. Garret McCarthy was born in Enniscorthy, but has not resided in the county for the last twenty-two years, fifteen of which he served in the 5th Dragoon Guards, and the remaining seven in different parts of England.

The Power of Kindness at a Bull Fight.

A Cadiz letter in the New York Ledger says: Notice had been posted on all the public places that on a certain day the bull fights of Seville would be introduced into the arena, and that, when he should have been goaded to the uttermost fury, a young girl would appear and reduce the animal to quiet subjection. The people of Cadiz had heard of "El Moro" as the most magnificent bull ever brought into the city, and as the town became known that the bull advertised was a peasant girl of Espara, who asked "El Moro"

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—A colony of Benedictine monks have just made a foundation in Scotland, after an absence of three hundred years.

—His remains and a lay-brother have just left Lyons for the perilous mission of Dahomey, Africa. A large number of people bade them farewell at the chapel of the African Missions. Salvete Aores martyrum.

—A Cathedral is in process of erection at Canton, China, which is to cost $3,000,000. It is reported that no other quite as magnificent and costly is to be erected at Pekin, and churches are springing up in nearly every important city in Chile.

—On Monday, March 27th, there was a solemn Office and High Mass celebrated in the church of St. Patrick in Wicklow for the eternal rest of Rev. Patrick O'Doherty, P. P., in the presence of a crowded, most respectable and deeply-impressed congregation. The Cardinal Archbishop presided.

—On Sunday, March 26, the Feast of St Joseph, the solemn and interesting ceremony of a reception took place in the Convent of Mercy, Galway. His Lordship the Bishop officiated, assisted by the Vicar General, Very Rev. P. Dooley, P. P. The young lady who had the happiness of receiving the white veil was Miss Kate J. Reid, eldest daughter of T. J. Esq., Wood quay House, Galway.

—The death is announced of Rev. William McMullen, P. P., Ardglass, aged 59 years. Father McMullen was a native of the parish of Kilmegan, near Castlewellan, and after receiving a preparatory education he entered Maynooth College, where he was successful, and after the usual courses of theology he was ordained in 1841. His first mission was to the parish of Lisburn as curate under the late Rev. Bernard Dornan.

Grant's Boom.

There is abundant cause and proof to justify the President's impeachment and conviction, without going beyond the case of Babcock. As Gantism is doomed to disgrace and defeat next November, it is a question of expediency only, whether the remedy provided by the Constitution for high crimes and mis-demeanors should be applied to him. Judge Durrell sought to escape impeachment by resignation of the office he has abused and discredited. The Judiciary Committee, headed by Ben Butler, held that he was still amenable to trial, but that was not the time for such trouble, as he was powerless for further mischief.

The developments of Grant's conduct in regard to Babcock's trial are astounding, and show a disregard of law and decency which shocks the public mind. Mr. Pierrepont has testified that the instructions to the District Attorneys, virtually forbidding immunity to Sheva's evidence, were prepared by the President's order, and without any conference with the prosecuting officers of the Government. The effect of that order was to embarrass the prosecution of the Whisky Ring at St. Louis, Chicago and Milwaukee, and that was undoubtedly its intention.

Bell, the detective, who formerly served as Grant's scout in the army, and who was first recommended by him for a place in the Attorney-General's office, and then in the Interior Department, swore without being contradicted in any way, that Grant desired him to spy out the secrets of the District Attorney's office, and to report as to the probable guilt or innocence of Babcock upon the testimony there filed away. This brazen-faced method of "looking into his bans."

Colonel Dyer swore before the Committee of War Expenditures that Fox, one of Grant's friends, had declared to him that the President informed of the proceedings in regard to Babcock's indictment, the action of the attorneys against him, and the inclinations of the jury. These secret communications were received by Grant with a faint shudder that Fox had violated his oath, and that he himself was a party to an outrage upon the law which he had sworn to see faithfully executed.

These three sets would be sufficient to impeach Grant. He interfered with the course of justice, through Parrepont, to exculpate his crony against Babcock; he employed a spy at the public expense to search the District's Attorney's office; and he connived with a member of the Grand Jury to influence the action of the inquest. It is bad boss politics to arraign Andrew Johnson on any part of those charges, or on flagrant corruption such as Grant has openly countenanced; he has not stained his hands, or, no human power could have prevented the conviction. As it was, he was barely saved in the Senate by the influence of the honesty of six Republican Senators.

No longer Presidential candidate to defy public opinion, violate law, trample on propriety and protect rascality, as Grant has done during the last seven years, with the consent and co-operation of the party which he has prostituted with shocking cynicism. The Shepherds, Spencers, Sawyers, Caseys, Wests, McDonalds, Joyces, Babcocks, Kilbournes, Longs, and that pleasing and precious crew of adventurers and rogues, were and still are among his intimate friends and political confidants. Their only counsels, heated with whiskey and jobbery, were employed in the advice of the best and wisest Senators and Representatives. They have practically shaped the policy of the party and influenced its measures in Congress.

If or few months more Grant will be shorn of his power, and he must then drop dishonored among the companions he has sought out in his corrupt and low career. There is no future for him after he is ejected from the Presidency, but a return to his old associates in St. Louis, from which he was ennobled by the war. As a public man his career will soon be ended, and he will go into exile with his laurels as a soldier irreparably tarnished, and his obscene fame as the most hopelessly degraded by the love of Bess Sheppard and his cronies.—New York Sun.

Dragging Out Existence.

The nervous, weakly invalid does not enjoy life, but merely "drags out existence," as he phrases it. Unfitted for the active pursuits of life, and incapable of partaking of its pleasures, to which health alone can give a zest; disinclined to social intercourse, and a prey to melancholy, the valetudinarian becomes a burden to himself. There is nothing in all this that cannot be remedied by that genial alterative tonic and nervine, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which promptly overcomes dyspepsia, nervous system, and overcomes those bodily irregularities of which nervous weakness is more frequently attributable. Diseases of the kidneys and bladder, impurities of the blood and malarious fevers are also sources of debility. They eradication however, by this genial restorative, which also remedies rheumatism, a disorder of certainly of the same character. The Bitters are also unrivaled and prevent fever and ague and other debilitating febrile complaints of a malarial country.

WHILE waiting for a cough to go away, you are often laying the foundation for consumption and bronchial affection. It is better to get rid of a cold at once by using that sure remedy Dr. D. Jayne's Expectorant, which will cure it more speedily and readily, and relieve you of all anxiety in distressing consequences. Lease & Brigham San Francisco, wholesale agents.

That Skirmishing Fund.

It is with a vast ocean of relief and a degree of gratification it takes us to express, that we are able to announce, on the authority of a Herald reporter, that those who expect to hear of wholesale destruction of property and assassination (at the hands of O'Donovan Rossa through the "Skirmishing Fund") will be grievously disappointed." This is asserted to be the result of a conversation with Rossa himself. It is time such assurances were made. From the very inception of the scheme every appeal of Rossa's and every letter from his contributors bristled all over with dark hints about "dynamite" in connection with "Liverpool," the "House of Commons," the "British Navy" and "English Camps in Ireland." Men offered themselves as "sacrifices" in the "cause" whose enthusiasm was temporarily repressed by published comments to the effect that "there was a good time coming."

We confess that but for the absurdity of the thing we would have been greatly shocked. That any one could so misuse the name of Irishmen as to father a project of cowardly assassination and useless destruction roused our indignation; and we saw with pity that Irishmen could be found in considerable enough to follow such a leader. Further than this we have not deemed the matter worthy of notice. We placed the "skirmishing" project on a par with that other brilliant plan of wearing the Princes of Wales like lambs, running him off to the mountains, and holding him as a hostage for Ireland's liberation;" and we asserted ourselves that the seemingly embryo Themseuses were really those who did not reflect upon what they were doing. We are certain of one thing—that a "dynamite" scheme, if projected in earnest, would never find in the proportions of Irishmen to Irishmen.

But think for a moment of the consequence of such a piece of barbarity if carried out successfully! The sympathy of the sensitive civilized world would at once be withdrawn from the cause of Irish nationality, and all human beings would be instantly banded together to crush it forever. Worse still, a brand of shame would be irrevocably fixed upon the name of every Irishman and Irishwoman to which that which damns the memory of the Bremerhaven fiend would seem a ray of transcendent glory. This is why we are rejoiced to learn that the useless destruction of ancient institutions—masonry of them Irish—and wicked assassination is not contemplated. Added to this is the Skirmishing Fund will now pour in, we have no doubt, without stint. The more the better, say we. Get together all the money you can, Irishmen at home, and when you have enough, declare war on England, if you have to do it yourself. Then buy your dynamite and anything else that can do damage to England, and use it properly and like a brave man. You may count on us for all the assistance that lies in our power.—Irish Citizen.

IRISH TRADE AND THE PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITION.—We, says the Cork Herald, had an opportunity of inspecting a large assortment of linens and tweeds, which are about to be forwarded to America for display at the great Philadelphia Exhibition this year. The cloths, which were manufactured at the Blarney Mills, are of every description. There were light shades, but the colors were well blended, and the designs were well and happily chosen. The Irish wool represented in the Mangerton tweeds and Tanker bantine serges, and the Australian wool was represented by the fancy tweeds and worsted coatings. The latter were beautifully and tastefully manufactured, and no doubt would be hailed the best fabrics in the West of England could turn out such well finished material. The linens from the web were worthy of notice, but nothing, in our judgment, could equal the texture and the finish of the tweeds, the serges and the worsted coatings. There are altogether twelve or thirteen cases of goods going to America, representing about one hundred different pieces of goods.

CARDINAL LEDOCHOWSKI.—One of the guests at the Patrick's Day dinner at the Irish College in Rome was Cardinal Ledochowski, who made some sympathetic allusions to Ireland. He said that between Ireland and Poland the sympathies of the Catholics of Germany of to-day there existed a bond of pain which served to secure hope and strengthen the desire for martyrdom for conscience' sake and for the sake of Catholicism. His mentioned there was no exercise in his two dioceses more dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the still gracious consequence was so marked that in several of the churches belonging to the seminaries which were under the control of the Cardinal, and he spoke in grateful terms of the action of the Irish bishops, who, in their synod uniting at this time, immediately resolved on dedicating all Ireland to the Sacred Heart of the Redeemer.—York Examiner.

Liver and Blood Diseases.

By R. V. PIERCE, M. D., Author of "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser."

A healthy liver secretes each day about two and a half pounds of bile, which contains a great amount of waste material taken from the blood. When the liver becomes torpid or congested, it fails to eliminate the vast amount of noxious substance, which, therefore, remains in the blood, and must be carried to every part of the system. What follows? Why, the whole mass of blood is poisoned and rendered unfit for the nourishment of the body. Nature tries to work off the poisons through other channels and organs—the kidneys, lungs, skin, etc., and many diseases are produced. It is perfectly plain that the liver is beneficial to their primary functions, also causes many of these diseases, by not performing its duty thereon.

The brain, which is the great electrical center of all vitality, is also very prominent as a source of disease. Nerves run to it from the heart, and it has a perfect network of nerves of its own. Nothing can be perfect in the action of any organ or system of its functions, which are diseases, headache, indigestion, dyspepsia, biliousness, fits, nervousness, loss of memory, crazy fancies, or even insanity, gloomy forebodings and suicidal thoughts. Bad blood itself is a disease, as it runs the whole round of the skin, it is no trifling and foul poison that it produces discolored brown spots, pimples in patches, and other eruptions. Then comes boils, ulcers, and scrofulous tumors. The stomach, bowels, kidneys, and other organs, become diseased, and a long train of horrors follow, such as dropsy, shortness of breath, rheumatism, erysipelas, diarrhœa. Other diseases, such as consumption, catarrh, bronchitis, throat, liver, and bowel complaints, running rough, humors, and many others, are also caused by bad blood, as only spare room remains to mention the boils, tetter, and salt rheum.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the great blood purifier and liver invigorator, and will cure all diseases of the liver, blood, and lungs, if taken according to directions. Every one every where who has used it has spoken in the highest terms of its wonderful curative powers. Sold by druggists. Price $1.00 per bottle.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, or little liver pills, are the cheapest pill in the market, as one pellet is a dose. They are sugar-coated, and are entirely vegetable. Price 25 cents per vial.

Dr. Pierce's Compound Extract of Smartweed, or Pain Killer, is a valuable remedy for sudden colds, coughs, sore throat, bronchitis, asthma, pains, bruises, sprains, etc. Price 50 cents per bottle.

Dr. Pierce's Nasal Syringe, for the cure of catarrh, is sent free on receipt of $1.00.

All of the above medicines are sold by druggists.

THE NAMELESS ONE.

Poor Clarence Mangan has expressed all the hopeless misery of his unfortunate life in the following remarkable poem:

Hail forth, my song, like the rushing star
That sweeps along in the mighty sea!
God will inspire me while I declare
My soul to thee!

Tell thou the world when my brain is whirling
Amid the last horrors of frenzy and sin,
That there was one whose voice ran lightning
No eye beheld.

Tell how his boyhood was one dream night-long—
How choice for him through his grief and gloom
No star of all heaven sends in light our Path to the tomb.

Roll on, my song, to after ages—
Tell how, disdaining all earth can give,
He would have traded man, from Wisdom's pages,
The way to live.

And tell how, trampled, derided, hated,
And worn by weakness, disease and wrong,
He fled for shelter to God, and waited
His word with mind.

With song, which always, sublime or rapid,
Flowed like a rill in the morning beam,
Perchance not deep, but intense and rapid—
A mountain stream.

Tell how this Nineteen, condemned for years long
To herd with demons from hell beneath,
Saw things that made him, with grease-lined irons, long
For even death.

Go on to tell how, with genius wasted,
Betrayed to friendship, blasted to love,
With spirit ship-wrecked, and strength long ago blasted,
He still, still strove.

Till, spent with toil, dreading death for others,
And none whose love would have wrought for him—
Without a friend to close his mother's—
His mind grew dim.

And he fell for through that pit abysmal,
The gulf and night of Marsh and Want,
And pawned his soul for his devil's dismal
Hell of rum.

But yet redeemed it with days of darkness,
And nights and nights of God knows what,
Whose death, in hideous and ghastly starkness,
Has not my lot.

And tell how yet, amid wreck and sorrow,
And wail and torment and loneliness nights,
He gave to his fellow men to borrow
Such songs as this.

And tell how he still, in spite of hell's hate,
At his supreme, from Sunday and woe,
He lived, enduring what human power
Never shall know.

Then grant a grave to me, ye pitying souls,
Down by a running stream. There let me rest;
No, no, bad tears for all seem in trouble,
Where and to best.

THE GREAT SCANDAL.

The Secret Service Fund Used to Corrupt Elections.

John I. Davenport, U. S. Commissioner, Chief Supervisor of Elections, and General Ballot Generally.

Startling Facts Never Before Developed.

NEW YORK, April 20.—John I. Davenport, who is brought into national prominence and infamous notoriety by the late developments of the ex Attorney General and the ex-Chief of the National Secret Service, has been a conspicuous and important factor in the politics of the city ever since 1869-70. He is still a young man, a mere boy in stature, of intellect small, of attainments, a pupil of Big Butler's, an unscrupulous, scheming, reckless, political manipulator. By chicanery, and, as S. Washington, after securing the passage of this Act, he was exceedingly jubilant, and openly boasted that he had secured for himself an office—referring to the Chief Supervisorship—that was worth a great deal more than the Presidency of the United States. A reference to the law in question will show that he was largely justified in these boasts. As a mere Commissioner, he was starving for employment. He was in debt to whomsoever would trust him, and was owing borrowed money on every hand. He had been admitted as a member of the Union League Club, but was still in debt to a friend, and is so in debt to this day, for the payment of his initiation fee. But this supplemental election law gave him prospective wealth. He was a United States Commissioner, and he was also Chief Supervisor of Elections under that law for this district, with authority to arrest almost indiscriminately. He had an army of deputies under him, all working for pay, and for fees. Every warrant required, every subpœna, all examinations and commitments, and processes of every nature and kind growing out of the execution of this law were to come before him as Commissioner. Under this remarkable law he was empowered to make all the business as Chief Supervisor which he, as Commissioner, could dispose of, and pocket the liberal fees both of office and magistrate. Whether the office yielded him as much as his sanguine anticipations counted upon or not there is no question. Davenport is not impressed with one young law clerk Davenport suddenly blossomed out into a second-class wealthy man, occupying a grand house in a high-toned, up-town neighborhood, with his private carriage and liveried servants to do his bidding.

EMPLOYED BY THE CUSTOM HOUSE GANG.

Previous to the election of 1871 the Custom House political leaders made a desperate effort to secure control of the city government. Tom Murphy, George Bliss, Marshal Sharpe and others of that ilk concluded to make one grand effort, supposing then that the restoration of this city and State to Republican rule would be impossible the grand success of the scheme for the reelection of Grant. Having this great object in view, the assessment of the population of the city under the census law, under the direction of Marshal Sharpe, was made. They all had important adjuncts to the schemes of the managers. Davenport, always ready for a job, and here again employed. The original census returns of entirely were placed at Davenport's disposal, and he had opposite each name the letter "D," or "R," as the case might be, denoting, to indicate whether the citizen was a Democrat or a Republican. These duplicate returns, unauthorized by any law, were destroyed by Davenport, and from them he obtained, as was supposed, an accurate list of every voter in the city, with his political predilections. Having acted the previous year as Chief Supervisor of Elections, Davenport was in the possession of the entire registry of voters. By comparing this with the census returns he was enabled to make a tolerably perfect list of every voter in this city, with his age, residence, occupation and political standing. Armed thus he let his warrants out

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber knows, the first step to friends by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for neglegence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

THE PICNIC SEASON.

Now that the picnic season has fairly set in, and our streets every Sunday ring with the martial music of the bands escorting the pleasure-seekers, we are treated to the usual stories of violences, rowdyism and drunkenness accompanying the return home from the rejoicing place. There are, we cheerfully say, people who cannot go out for a day's enjoyment in the country without indulging in dissipation and becoming a nuisance to all around them, and they flock to places as naturally as ducks take to water. It is possible to keep an excursion held on a week-day comparatively free from these pests; but, reasonable as they are in themselves

In Tullamore thirteen hundred people have been enrolled members of a religious society called the "Confraternity of the Holy Family." Rev. Joseph Flood, C. C., is spiritual director, and to his exertions the success of the association, and the benefits conferred by it on the members, are mainly attributable.

Two Protestant youths named James O'Neill and Hugh Jones were summoned by Mr. Lawrence Doyle, pawnbroker, for wilfully and maliciously breaking a pane of plate glass, his property. The defendants were represented by Mr. Dowling, pleaded guilty, and offered to pay the value of the plate-glass. Mr. Doyle refused to accept the offer, and informed their worships that for the past two months nimilar, of every description were nightly thrown at a particular window in his house. Inside the window was a large picture of the Blessed Virgin, before which a light was kept burning; the stone could be seen to come from the opposite side of the street, and who preceded that attacks were made by the defendants through decency and manners for his religion. The magistrates expressed their determination to put down such attempts at rousing a feeling of animosity between the Roman Catholics of the town and people of other denominations, and mark their sense of the present impudent conduct, which they believed was done by the defendants, they fined them to pay 10s. compensation for the glass, and all costs.

THE MAID AND THE RIVER.

A maiden fair as the summer day
Chaned down from her home in the rippling river,
Where the willows warp as it winds away
And the calf may leave and the long grasses quiver.
"O river, beautiful river," she said,
"Tempting all in the cool to wandering be,
Whither then goest I, too, would go"
Oh, the glistening, glancing river!
Oh, the stump legged dancing river!
By groves and forest bowers, and bright wild flowers,
The maiden followed the glancing river.

And fast and far from their native hills
Roamed the maid and the restless river;
By woods and moors and misty dells,
Through sad laughing, and laughing sorrow—
"Sweet," the maiden said, "are the sights we see,
"Tempting and pleasant in the sunshine's glow;
"Death forest trees where the morning bee so
Dreamily echoed the waters' flow—
Oh, the broad and bounding river!
Oh, the swift and mounting river!
And on at last, with unwearied feet,
The maiden sped with the bounding river.

On through the evening's gathering frown,
Where dismal sights in the waters mirror,
Into the heart of the mighty town—
Oh, the wicked and wearying river!
Death like stripping arm and baby slime
By piles like a accursed this shadow throw—
By sighted hells, by maddening wails,
By the scenes of vexis and the haunts of woe—
Oh, the dark and dreary river!
Oh, the wide and weary river!
Through the glare and din, 'mid the shame and sin,
The doomed maid follows the dreary river.

There's a refuge of death in that mighty town,
There's a calm for the heart that is free from malice,
And there stands the maid, hurried down
Over the reeled isle of the rolling river,
To that earth of doom creeps a goods and lost
A shuddering shape of sin and woe;
From the lunatic bigh there's a wailing cry,
And a plunge in the fatal flood below!
Oh, the murmuring, moaning river!
Oh, the gloomy and groaning river!
In the awful night a face death-white
Once can to the sea on the mourning river.

THE MAID AND THE RIVER.

A maiden fair as the summer day
Came down from her home to the rippling river,
And there she sang a merry lay
Of the time for the mowing and the long grasses quiver.
"O river, beautiful river," she said,
"Whither then flowest? I fain would know;
Through all the sun thy wanderings be,
Whither then goest I, too, would go"
Oh, the glistening, glancing river!
Oh, the dimp'ling and dancing river!
By groves and bowers, mid bright wild flowers,
The maiden followed the glancing river.

And first and far from their native spot
Roamed the maid and the restless river;
By grassy mead and sunny dell,
Lingered and laughed, and lingering never—
By hoary rime and hazel wine,
Drowsily bushed in the meadow's glow;
Through forest trees where the morning dew as
Dreamily echoed the waters' flow—
Oh, the broad and brooding river!
Oh, the swift and scouring river!
And on it fled, with its wonder fed,
The maiden spent with the brooding river.

On through the evening's gathering frown,
Where shrouded lights in the waters quiver,
Into the heart of the mighty town,
Solemnly passes the restless river—
Through the dripping dusk and by many skies,
By piles that a earnest-like shadow throw—
By lighted halls, by mouldering walls,
By the homes of wealth and the haunts of woe—
Oh, the dark and dreary river!
Oh, the wide and weary river!
Through the gloom, and the storm, and the shame and sin,
The sullen tide mocks the dreary river.

There's a bridge of death in that mighty town,
Where dim shades flit and the night winds shiver,
And hoary clouds hang heavily down
O'er the veiled ribs of the rushing river.
The thick arch of doom conceals the coming form—
A shudder shapes of sin and woe.
From the lamentable high thereby a wailing cry,
And a plunge in the fatal flood below!
Oh, the cold and merciless river!
Oh, the cruel and treacherous river!
In the awful night, a fiend's death-wake
Do you or he see on the mourning river.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— Rev. Father Weninger's recent mission in Texas was a remarkable success. In the small town of Brenham alone he converted thirty American Protestants.

— Rev. George Harold, late C. C. of the parish of Dalkey and Rathmichael, has been appointed by his Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop to the parish of Westtown, left vacant by the death of the late Very Rev. P. Doherty.

— The people of Navan have presented an address, with a purse of 300 sovereigns, to Rev. Hugh Behan, who had been curate in Navan for nearly four years, on the occasion of his promotion to the parish of Rathkenny, Rossmeill and Grange.

— In the same week from Beaconn (Tarbroy) that Mgr. Melchesedechus, Bishop of the Armenian Catholics, has again come into possession of the ancient and rich cathedral and residence, which had been torn from him by spoliation and by the Turkish Government.

— At a Consistory held April 3d his Holiness the Pope created two new Cardinals. His nine promotions since his accession raised bishops, among whom were Mgr. Kutschker, elevated to the Archiepiscopal of Vienna, and Rev. Michael Warren, elevated to the Bishopric of Fyras, in Ireland.

— We regret to announce the death of Rev. John Geary, which and great took place at the Presbytery, Donoughmore, on April 3d. The remains were conveyed to Mallow, thence by midday train to Fermoy, where the Office and High Mass took place on April 6th.

— The monument to General Lamoriciere in the Cathedral of Nantes, which has been for some time in course of erection, is now completed. It consists of a recumbent statue of the deceased hero, the largest of the four angles of the tomb are seated bronze figures representing Faith, Charity, Military Courage and Abdication.

— A pilgrimage to Lourdes from Ireland is in preparation. For the sanctuary of that favored spot two beautiful and costly offerings will be borne, early in the approaching summer, by pious pilgrims from the State. Ireland, as evidences of their love and veneration. One of these is to be a splendid silver lamp from Munster, the other is a richly-embroidered and embroidered banner from Connaught.

— The remains of Lieutenant Cahill, who was ordered up for the eternal repose of the soul of Daniel M. de Salas, at the Church of Mercy, Clifden. The holy mass, who had arrived twenty years in the service, was sister to Mr. Martin of Galway. A heller death could not be imagined. A sincerely lamented. He receive her heartily reward, and to join the company of the saints, Mary and James, whom she had served so faithfully during life.

— Baron Redlee, in a recent audience at the Vatican, had rendered upon him by the Pope the Order of St. Gregory the Great, his Holiness receiving in return a casket enclosing 500 best considering a miniature of Napoleon I., which once belonged to the Emperor's brother, Madame Letitia. It was presented by the Baron at the sale of that venerable lady's effects. His Holiness was much pleased with the gift, and ordered it to be filled with gold, saying he did so "that all his be was enough, and when it is empty it shall be placed among the rare curiosities of the Museum."

— On the 26th of April the Catholics of Chicago will have occasion to rejoice in the consecration of another church edifice in their already large city. The new church of the Congregation of the Mission—better known as the "Lazarist" order, will, on that day, solemnly open their doors for worship. Visitors to the northwestern part of the city will then have an opportunity of being present at the ceremonies which will be performed by Right Rev. Bishop Foley, and the ceremony on that occasion will be preached by Most Rev. Bishop Lynch, of Toronto. In the evening Right Rev. Bishop Spaye, of Belleville will officiate.

— A general meeting of the bishops who formed the Catholic University was held at Dublin on April 19th. The organization of the three faculties of law, letters and science was effected by their existing incorporation, and elected and appointed. A note for publication was addressed by the meeting to the Catholic laity of Ireland, announcing the purpose of the Government bill which had been laid before the two Chambers proposing to place the new university on the same status in the right of conferring degrees, as everything the existing law, on the faith of which many serious sums of money material interests were now staked. The meeting was also charged Mgrs. Donnelan and Gulbert, the Cardinals Archbishops of Rouen and Paris, to express to the Government the unanimous opinion of their colleagues on the subject.

Dropping Out Existence.

The nervous, weakly invalid does not enjoy life, but merely "drags out existence," as the phrase is. Unfitted for the active pursuits of life, and incapable of sympathy in its pleasures, in which health alone can give a zest; disinclined to mental intercourse, and a prey to melancholy, the wretched victim is but an object of pity. Yet there is nothing in all this that cannot be remedied by that genial alterative and tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which expels the disordered matter, braces the nervous system, and overcomes those bodily irregularities in which nervous weakness is most frequently manifested. Diseases of the kidneys and bladder, imperfect digestion and uterine troubles are forms of nervous debility. They, nevertheless, however, to attract a degree of certainty when Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is taken resolutely, and for that purpose it should be used in the case of malarious and general fever or ague and other contributing diseases. Physicians of a medical science.

Mass.

To me nothing is so consoling, so piercing, so thrilling, so overcoming, as the Mass, said as it is among us. I could attend Masses forever and not be tired. It is not a mere form of words—it is a great action, the greatest action that can be on earth. It is, we know, the mystation incarnate, but, if I dare use the word, the evocation of the Eternal. He becomes present at the altar in flesh and blood, before whom the angels bow and devils tremble. This is that awful event which is the scope and the interpretation, of every act of the solemnity. Words are necessary, but as means, as it were, they are not mere addresses to the Throne of Grace, the instruments of what is far higher, of consecration, of sacrifice. They hurry on, as if impatient to fulfill their mission. Quickly they go, the whole is quiet, for they are all parts of one integral action. Quickly they go, for they are awful words of sacrifice, they are a work too great to delay upon, when the Lord came down in the cloud, calling on the name of the Lord as he passed by, "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth."

And, as Moses on the mountain, so we, too, "make haste and bow our heads to the earth, and adore." So we, who are assembled in his place, look out for the great Advent, trusting for the storing of all our prayers, separate but concordant, watching what is going on, watching for Him, and uniting in his commemoration: not painfully and hopelessly, following a hard form of worship from beginning to end, but in the concert of musical instruments, each different in Name for movement, in the concert of his promotion to the parish of Rathkenny, Rossmeill and Grange.

Wants Small 1 Value!

This is often a serious question with ill-invalid. He finds the market flooded with proper sary medicines, scores of which are recommended to certain cures by puffing agents, through the columns of papers, circulars and almanacs, and finds each one lauded by glowing testimonials to be a sure cure for all forms and specific action. The recommendations are so strong for one as for another. The nervous sufferer does not have been wrought by one are so wonderful as to be incredible, and the sufferer is sometimes not to try it at all. But it should be borne in mind that this condition of things is one that cannot be remedied. In kind where all are false. Where all are equally valuable—as one is made from experience with the other—the only way to find the best is to try them for yourself by the same test commonly applied to everything. In such a case, perhaps the only absolute proof that a remedy is what it claims to be is to try it. The test of a pudding is the eating of it. "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good," is the apostolic injunction. There may, however, be strongest presumptive evidence in favor of one remedy over others in favor of another, and this should be allowed its due weight. A close regard to this may save a vast amount of experimenting and a useless outlay of money. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the product of Dr. Hostetter's family formula, the properties of which we say that they are prepared by new and scientific processes by which the virtues of the crude plants and roots are extracted without the use of a portion of alcohol. Not a particle of this destroyer of our race exists into the composition of either his Celebrated Medical Discovery or his Stomach Bitters. The preparation alone ought certainly to rank them high above the vile compounds sold under the name of rum, rot gut, bust, or vinegar, which are every day destroying the lives of thousands of our fellow-citizens. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is offered to the ages. They are also made from fresh herbs and roots, gathered in their appropriate seasons, when they are fresh with medicinal properties. In support of these claims, the following testimonial is offered:

NEWARK, N. J.
R. V. PIERCE, M. D.—Dear Sir: I have had a great deal of your excellent remedies, and I prefer to sell them before others because I know they are reliable, and to those who use them. I hear from remarks as "Hegeman's Compound Extract of Tar, Wild Cherry and Pepsin," or "Pierce's Discovery is just what I wanted; I feel like a new man since I took it," etc. I have also found that the best is strengthening bar tonic, and says "there is nothing like it." I have sold it for years, and it always gives satisfaction. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery was long ago discovered, and after taking two bottles of it I felt much better. I continued its use for a few weeks longer, and was entirely cured. I was troubled with a severe cough, and was induced to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery." And so I might go on. I am, most respectfully yours, ATHA D. CROCKER.

"Low" Protestantism.

"Low" Protestantism has distinguished itself at Bristol as well as at Chatham. The hatred of Romanism has aroused an iconoclastic mob, and some statues on the west front of the beautifully restored old cathedral have been committed to bits. The barbarism is a little startling. So steadily has the progress of refinement gone on in England of late years that we had almost arrived at the confusion that the Mahommedans were now the only people in Europe who could conceive no use of a sacred image except to worship it. But we perceive that this was to do injustice to the intensity and stupidity of Bristol fanaticism. It has already dented the deal, and now it smashes the marble. A statue of the mother of our Lord was an object of peculiar abomination to them. If any one broke an image of the Queen of England in their presence, they would probably lynch him; but they think it a meritorious act of their soundness of faith to smash an image of the Queen of Heaven. Truly, religion is advancing apace in that ancient city, and the Protestant mob have very lofty ideas of religious duty. Their creed has the merit of being easily followed, and of being very altruistic in those of humble rank. To split up persons of more wide into fragments is a simple so using a hammer, and it is very amusing to the great masses who have no sense of artistic beauty or of decorative work. Wordsworth thought he depicted a very low order of humanity when he said

"A primrose by the river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him—
And it was nothing more."

But it would be yet a baser sort of creature who saw in the lovely handiwork of saints only a something to be torn up and destroyed. That much lower are the Bristol Protestants who have smashed them. They cannot see that the image of a carved wall awakens in pious minds recollections of great achievements or marvelous suffering in the cause of God. They do not understand that piety may be awakened, developed, or intensified by a likeness of stone, as we seem to bring our dear ones back to us by a photograph or a lock of hair. To them a stone image is a stone image and something more—a thing to be smashed. Such is the spirit of enlightened Bristol mob!—Cork Examiner.

Priestly Bigotry.

The Prince of Wales has his faults like other men, but certainly anything in the shape of religious intolerance has not been counted among them. It is, then, with deep pain we see that the Prince has received a rebuke from the Rev. Stopford, which all good men will condemn as unbecoming alike the station, taken as a whole. The fact is the prevailing indignation of the country, which is English; the next arises from the accident that the principal ladies of the Court were formerly colonels or Great Britain.

We hold that the prevailing language alone is the safe criterion to be guided by on such a subject. If it were, Ireland—which is to-day, occupationally, the most purely Celtic country in the world—would be Anglo-Saxon. English is now universally spoken in the southern and eastern portion of the inhabitants of that country, and the Celtic tongue is there only a curiosity, as an American, has a chance to enter where others would almost fear to tread. Another illustration of this has just occurred that you must learn about. For would have to have been hearing of La [illegible] to time; but, moreover, whether it was [illegible] or not, I had made up my mind that before the end of the year I would see the revered gentleman. I expressed my wish to a person who has already furnished me the means of seeing more than one matter that has been described in the Paris Letter. My friend promised me that, in English, he just would write to the Abbé Lemire, and to obtain [illegible] for me. He said "I have Père Monsabré speaken to," "Père Monsabré!" I exclaimed. "Do you know him?" "The great preacher of Notre Dame?" "The same," he answered. The appointment was duly arranged, and I was to call at the Dominicans' Convent. It was about 3 o'clock when my friend told us in a tone which did not deceive me that Père Monsabré was in the city, but he did not know what was in the city, but he did not know what Father was not to be disturbed.

Next morning very expressly spent elsewhere, we returned to the city, and I went to the main hall, turn to the right, follow the long hall after that, and "there," where we would see the Père." Now, I am not [illegible] any confidence in telling my experience to Anything No. 20. But I suppose a little dreamers to the right about we were [illegible] to stand still, just knowing which way to proceed; those were halls and stairs in every direction; so we bolted [illegible] and went on as we proceed, but which retained a picture which still hangs in my mind. I passed from my mind's eye, a good Brother Convent, in all its glory, had a huge boiler in full operation, and the whole little water upon which to [illegible] while he had a companion quietly enjoying a game of dominoes! At the unexpected interruption up he started, and we took not long before reaching No. 20, where good Père Monsabré was engaged in study. ing his next conference. No sooner had we tapped at the door than he had used it welcome in the most little cell, which none of your readers need be jealous of.

A bumpy desk, a delectable little bed, a few chairs and a good fire, constituted the whole furnishing of the apartment. Here those grand thoughts were born to rear the sands of hearers are studied over, revised and committed to memory, and yet in conversation the worthy Père has not a shadow of Hurlbut. He is thoroughly at home upon you will be fair, I might give some striking reminiscences from his conversation which chiefly turned upon America. Père Monsabré was still the Dominicans, feels deeply grateful for the kindness given the great exposer of Froude & Co. He expressed much pleasure when I told him that your friend's recent triumph at Chatham was the talk of his dominicans, and he likewise manifested the self-satisfaction it would give him to see his conferences translated into English. "If," said he, "you can find any one bold enough to risk the venture." After a pleasant chat, of say twenty-five minutes, we rose to leave our interesting friend and were about to bid adieu, I said in the best French I could muster: "Now, Père Monsabré, I know you have a great many friends," "Mais oui" (yes, indeed), he replied. "And I am sure, as a French gentleman, you will not take the hardihood of a young American."

"To be sure; what is it?" he continued. "Then just please to sign these, three photographs," I added; "one for me, and the other for friends."

"I always sign them under the likeness," he replied.

"Anywhere you please, so you put your name," and after this would you believe the good man took my face between his two hands, and having given me two or three first class huggings, sent me off rejoicing, not without having previously said with you had of an American, that's the way you get things." I write with this photograph before me; he has a great many of Father Burke's traits of countenance—an eye as bright as burnished steel, and a great, noble expression of look and mouth that attracts attention at once. In conversation he is full of animation, and, as in his conference, illustrates all that he says by gesture. He hopes that we may continue to prosper, but he would not be astonished, I think, if the Church received a shaking before many years. I returned to Ireland in no very exaggerated frame of mind.

What are the Americans?

It has been hitherto so much the custom with American writers, and with the manufacturers of public opinion in America, to talk about their Anglo-Saxon ancestry, that the opinion generally prevails that the native population of this country are pure-blooded descendants of the Teutonic followers of Hengist and Horsa. Nor it is strange that this fallacy has been so widely received, from the fact that our prevailing language is English, and the consequently, we receive our opinions on history and ethnology, to a very great extent, from English sources, where the character of the plundered Celts of Ireland and Great Britain had been so long held up to hatred and contempt, it is the easiest thing to believe. They are all uneducated, and have yet to be trained before they can be of much use in the arts of peace and civilization, for woom they are intended. The Chatham strong-minded Quaker was a good deal annoyed by people who make pedestals of them. Old maids and eccentric bachelors have a predilection for the dears of domestic toys. The monkey is, strange to say, rather delicately constituted, and many of the race, particularly the varied monkey with chestnut body, yellow head, yellow cheeks and black crown, and the green monkey, with black face, are never seen in this country, because they cannot live outside of their own climate. The colored monkeys seen here are not the genuine article, and are usually got up for sale, in the fashion of Mayor Barnum's woolly horse. —N. Y. World.

A Visit to Pere Monsabre.

A couple weeks ago you learned of my success in Notre Dame, when I wished to see the sacred crown of thorns and other relics, and how, by a correspondent, particularly an American, has a chance to enter where others would almost fear to tread. Another illustration of this has just occurred that you must learn about. For would have to have been hearing of

HOW THE BABY UNDERSTOOD.

Quoth the baby, "What is Easter?"
While her two eyes opened wide;
"And has Easter got a story?"
Then crept close to mamma's side.

"It has a story, dearie;
Will my baby understand?
If I tell her what is Easter
And baby raised a chubby hand:

Made a wishing, groaning gesture,
And, with whining, baby voice old,
Said, "Ohl yes; you tell it easy,
No I'll know it when its told."

"Easter is the day God made 'love;'"
Then the baby's face grew bright,
And she nodded, softly saying,
"Yes, just like He made the light!"

"And it has a lovely story
Of our Lord, dear, eloquent told
In a place called tomb—a rare place—
For the dead in narrow beds."

But the baby shook her bright head,
Mocked the world with whisper low:
"I haven't stick where God was in Here—
He hinige light with Him, you know."

Now mamma spoke very softly:
"Can it be there is a stone
That no man could move to close it,
Rolled against the tomb so large?"

"For our Lord had said He'd leave it,
And in days of three again
And His holy word was doomed
By those selfish and cruel men."

Now the baby carried her red lips—
Now her brow a queen's look wore
"He! they didn't know how much ways He goes, Angels always go before!"

Then mamma, with heart full filling,
Tried to tell the story's end;
But the baby, sleeping, sighed,
A sad hour is soon to spend

By the tomb. His mother longing
For a sight of her loved one,
Weeping came. My dearie, listen—
The great earthquake shook the ground!

Leaped the light into the blue eyes,
Unaged now, and baby hands so in prayer—
Rang low happy voice and sweet:
"Heaven's light and angels there!"

"I'm," and then she stopped, and tears
With the tears that to it rising—
"All the tomb one angel surrounded,
And fair light in certain thing

"Over the entrance, from which others
The huge stone had rolled away,
White sat Lord, with light encircled,
Stood the angel. This made Him

Then the baby's faith shone radiant
In a smile on her face—
So His mother found Him—found Him!
I know what is Easter now!"

THE IRISH WAR OF 1641.

An Interesting Paper by Rev. T. A. Finlay, S. J.

From the Manuscript Journal of the Dublin Historical Society.

A large meeting of the Essay and Debating Society of the Limerick Catholic Literary Institute, was held on Friday, March 31, when Rev. E. T. O'Dwyer, C.C., Presided, occupied the chair. There were, besides, a number of the clergy and laity present, and they must have an eminently practical significance for those whom duty or inclination lead to take part in and to influence the events of the present. Into a detailed history of the events of the period it would be impossible for me to enter. I shall confine myself to such a summary of them as shall serve to bring out the special points of interest I have mentioned. The Irish re-united on an extensive scale a national league excepting to worship it. But we perceive that this was to do injustice to the intensity and stupidity of Bristol fanaticism. It has already dented the deal, and now it smashes the marble. A statue of the mother of our Lord was an object of peculiar abomination to them. If any one broke an image of the Queen of England in their presence, they would probably lynch him; but they think it a meritorious act of their soundness of faith to smash an image of the Queen of Heaven. Truly, religion is advancing apace in that ancient city, and the Protestant mob have very lofty ideas of religious duty. Their creed has the merit of being easily followed, and of being very altruistic in those of humble rank. To split up persons of more wide into fragments is a simple so using a hammer, and it is very amusing to the great masses who have no sense of artistic beauty or of decorative work. Wordsworth thought he depicted a very low order of humanity when he said

"A primrose by the river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him—
And it was nothing more."

But it would be yet a baser sort of creature who saw in the lovely handiwork of saints only a something to be torn up and destroyed. That much lower are the Bristol Protestants who have smashed them. They cannot see that the image of a carved wall awakens in pious minds recollections of great achievements or marvelous suffering in the cause of God. They do not understand that piety may be awakened, developed, or intensified by a likeness of stone, as we seem to bring our dear ones back to us by a photograph or a lock of hair. To them a stone image is a stone image and something more—a thing to be smashed. Such is the spirit of enlightened Bristol mob!—Cork Examiner.

Priestly Bigotry.

The Prince of Wales has his faults like other men, but certainly anything in the shape of religious intolerance has not been counted among them. It is, then, with deep pain we see that the Prince has received a rebuke from the Rev. Stopford, which all good men will condemn as unbecoming alike the station, taken as a whole. The fact is the prevailing indignation of the country, which is English; the next arises from the accident that the principal ladies of the Court were formerly colonels or Great Britain.

We hold that the prevailing language alone is the safe criterion to be guided by on such a subject. If it were, Ireland—which is to-day, occupationally, the most purely Celtic country in the world—would be Anglo-Saxon. English is now universally spoken in the southern and eastern portion of the inhabitants of that country, and the Celtic tongue is there only a curiosity, as an American, has a chance to enter where others would almost fear to tread. Another illustration of this has just occurred that you must learn about. For would have to have been hearing of La [illegible] to time; but, moreover, whether it was [illegible] or not, I had made up my mind that before the end of the year I would see the revered gentleman. I expressed my wish to a person who has already furnished me the means of seeing more than one matter that has been described in the Paris Letter. My friend promised me that, in English, he just would write to the Abbé Lemire, and to obtain [illegible] for me. He said "I have Père Monsabré speaken to," "Père Monsabré!" I exclaimed. "Do you know him?" "The great preacher of Notre Dame?" "The same," he answered. The appointment was duly arranged, and I was to call at the Dominicans' Convent. It was about 3 o'clock when my friend told us in a tone which did not deceive me that Père Monsabré was in the city, but he did not know what was in the city, but he did not know what Father was not to be disturbed.

Next morning very expressly spent elsewhere, we returned to the city, and I went to the main hall, turn to the right, follow the long hall after that, and "there," where we would see the Père." Now, I am not [illegible] any confidence in telling my experience to Anything No. 20. But I suppose a little dreamers to the right about we were [illegible] to stand still, just knowing which way to proceed; those were halls and stairs in every direction; so we bolted [illegible] and went on as we proceed, but which retained a picture which still hangs in my mind. I passed from my mind's eye, a good Brother Convent, in all its glory, had a huge boiler in full operation, and the whole little water upon which to [illegible] while he had a companion quietly enjoying a game of dominoes! At the unexpected interruption up he started, and we took not long before reaching No. 20, where good Père Monsabré was engaged in study. ing his next conference. No sooner had we tapped at the door than he had used it welcome in the most little cell, which none of your readers need be jealous of.

A bumpy desk, a delectable little bed, a few chairs and a good fire, constituted the whole furnishing of the apartment. Here those grand thoughts were born to rear the sands of hearers are studied over, revised and committed to memory, and yet in conversation the worthy Père has not a shadow of Hurlbut. He is thoroughly at home upon you will be fair, I might give some striking reminiscences from his conversation which chiefly turned upon America. Père Monsabré was still the Dominicans, feels deeply grateful for the kindness given the great exposer of Froude & Co. He expressed much pleasure when I told him that your friend's recent triumph at Chatham was the talk of his dominicans, and he likewise manifested the self-satisfaction it would give him to see his conferences translated into English. "If," said he, "you can find any one bold enough to risk the venture." After a pleasant chat, of say twenty-five minutes, we rose to leave our interesting friend and were about to bid adieu, I said in the best French I could muster: "Now, Père Monsabré, I know you have a great many friends," "Mais oui" (yes, indeed), he replied. "And I am sure, as a French gentleman, you will not take the hardihood of a young American."

"To be sure; what is it?" he continued. "Then just please to sign these, three photographs," I added; "one for me, and the other for friends."

"I always sign them under the likeness," he replied.

"Anywhere you please, so you put your name," and after this would you believe the good man took my face between his

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. We think is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of this paper, there is no excuse for negligence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As several of advice has always been taken in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

A "HARMLESS" INQUISITION.

The Chronicle cannot understand our description of the Inquisition, and seems to think it somewhat peculiar that our contemporary is unable to call the Inquisition to mind for a moment without unpleasant recollections of racks, thumb-screws and other implements of torture. Nor can it comprehend how anything in the shape of an Inquisition is necessary or could be maintained at the present time. Now, it appears to us there ought be no difficulty about the matter at all, because it is really very simple. In the olden days men valued faith above everything else in the world, and spared no effort to keep it pure and undefiled. And they believed that Almighty God had appointed a tribunal on earth whose decisions upon faith and morals were infallible. When the so-called "Reformation" broke out, for in particular of the nature of a pestilence, even preachers of the Gospel fell away, and the strangest doctrines were promulgated. There were Lutherans, Calvinists, and the like, and the glaring of their career declared their intention of abandoning the Church or rejecting the ancient faith; but, on the contrary, one and all of these insisted that they wanted to reform certain real or imaginary abuses, and stoutly maintained they were excellent and zealous Catholics.

It became a serious question in the minds of such confusion to decide what was and what was not true Catholic belief. The faithful had a right to know, and the authorities of the Church were in duty bound to decide. So, wherever the people remained true to faith in spite of the utterance of dogmas conflicting with long cherished belief, recourse was had to Rome for a pronouncement upon their orthodoxy. Questions of the kind becoming numerous, learned ecclesiastics were empowered to inquire into them and pronounce judgment. Hence arose the Inquisition. If emperors, kings and princes chose to attach any corporal punishment to the publishing or holding heretical opinions, that was no affair of the Popes, and was entirely outside their jurisdiction. If any potentate owned the Sovereign Pontiff that he intended to drive heresy out of his dominions, the Pope could not do otherwise than approve of the design, which in itself was good and laudable. At the same time the approval did not convey any sanction of the means employed. Whenever the Popes interfered or expressed an opinion upon such subjects, it was always on the side of mercy, and in most instances their remonstrances were received with a very bad grace.

With the infliction of punishment, high or heavy, the Church never had anything to do, either directly or indirectly, for that was the prerogative of the secular power. All that ecclesiastics ever did was to say whether such and such doctrines and opinions were or were not contrary to Catholic faith, and at that precise point their mission ended. They could not help giving their decision, for truth is sacred and must be asserted, and they could neither deal nor connive at falsehood. If those who accuse the Catholic Church of complicity in the excesses of the secular arm of the Inquisition in some places would only make themselves acquainted with the stringent rules which for bid ecclesiastics having anything to do with the taking of life, and they are fearfully stringent—non-Catholics, we fear, would be inclined to call them tyrannical—there would be much less talk about the horrors of the Popish Inquisition. And so far as the secular princes who decreed and carried out the punishments are concerned, it is manifestly unfair to judge their conduct by the ideas prevailing at the present time. The spirit of all legislation in their days was brutal and oppressive. It is put correctly a hundred years since in catechised and Protestant" England a little girl was hanged on the gallows for the crime of stealing a few yards of ribbon to adorn a doll. It is not much longer since Quakers and "antichaps" were very unceremoniously treated in America. And the torture of the Protestant Inquisition in Ireland—carried on, be it well remembered, by the head of the Protestant Church—are things duly recorded in history.

We have said that the theory and principle of the Inquisition, for which alone the Church is responsible, were all correct. Any system of religion cannot be maintained in face of the different dispositions and intellects of men, unless it has some agency for the suppression of error, and some authority for defining its own tenets. Indeed, the pettiest sect at present in existence has some such "Inquisition," and claims power to condemn heresy or wrong-teaching on the part of its ministry or members. The secular power does not, happily, step in with its punishments, and that one fact constitutes all the difference between now and the middle ages.

THE BRITISH FIELD OF FAME.

England is about entering upon another of those "little wars" which turn out so very unprofitable and expensive, but which she rather relishes, nevertheless, because they afford her the only opportunities she can now get of showing the world that her military prowess is still undiminished. The mighty King of Dahomey is the high potentate who has now to feel the crushing weight of British anger, and fall prostrate before the conquering arms of her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. It is not, we believe, the first time that her Majesty contented with her Majesty, and both settled their differences in true royal style upon the field of battle. Her Majesty, of course, appeared in the fight only by proxy, being represented by one of her many gallant generals; but the Majesty always took the risks of war himself, and led his dusky warriors to the conflict. The cause of the latest difficulty, so far as we can see, is not without a reason to State papers, is the melancholy circumstance that some Englishmen, wandering about Dahomey, got the skull broken by the club of his Majesty's retainers. Her Majesty was quite shocked at this untimely taking off of one of her loyal subjects; but she was willing to forget and forgive the unfortunate occurrence in consideration of a certain number of ounces of gold. Indeed, we imagine that, in genuine British commercial spirit, she would only be too happy to supply an indefinite number of English specimens, belonging to the race classes exclusively, for all the clubs in Dahomey at the same rate. The King who, we suppose, had plenty of gold, thought the terms cheap enough, so he agreed to furnish the precious metal according to the stipulated conditions. The first installment he paid promptly and honorably, to the great satisfaction of the British. But we are sorry to say that when paying the second his Majesty so far forgot his royal dignity as to attempt to play a trick worthy of a third class confidence man. He substituted the gold with base metal, and tried to palm it [illegible] by know what gold ought to be, and refused to take the fraudulent stuff.

A demand was made upon the King for a supply of the genuine article, but he declared that the Queen should be contented with what she got, or else go without any. Payment was again requested promptly, under pain of hostilities, and the refusal was a polite invitation to the British commander to come to the capital of Dahomey and pay for powder and ball. The invitation has been accepted, and by the time the troops of England are on the march for the miserable collection of huts which pass for a city in Dahomey. The King's best troops, strange to say, are women, and precisely what glory is to be gained from beating them by the disciplined and muscular troops of Great Britain, it would not be very easy to determine. If Queen Victoria had the spirit of fair-play in her, and we are afraid she has not, she would equip a regiment of those gentle dames who, in the coal districts of her own country, assume the garb and carry the arms of men, strike matches, and go out to command them betimes. The amazons of Dahomey might then have some kind of a chance for victory, but as the case now stands, we cannot conceive any termination more consonant with the principles of justice than a complete defeat of the British forces. Such a result would be a glorious one for the Dahomeyans, and would be hailed with delight by all the civilized world. Will not the Frenchmen and the Prussians awake in their bosoms as they read the details of the brilliant victories gained against the women warriors of Dahomey by the sorried legions of Great Britain?

"D. M.," Virginia City.—The declaration of principles of the O. A. U. which you send us appeared in our columns in a more elaborate form some months ago, copied from a New York paper. It is to be regretted that an organization so intelligent should open the large influence you credit it with in a cosmopolitan and liberal city like Virginia. The surest way of rendering their power nugatory is for all honest, fair-intentioned citizens to combine against them, and whenever one of them runs for office, no matter what ticket he is on, vote against him. They are not near so numerous as some suppose, but they are powerful for evil because of their thorough organization and their unanimity of action.

NEXT SUNDAY being the Feast of the Patronage of St. Joseph, the general communion of the St. Joseph Society of St. Francis' parish, together with the investiture of new members, will take place at the nine o'clock Mass, in St. Francis' church, Vallejo street.

The decision of the Supreme Court against the issuing of notarial debts will reduce the roll of this county fully one hundred millions of dollars.

THE EUROPEAN POWERS AND THE POPE.

From time to time we hear of rumors that a "reconciliation" is about being effected between the Sovereign Pontiff and King Victor Emanuel, and that the former intends to "recognize established facts," as Napoleonic phraseology goes, and bless the Italian Kingdom. These rumors are eagerly discussed in the press, and the papers which lay claim to a liberal character invariably express a hope that they may be fulfilled. These clever but not learned exponents of public opinion are kind enough to speak of Pius IX. as a good and sensible old man, who is respected by everybody; but who, unfortunately, has little erotchets and peculiar ideas about his rights which they cannot approve of. The thing they condemn most severely in the Supreme Pontiff, and which they consider is most unreasonable, is his refusal to recognize Victor Emanuel as King of Italy, or acquiesce in the annexation of his own territory. Even Catholics will occasionally be found who seem to think that the Holy Father is a little obstinate on these points, and that the Church would get on much better if he yielded. People who are of as accommodating disposition and rather deficient in principle, no doubt, find it somewhat difficult to understand the firmness of a person who steadily, and despite all entreaty, refuses to acknowledge as right that which he knows to be base and wrong. The case is not mending better acquainted than the Pope is with the iniquitous means by which the unification of Italy was brought about. He is, M. Mon, Rattazzi, Garibaldi, and the perjuries which were used to overthrow the independent principalities. Such things cannot possibly obtain the approval of his pure mind; for he is to set an example of honor and truthfulness to Christendom.

It may be that the changes are all for the better; it may be that Italy will be more prosperous now than she formerly was; we do not say so, and do not think so; but that does not alter the character of the means by which the revolution was accomplished. If the Pope were to recognize the Italian Kingdom, as demanded, it would be tantamount to confessing that he believed the end justified the means. So far as the States of the Church are concerned, the position of his Holiness is even more strongly supported by justice and morality. He does not own them, and cannot surrender them to anybody. As a sacred trust he received them, and he is bound to deliver them to his successor just as he received them. If Victor Emanuel retains them, having most unjustly seized them, that is his affair, and he will frankly acknowledge that the attitude assumed by the Pope with reference to the cession of his dominions is perfectly consistent with honor and dignity. But the question is not one of principles, but of expediency. Will the Pope be policy served in [illegible] by his persistent refusal to acquiesce in the accomplished facts? Will the [illegible] to be practical upon him, we are fairly taken aback at the impudence and audacity of the plagiarist, Mr. "W. B. H." [illegible] Pope, and he cannot be held accountable for it; but he cannot either waive or forfeit the rights of his successors by any voluntary act of his. To ask him to do so is simply to ask him to commit a crime. Any jurist skilled in international law

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of April 8.

ANTRIM.

An action brought by a constable against Sir Hervey Bruce Bruce, was tried last week at Belfast. Lord Caledon had sought him with a party of preachers on a friend's estate adjoining his own, and in a letter to the Inspector-General of Constabulary complained that the constable had, a gun in his hand, and was impertinent to him. He pleaded that this was a privileged communication, and the jury returned a verdict in his favor.

At the assizes of Belfast, last week, Patrick Murphy was tried on a charge of the manslaughter of James Houston, the Marquis of Donegall's game-keeper, at Cavan Hill, Belfast. Houston had caught him poaching and arrested him, and during the struggle of the two men the poacher's gun went off and mortally wounded the gamekeeper.

CLARE.

The sporting fraternity and the public generally in this district, says the Ennis correspondent of the Freeman, still regret to learn of the sudden death of Ralph Westropp, Esq. He died in the 44th year of his age, of heart disease, accelerated by a game of hand-ball, played a few hours before, which is supposed to be the immediate cause of death.

CORK.

At the last meeting of the Cork Town Council election was called by Mr. Harris to the mayoral chairmair of the Council for the new post-office in Cork. Ten thousand pounds has been voted for the work, but, owing to the high price paid for the site, only three thousand is available for the building, which, consequently, will be of anything but an ornamental character. The Council resolved to address a remonstrance on the subject to the Postmaster-General, and the Mayor promised to call on Lord Hartington next week.

At the Queenstown petty sessions, last week, some of the Passage fishermen, who have fifth nets, obtained summonses against fishermen Black-rock, whom they charged with having attacked them in the water on Sunday night. The Black Rock men, forming a flotilla of five boats, drove complainants before them into French's Bay, where they seized their boats and carried off nets, anchors and all other gear. The complainants summoned the bailiff to whom they applied in reference to the affair would give them no assistance.

TIPPERARY.

At the quarter sessions of the Newtownbutler a few days ago, before entering on the civil list, Fred. Hall, Esq., Q. C., said addressing J. J. Scanlon, Esq., as Lord Belmore's agent, I gave him great pleasure to assist that during his absence your experience as Chairman of the county Fermanagh has been of great service. I record a single instance of an ejectment against a tenant on the property of the Earl of Belmore. Mr. Scanlon, in reply, expressed his hope that this pleasant state of things would long continue, and added it was gratifying to have obtained the notice from the bench, so long associated with the county, and so much respected therein.

GALWAY.

At the last meeting of the Galway Town Commissioners tenders for the construction of sewerage works in the town were considered, and that of Mr. Swallow, of Dublin, who proposed to do the work for a sum of £5,336, was adopted. A letter was read from Mr. Robert Barker, stating that he was about establishing a company for an overland route from Galway to America.

KILKENNY.

At the Ballinrobe quarter sessions on Saturday the chairman was informed that a tenant farmers signed it, and had it sent by that day's post to Mr. A. M. Sullivan's care.

TIPPERARY.

Up to the 30th of March the diocese of Ferns had contributed £224 3s. 7d. to the funds of the Catholic University.

A few days since Mr. Flint, of Dublin, auctioneer, by instructions received from the Church Temporalities Commissioners, sold by public auction about twenty-two Irish acres of glebe land attached to the rectory at Thurles. The principal competitors were Rev. C. B. Harley, rector, Thurles, and Mr. Dall Hackett, Derrynilla House, New Birmingham. The land was knocked down to the former, subject to the approval of the Church Commissioners, for the high figure of £1,500.

TYRONE.

At the last meeting of the Coolstown Board of Guardians Mr. Loughran moved that a petition from the Sentiff (county Clare) Union regarding the disposal of the Church surplus be signed by the chairman on behalf of the Board. Mr. Rickard seconded the motion. Mr. Wilcocks moved that the petition be not signed. It was an endeavor (he said) to get part of the property of which the Church had been despoiled. Earl Castletown seconded the amendment. Mr. Richard (the Board) would not agree to the amendment of Mr. Wilcocks. A vote was then taken, when the motion of Mr. Loughran was carried by a majority of 15 to 4, the remaining gentlemen not voting. The petition was then signed by the chairman.

ARMAGH.

At a meeting of the friends and supporters of the nunnery and Lancasterian schools, Waterford, held in the vestry of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, on Wednesday after the sermon on St. Patrick's Day, the following resolutions were passed unanimously: "That the grateful thanks of the Catholic inhabitants of Waterford are cordially due, and are hereby given, to the Rev. P. Murphy, the zealous, patriotic and disinterested pastor of St. Anthony's, Liverpool, for his effective appeal delivered this day in aid of the funds for educating 1,400 poor children attending the three convent and Lancasterian schools.

WICKLOW.

At a meeting of the parishioners of Kilbride, at Imbhuspa—Henry M. E. Collins, Esq., in the chair—a Vigilance committee was appointed for the purpose of taking such steps as may be necessary to prevent ritualistic innovations being introduced into the parish churches should such be attempted.

Rev. M. Gaughran has been appointed president of the diocesan Reformatory in the room of Rev. M. F. Skinnors, who retires at the end of a three-year period, and who, it is understood, was offered a renewed appointment to the same office. Some 250 boys are at present inmates of the institution, and in good health, notwithstanding the extreme rigor of the climate during the winter and spring. Additional workshops and other improvements are in contemplation at the reformatory.

THE "FENIAN FUNDS."

The long-continued law suit of O'Mahony vs. Belmont, about the Fenian funds seized by the British Government in 1865, in trust to shut up the mails, was up once more, on the 19th April, in the Circuit Court, Brooklyn, before Judge Pratt. The funds involved had been made payable to the order of John O'Leary, and his conviction and the confiscation of the money had been put in as the original cause of action against the defendant. November 9, 1875, an amendment to this answer was served, sworn to by Eugene Kelly.

Mr. Belmont. The amended answer alleges that this money was August Belmonts, and was the value of the bills on which it was drawn. The amended complaint, finding that the defendants, Belmont and Locke, were co-partners and were improperly joined, dismissed the suit.

When the case came on last week, counsel for the defendant Belmont asked for a dismissal, the same on the ground that he had done all that was required of him by law, having remitted the funds to meet the draft. Counsel for plaintiff urged that the action was simply for money had and received.

Justice Pratt directed counsel to hand in briefs, and reserved his decision.—Irish American.

A "New Departure" Necessary.

Of the Irish immigrants who have come into the United States since 1840 it is safe to say that sixty per cent. of each, male and female, are agriculturists in Ireland—farmers or laborers. It has been stated that not over five per cent. of this number have become farmers in this country. Most of them have settled down in the cities as day laborers, or in some other menial employment. The present condition of this class, according to the Irish American newspapers, is one of great wretchedness; and if we are to credit the said newspapers, the prisons and poor houses of Northern and Eastern States have, unfortunately, too large a proportion of their inmates recruited from this population. Can nothing be done to influence the industrious and sober portion of them to seek homesteads in the Western States, where they can at all events have enough to eat, and where their children may grow up independent farmers? The "do nothing" policy has existed long enough. It is to be hoped that it will be followed by some active movement to induce those suited for a farmer's life to seek good homesteads. —N. O. Morning Star.

THE VALUE OF A CATHOLIC PRESS.

The Pittsburgh Catholic Journal tells some truths in the following remarks upon the subject of Catholic journals. It says: "A Catholic newspaper is an immense help to the priest. In whatever parish it circulates to any extent, there the clergyman's labor will be considerably lightened. It displays the triumphs of the Church, defends her teachings, states into her sorrows, and does forms by degrees the reader's mind in the atmosphere of Catholicism. It must be, indeed, ever subservient to the pulpit, since the commission to preach the Gospel is of divine institution; but it is an ever-effective handmaid of the Gospel. Our Holy Father recognized, in a most effective manner, this truth by blessing the Catholic press and those connected therewith. If Catholics would but only spend the money they pay for nonsense of doubtful (to say the least of them) morality, illustrated weeklies that vilify their faith, then in a short time we would have a Catholic literature that we might be well proud of. No father of a family should look on the Catholic paper as a mere luxury which his family can dispense with at will. We would advise every family to have its Catholic journal. If they prefer them away from home, well and good. If you find they are there beneficial to yourself and family, we say, do it in your own home. And not only should you take a Catholic journal, but you should encourage your neighbor to do likewise."

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—Cardinal Ledochowski has received the Presbyterial title of Sancto Maria in Ara Coeli.

—At the last Papal Consistory Rev. F. Warren was appointed for the See of Ferns, Ireland, left vacant by the death of Bishop Furlong.

—There are now in Prussia 5,000 vacant parishes; very near 8,000 priests have been expelled or imprisoned since the beginning of the "Kulturkampf."

—The distinguished Jesuit, Father Franzelin, a master of theology, who was recently raised to the Cardinalate, has taken the title of St. Boniface and Alexius. He will reside in the South American College.

—Very Rev. Thomas Burke, the distinguished Dominican preacher, has been obliged to leave Ireland in the hope of recovering his health beneath the sunny sky of Italy. He is now domiciled at the Convent of St. Clement, Rome.

—The Westminster Gazette announces that of the four hundred priests who had been exiled to Siberia, one hundred died on account of the sufferings to which they were exposed. Had these four hundred priests been Chinese bonzes, Jewish rabbins or any other denomination than Catholic, all Europe would be in arms against the Russian tyrant.

—A Dispatch from Rome to the London Times April 8t, reports that the Osservatore Romano (newspaper) was sequestered for publishing the Pope's pastoral thanking the Bishop of Orleans for his letter to Signor Minghetti, in which a violent attack was made on the Italian law rendering priests liable to military conscription.

—The Ursuline nuns, New York, celebrated Easter Monday by giving the white veil to two postulants and the black veil to two of their novices at their convent in Melrose. The lay sisters who made their vows are Sister Mary Mestilde Josephine and Sister Mary Columba Josephine. Miss Florence O'Keefe received the white veil of the choir and the name of Sister Mary Frances de Chantal Josephine, and Miss Annie Gilly received the white veil and the name of Sister M. Florian Josephine.

—On Easter Monday, 17th April, at St. Mary's Convent of Mercy, Pittsburgh, Rt. Rev. J. S. Tuigg, D. D., Bishop of Pittsburgh, received the solemn vows of Sister Mary John Evangelist (Miss Mary Wall), honoring her the black veil or the Order. The Bishop was assisted by Very Rev. Stephen Wall, President of St. Michael's Theological Seminary, and several other priests. The Right Rev. Bishop delivered a short address to the candidate. Sister Mary John belongs a very respectable Catholic family, which has already given two talented sons to the priesthood, Very Rev. Stephen Wall, of Pittsburgh, and Rev. John Wall, deceased, and formerly pastor of St. Agnes' church, West Chester, Pa.

—When his Holiness Pope Pius IX. lately received the Prince Apostolic of Australia he learned from him a fact worth making known. A young woman of one of the savage tribes appeared before the missionaries and asked to be baptised. The missionaries hesitated, thinking her not sufficiently instructed in the Catholic faith. She then told them that St. Peter the Apostle had appeared to her during the forest of a venerable old man, and besides making her acquainted with the truths of our holy religion, had also told her many things concerning the near and terrible persecution which would soon overpower every believer of the Catholic Church. The missionaries still hesitating, led the young woman to the Prince Apostolic, who interrogated her on the catechism and found her perfectly instructed. She was baptised her, and since that time the rest of the tribe, all of whom had promised to the savages and been the cause of many conversions.

An Irish Baronet on the Stage,

A London correspondent writes respecting the approaching appearance on the stage of Sir Randall Roberts, a native of Kinsale:

Sir Randall Roberts is announced to appear before us on the 15th of May in a comedy of his own writing called "Under the Veil." The play is to be produced at once the Olympic, and much good both of actor and author is spoken in the coolness. Sir Randall Roberts is one of the few who adopt the provisions in order to secure himself leisure. He is a thorough artist and excels in more branches than one. Sir Randall is the twelfth baronet of his name, and began life as an officer in the 7th Regiment, and served in the Crimea and through the Indian mutiny. No name is ever possessed more decidedly artistic three than Sir Randall Roberts, for he has tried his hand at enthusiasm in almost every branch, and exhibited a purpose at the Royal Academy, where so many are rejected. During the Franco-Prussian war he was the agent correspondent, and took an active part in the German successes. He shared in all the perils of the campaign, had a horse killed under him at Mars la Tour, and was severely wounded at Gravelotte. The latter portion of the war he was again terribly wounded. Sir Randall may be fairly adjudged by the application made by Prince Frederic Charles to Lord Granville to have the honor Sir Randall claimed by his personal staff. The refusal of this request naturally brought about a rupture with the object of securing the place for nothing was done but Sir Randall had left the service when he was promoted to the Prussian generalship he could be obtained, and the enjoyment of all privileges of a Prussian officer with that rank. But not only in the field, but also in the ambulance did the services of the English baronet become the subject of remark. For saving the life under heavy fire the King of Prussia bestowed upon him the Order of the Iron Cross. He higher distinction was one conferred upon a foreigner. Ever since the war Sir Randall has occupied himself in the arts. He has published tales and novels, he has composed plays and dramas, but it remained for him to try his fortune on the stage. This he is about to do, and everyone joins in wishing him a brilliant success on the boards as he has already obtained on the battlefield.

A Widely Applicable Remedy.

Few remedies are applicable to such a wide range of disorders as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and its success is not because it has special properties adapted to the cure of each—such a province would be manifestly absurd—but because it operates in accordance fully improving effect upon the general tone of the system and its alterative action upon the organs of nutrition, secretion and excretion. Hence its well known properties as a remedy for intermittent and remittent fevers, dyspepsia, consumption, infirmity of the liver, rheumatism, kidney complaint and nervous affections. It is scarcely proper to be highly serviceable in preventing as well as curing, bilious fevers, and this is one of the many virtues of the Bitters. Disorders and disabilities originating in poverty of the blood, enervation, debility or an impaired condition of the nervous system, are also improved by a performance of the physical functions.

AT our request, Cregin & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., have promised to send any of our readers, free, on receipt of 10 cents to pay postage, a sample of Dobbins' celebrated Soap to try. Send, and try.

Catholicity in Scotland.

The establishment of the Benedictine Monastery at Fort Augustus, on the banks of Loch Ness, in the Highlands of Scotland, has given cause for much odious warning and useless vituperation on the part of the neighboring Presbyterian messes and kirks. Fort Augustus was purchased by the late Lord Lovat in 1867 as the best investment for the sum of £4,000. The Fort had long ceased to be used as a military station, and had fallen into a ruinous state. It was once considered a strong fortification. It had four bastions, was defended by a ditch, a glacis and covered way. Attached to it were barracks capable of holding three or four hundred soldiers. The Duke of Cumberland, after the battle of Culloden, made Fort Augustus his headquarters for some time. The situation of the building is beautiful beyond description—so beautiful that Dr. Johnson, on his visit to the Highlands, mentioned the place as one well adapted for pleasure if not for strength. Being in the line of the Caledonian Canal, it is well known to tourists, who have time to visit the loft and grounds while the steamer is delayed in passing through the locks. The Benedictine monks, for whose benefit Lord Lovat has made over the property as a present to the Church, will take up their abode in this delightful retreat towards the latter end of May, just when the place is in all its glory of verdure and bloom. It is understood that the holy brotherhood will, following in the footsteps of their brethren of Fernham, found a college for study and to the cultivation of letters. Hitherto monastic life has been the aim of their labors. A printing press will be established in the building, and a library is in course of formation by a collection dispensed for the purpose to the various capitals of Europe.

The Benedictine monks were celebrated as being the most high-bred and learned among the religious orders of the middle ages. Sir Walter Scott eulogizes their great literary industry, and observes that their revenues were never spent on self-indulgence and indolence. The Fort Augustus house includes about sixteen acres, a college carrying on the Scottish College of Benedictines, which existed formerly at Ratisbon, and was taken possession of by the Bavarian Government some three years ago, because it was no longer able to fulfill the conditions of its foundation, it attached to the monastery. The rent of the farm at Ardcony is to be especially assigned to the college. The Church is to be commenced as soon as possession of the deed of transfer shall be obtained. The late Lord Lovat vested the rent of the lands of Ruisbrea, in Inverness-shire, for the benefit of Catholic missionaries resident on the Lovat estates. This now yields about £235 per annum. A great number of the Catholics inhabitants of Scotland have already determined on confiding the education of their children to the Benedictine monks of Fort Augustus, and the authorities of the monastery are planned for the reception of two hundred pupils.—Dublin Evening Telegraph.

Death of Father Bolgaires.

We announce with deep regret the death of the distinguished Oratorian Father whose name we have given above in our last early on the morning of April 7th, in the oratory at Brompiom, London, where he had spent so many years of his most useful life and devoted himself so many works in advancement of the Catholic Church in England. Father Dalgaires had filled a large and prominent place in the modern history of Catholicism in England. He was an accomplished and eloquent exponent of Catholic theology, and was himself the instrument of receiving numbers of Protestants into the Catholic fold. But more many valuable and elaborate treatises on Catholic subjects, and gained a reputation which will not quickly pass away by his beautiful publication on "Holy Communion." It is an invaluable treasury of theological lore, and discourses on the Blessed Sacrament, and is safe and able protest against the Jansinistic errors for many years prevalent on that solemn and interesting question. Father Dalgaires had a large part in the receiving of converts into the Catholic Church. Even among the Orientalists he was more than remarkable in this particular. If we are not mistaken, he was much interested in the last-reputed reception into the Catholic fold of an illustrious ex-Premier of England, and he was the chief instrument, under Divine Providence, in preparing for admission into the Church the late lamented Duchess, the Marquis of Ripon, who had ruled the philosophy and learned religion of the Freemasons of England. For some months past the health of Father Dalgaires has been a source of much anxiety to his friends, and under the weight of much personal prostration and the anguish of bodily physical suffering he passed peacefully away last Friday morning, and, strengthened with the sacraments of the Church, departed this life to be judged by his Lord.—Dublin Freeman.

Denis Dowling Mulcahy.

We understand that Mr. Denis Dowling Mulcahy is about to engage in a lecturing tour throughout this country. In wishing him every success, we express our cheerful feelings of all good Irishmen, with whom the fact of Mr. Mulcahy having suffered for his country's cause is a never way to deal affection that would be the subject of nobility from the proudest land on earth. We much regret, however, to see that in his reply to the Cork Nationalists Mr. Mulcahy says he is about to abandon the line of the way to throw discredit upon Federalism. It is painful to see good and true Irishmen wasting in the condemnation of each other that energy and zeal ability which might be better employed against the common enemy. We feel assured that when Mr. Mulcahy has been some little time in this country, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with the various opinions held by Irish Americans on the subject of selection they think it best to pursue, he will see the wisdom of giving men credit for honesty of purpose who are not bigoted enough advanced opinions as himself, but who may have really made greater sacrifices for the national cause than ever he has done. He may, if he makes strict inquiries, find among those in the ranks of the Federalists, the only difference between them and their being that the force of circumstances may have thrown them into prominence, whereas others, perchance so equally gifted and equally patriotic as himself, have toiled on in obscurity, without having the approbation of their fellowmen to encourage them as being patriots or martyrs, but quite satisfied with the consciousness of having done their duty to their country. We trust that the distinguished patriot who is now in our midst will take nothing for granted that this party or that party may tell him, but that he will make inquiries for himself. If he does this we feel quite satisfied that he will move among his countrymen in Ireland and Great Britain, not as a disturber, but as one who comes on the noble mission of helping to gather into one common camp the different sections of Irish national opinion, and moulding them into a power which may prove irresistible when it is judged that the right time has come to direct it against our country's oppressor.—Liverpool United Irishman.

ANOTHER HUMBUG EXPLODED.—The assessment set on foot a few months ago by parties interested, and based upon the reported existence of gold in large quantities in the Black Hills of Wyoming, is rapidly subsiding, leaving in its wake the usual disappointment, suffering and disaster which are the legitimate results of such baseless rumors. After diligent and laborious prospecting throughout the region indicated as highly auriferous, extending through several months, not a single instance well authenticated can be given where the mining effort has been successful. Town lot speculators, rum-sellers, gamblers and confidence men may have made a little money while the excitement was at fever heat at the diggings, and a few merchants and businessmen at Cheyenne and Laramie may have driven a brisk business for two or three months; but the half-starved and credulous army of gold-hunters who are now plodding their weary way towards home are unanimous in their expressions of bitterness and disgust over the hoaxers of the grand swindle which has been perpetrated upon them.—Chronicle.

THE LIMERICK DEMONSTRATION.

THE PROCESSION ATTACKED---ROUT OF THE NATIONALISTS.

On Easter Monday the people of Limerick gave their representatives, Messrs. Isaac Butt and Richard O'Shaughnessy, a magnificent welcome home from their Parliamentary labors. Of the many popular manifestations to denote the origin of the Home Rule movement in Limerick, in numbers and splendor this far distanced them, while the popular enthusiasm was worked up to the boiling point of excitement, no attempt made to mar its success. For several days it was openly proclaimed that a section of Nationalists had resolved to chase Home Rule from every public platform. In the face of the overwhelming opinion of all classes, and their repudiation by the vast body of Nationalists, this extraordinary determination was persisted in.

Mr. Butt was received at the railway station by his colleague, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Wm. H. O'Sullivan, representative of the county, Mr. Bolster, ex-President of the Limerick Farmers' Club, and several clergymen, corporators and other influential persons of both the city and county. Among those present were Rev. Mr. McMahon, P. P., Parteen; Rev. Mr. Molyneux, Adm. St. Michael's; Father Nolan, C. C., St. Mary's; Father Sheedy, C. C., St. John's; Father McCoy, Adm. St. John's; Father M. O'Sullivan, P. P., Ballyloogford; Father Gilligan, Kilrush; Father Dundon, Father Dwyer, C. C., Kilrush; Father Molyneux, Askeaton; Father Quade, St. John's; Messrs. Mathew O'Flaherty, President of Farmers' Club; Denis Kelly, Alderman; Councillor T. C. Keane O'Mara, Michael Gilligan, John Kelly, Richard Ryan, Councillor John Keasley, Henry O'Shea, James Markey, Dominick Sadlier, M. Collins, Jacob Russell, T. U.; P. J. Kirby, Mondellsby; Michael Kirby, Mondellsby; Joseph Collins, John Sheehy, coroner; H. Sheehy, Mac; John Sheehy, Patrick Sheehy, Fortwilliam; J. Forrest, Stephen Quade, Dublin Kennedy, T. Fit Gerald, O'Mara, Jr.; Michael Harney, J. Hartigan, Wm. Lonergan (solicitor), Tase Roche, Thos. Buckley, Daniel Kenny.

Mr. Butt received a splendid ovation by he appeared in the full flush of his great spirits, accompanied by Messrs. O'Shaughnessy, M. P.; W. H. O'Sullivan, M. P.; Joseph O'Connell, and Alderman Spaight, who was well filled by a open carriage drawn by four grays.

The Limerick trades were there in splendid form. Their banners gleamed, their band beds the member welcome, and the vast crowd testified its pleasure in sent up each a thundering cheer as proved the secure position maintained by Mr. Butt and the stronghold of the people's heart. The rising Home Rule leader and his friends, taking their seats in an open carriage, were met for the O'Connell monument, followed by the cheering multitude, and there was a well filled address delivered. The procession came close to the foot of the monument, at which, by previous arrangement, Mr. Butt was to address the people.

Here the business of the demonstration was to have terminated. An obstacle contemptible in point of strength, but directed by the steering will and the fell spirit of the rescinders, opposed itself to the act of the popular will. It was no secret that the attempt to prevent the meeting was planned. The day before placards had been posted bearing the name of one of the leaders of the blessing, Bridget," she answered, as she went to ring the bell for school to re-commence. Bridget opened her spelling-book and began looking through it. In a moment she held out to Eugene a little, green bunch of something dry, but neatly pressed and tied with a knot of green ribbon.

"Here," she said simply, "it's a shamrock I picked myself before we left home, an' you said a good word for me yesterday, an' so I brought it to ye, for it's like an Irish boy ye are, sir, an' not a country-born at all, at all!"

He just said "thank you," when the shilldree came hurrying in.

He put the precious shamrock in one of his books, and thought to himself, "how pleased mamma and grandpa will be to see it." School went on then, and he soon became absorbed in his lessons, for he was just as much in earnest about them as he was in his play.

But when the time for dismissal came a most extraordinary scene presented itself to his astonished gaze. A space as he found himself fairly disengaged from the crowd of his schoolmates he saw that a number of them—the same who had maltreated him on the street the day previous—collected on the pavement and cowering together. He had not gone many steps when he became aware they were following him. At first his heart sank within him, for he knew he would be attacked when they had him far enough from the school-house; but as you have already seen, my little readers, he had a brave heart, and so determined to not the man. As he crossed a street, about six squares from where the school-house stood, a most comical looking brigade met his view. Jem was followed by bold-faced and nose-boys, walking down the street which crossed that on which he was so bravely marching up his way, and the one at their head seemed to be giving them some sort of directions. You can imagine the picture they presented; their faces innocent of towel or soap, and their queer clothes, so funny that one would think they invented their costumes purposely. If any rule of fashion did exist in that assemblage, it was lately was that no garment should fit; and second, it certainly was that no garment should be of any known color under the sun. Well, they turned the corner, and Eugene just saw that their leader gave them a wink, and said:

"Fellers, sharp's the word now!"

That, to his utter amusement, they followed him in perfect silence. Now the fear entered his mind that they had been bribed to help the others, and he gave one look back to guess from their face if they were so. Imagine his astonishment. The ragged leader winked at him with a ball fellow-well met air!", and all the others winked too. I think Eugene got "pretty winks" in return for that one look of his, and bewildered beyond measure, he proceeded onwards. He knew he was in the country the street, and, further down, it crossed, getting in front of him. They then "about-ahoot," and it not straight in his path. The foremost held up a handful of mud, and drew back his arm, ready to launch it at Eugene.

"No yer don't!" cried a voice behind, and the leader of the "ragged brigade" darted forward, arrested the uplifted arm, and held it in the air with a grip of iron for a moment, then dashed it back, so that the shower of filth descended on Eugene's face and they began to splatter, sneeze and wipe their faces, amid the derisive shouts of the opposite party.

"Order, fellers!; cried their leader, with a sneer.

The "fellers" came forward, and the detachment placed themselves around Eugene, as a sort of body guard, and the others proceeded to wipe off their pelting opponents. Each ragged defender took hold of one of the latter and held him tight, or if his struggles required more handling, two did the work. They disposed them on each side of the regiment, leaving a sort of lane open between the two rows of astonished and furious prisoners. Then the leader, still preserving his majesty, said to Eugene:

"There's yer road, sir, an' of any of them rascals like the greasers at yer, by George he'll lose that very eyebrow!"

Eugene went forward, and was suffered to march triumphant and alone between the pri-oners. When he had passed through unmolested, the body-guard followed, to whom the leader said sternly (that he let them beat to the theater). "Attend him to his gate, an' any of these villains to me. They shall have a fair fight," and then dropping the stage manner and language, "girls don't know how they've got the best luck' they ever heard tell of!"

But Eugene, hailing in his brave but tender little heart that evil would come of the fight, generously determined to stop it with Mike Lynch's plan. He turned round just at the head of the line. You should have seen the sneering there, the head-some face glowing, and his noble-looking head upraised, as if it would tower above every wheat in the motley crowd.

"Boys," said he, speaking as a man might, with power in every flash of his eye and tone of his voice, "you shouldn't fight! I never did anything in school or out of it to offend you. Too began this be-cause I called a little Irish girl, and because I am of Irish descent. I don't believe you would promise me that you are doing. Look here! The British that we whipped at Bunker Hill, and who tried so hard to make slaves of the Americans, they're the tyrants over the Irish, and that's the reason they have to leave their country and come here; and now we going to help them and make them welcome, or are we going to be meaner than the British and trample on them?"

A shout rose from prisoners and captors. Ragged and neatly fitted forgot the air to gether, and as this required the agency of hands in the end former were freed.

That was Eugene's first appearance; he has made many since to crowded audiences, as one of the most eloquent stage and public speakers, but he says he has never received any applause half so sweet to him as this.

When the cheering was over he said:

"Right, old fellers! I knew you liked freedom too much to begin in the trampling line. Why, yes, were actually commencing to feel good! Now, let's be friends again."

The band shaking that ensued was rather sooty, but done in good faith all round. Then said the leader of the "ragged regiment" to Eugene:

"You're spunky, by Jove—a feller worth fightin' for. If yer ever want any little wrse his' done for ye, don't be sayways bookward callin' on me an' my crowd, for I'm Bridget Maher's brother!"

Which explained all mysteries, and, to Eugene's mind, they had been many.

"Good-bye!" cried a voice in the school-boy crowd.

Don't be shocked, careful mother, reading this in your boys; they only adjourned to—a peanut stand—where'ed they made the Italian proprietor happy.

THE WIVES OF WEINSBERG.

FROM THE GERMAN OF BURGER.

Know you the spot where Weinsberg lies",
Say where from Prath it shines?
For it has cradled many a vine
And gallant wife and maiden
A hide from that there town I, 100,
Will take, if ever I end or woo.

Once Kaiser Conrad was enraged
With this good town and people!
(A cruel, kneely war he waged)
On every side he breached
With trench and loop, and route about
The long-swing forces prow and shout.

And as the now withstood his might,
And none would flinch or sell it,
Had—in his type with anger—this
The white—lo, herald, tell it!
Let hang—whatever the walls I win—
Each mother's son I find within."

The herald went; his horrid news
Unnerved the bold defenders.
Then rose their woeful pitiless
Above their "no surrenders."
Though bread was at a famine price,
Yet dearer still was good device.

"What shall I do? alas! alas!
Had Kelly has wisdom me!"
Each housekin cried,—"Fool that I was,
O, Lord! I marry no-ne!
My thrice! already! Hagles, oh!
What shall I do? Where shall I go?"

Yet when the worst has come, in spite
Of weeping, of woe-begone,
Things of are set again aright
By women's wits and brains.
For parson's wives and women's ways
Had all things—in reserve!

A dame, both young and beauteous, then
Not one day wed, intended
A plan, in which the Kaiser and men
With one accord consented,
Good, proof, for my! but what were you
Yourself know will praise it, now?

Of Weinsberg names the power,
A lovely reputation,
Sought Conrad at the midnight hour,
Imploring his compassion;
And every lady had her boon sought,
Yet this was all the boon they got:

"The ladies all may come away
Uncensured, unmolested,
But all the rest my soldiers may
Destroy and entre as pleased.
The fair ambassadresses incensed
Yes hard consolation, not content.

But what occurred? At morning's dawn
The chief gate was unbarred,
The bridge let down, portcullis drawn,
Then out the ladies marched!
Each with a load upon her back—
It was her husband in a sack.

To fill the hick the courtiers tried,
But—what! more have spoken
Than Conrad? Then he smiled replied,
Well, well, it is a token
No, honor to such noble dame,
I would my wife was of the same."

He gave them pardon and a ball,
In honor of this ladies;
And dance and music made them all
Like shepherds upon May days;
And much was happy I now—not now
The broom-girl than the empress.

Thus show me where's the land, the site,
Of Weinsberg town's a ruin?
It has earned many a true and bright
Fame for its women's doing.
Every fair wife and maiden
From that good town my bride shall be.

THE IRISH WAR OF 1641.

An Interesting Paper by Rev. T. A. Finlay, S.J.

[CONCLUDED.]

The Confederate generals were soon ready to take the field. Their successes were, at first, not at all proportioned to their superiority in point of numbers over their hostile opponents. Ormonde's army, as it was some time before the combined forces of Barry and Castlehaven could check the marauding excursions of Inchiquin [and St. Leger in Munster, in the parts of Ulster alone the consummate military skill of its commander gave the Irish forces a superiority which, as long as they were led by him, they uniformly maintained. Like Epaminondas, he opened for his country's arms a career of victory which lasted as long as he led her troops to battle. With him, as with the Theban general, the light of his country's military glory went out when he ceased to be kindled any more. He was one of the few Irishmen who, to their land, have displayed a high order of military genius. He had learned the art of war in the Netherlands of Picardy and Champagne, and there had won the admiration of friend and foe by his valor and address. Throughout his long campaign in his native land, where he commanded not well disciplined, perfectly disciplined, perfectly equipped legions, but troops of half naked, half-starved mercenaries—where the business of raising, disciplining and maintaining his forces devolved wholly upon himself; where he had to contend with the secret jealousy of his own subordinates, and the more dangerous to a powerful faction in the Government he served or crippled by the poverty and wretchedness of his followers and thwarted at every step by his enemies at the council board, he displayed a lofty courage, a intelligence of purpose and a fertility of resource which, exhibited on any other stage, would have won for him a high place among the foremost soldiers of history. His character has little in common with the typical Irishman, with whom he was all but familiar. Cool without apathy, cautious without being dilatory, patient without being despondent, affable but not familiar, personally brave but never rash, a dexterous politician and a consummate soldier, such was Owen Mac Art O'Neill, Confederate General of the Province of Ulster—in my judgment the greatest Irishman who has played a part in the history of Ireland.

On assuming the command of the discontented multitude that called itself the Ulster Army O'Neill found himself at the face of the most formidable enemy then in the field against the Confederates. Monro, Leslie and Major-General Munro had been detached from the Scotch army, with a force of 11,000 men, previously to defeat the Scotch plantations in Ulster against the rebel Irish, in reality to safeguard the interests of the Presbyterian settlers and to shed Irish blood. Against such adversaries some great strength's said alone could close enable O'Neill to hold his ground. He was equal to the requirements of his situation. For years he avoided a pitched battle. All the while he was successfully harassing the Scotch with the sword to the end of musket and pike, accustoming them, in unimportant skirmishes

TO MEET THE DREADFUL CUIRASSIERS AND FIRE-ARMS

Of the Parliament, and inspiring them with confidence in him and in themselves by uniform success in these engagements. Lorca, then Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Covenant, had warned Munro, when leaving him in command of the Scotch force in Ireland, that he would be detected by O'Neill if that general succeeded in getting an army together. The event justified the warning. In the fourth year of the war the Ulster General, at the head of all his forces, offered battle to the Scotch beside the little village of Benburb, on the boarders of Tyrone. It was accepted, and on the evening of the 5th of June, 1646, the flower of the Scotch army lay dead beside the Blackwater, their colors, artillery, ammunition and provisions were in the hands of their victorious opponents, and their lieutenant-colonels and brave-headed, was flying from the pursuit of the troops of Irish horse, to seek shelter behind the walls of Lisburn. With the incidents of that day the history of the Scotch occupation in Ulster concludes.

In the other provinces the military operations of the Confederates were neither directed with such skill nor attended with such success. The Leinster and Munster commandants were again defeated by Ormonde and Inchiquin with much less numerous forces, and more than once the rapid advance of the Northern General union saved them from the fatal consequences of their incapacity. In spite of these reverses, they were at length able to possess themselves of most of the strongholds of the South and East, and to shut up Ormonde in Dublin and Inchiquin in Cork. The cause of the overthrow of the Confederation lay not in its mischances on the field of battle; they were intrinsic to the organization itself, they grew up spontaneously and inevitably within it, and would have brought it to a disastrous and inglorious end without aid from the external agencies that tended to the same result.

Neither the first English settlers in Ireland nor their descendants ever became Irish in sympathy. They came as colonists of an alien power, and such they continued to be. It is true that in some cases they adopted the dress and language of the population about them, and when self-interest required it, they could profess a high zeal for their allegiance to the English Crown. But even with these occasional points of resemblance to their neighbors, they always came identified with them in national feeling or shared their sentiments and aspirations. During the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century the English settlers, after the example of their Celtic neighbors, clung firmly to the ancient faith, but this community of religious belief did not beget any bond of political fellowship. Catholic or Protestant, the Anglo-Irishmen regarded the country from which his ancestors had emigrated as the colonists of Cremona or Placentia regarded Rome. For him it was the home of a higher civilization, the source of a ruling power—the center whither he was to look for redress or protection when his needed either. In the strife of parties which followed the Reformation he was occasionally to be found arrayed against the Government, but his excessive loyalty was the more remarkable that it was often more than once pro-jected to his sovereign's face; and his profession were distrusted by his Celtic co-religionists, who believed they, to be at peace with the throne, he was ready and scrupie to infringe upon the rights of the Church.

It did not require much foresight to predict that no alliance between these men and the "Old Irish" would be lasting. The gentlemen of the Pale had been driven by

A PERSECUTION OF THE GOVERNMENT

They venerated, into a league with men whom they despised and feared. They were rebels by compulsion, and were ready to subscribe at once any bond which would reconcile them with the power that had goaded them into rebellion against itself. They were Catholics, and to the Catholic they had sworn to obtain the freedom of the Irish Church; but their notion of religious liberty was that of a contradiction—that of the universal establishment of their own creed. The material prosperity of the country, so far as it was not commensurate with their own, they cared little for its civil independence, not at all. Their Irish allies, on the other hand, uncompromising in their demands for religious liberty, were not indisposed to increase their power by the social independence at the expense of the Crown—and were avowedly in favor of a distribution of the confiscated territories which would permit them to live like chieftains. Beings in their own country. An occasion soon arose which brought out in strong contrast the diverging tendencies of the two parties. The ravers of royal cause in England induced King Charles to seek a reconciliation with his Catholic subjects in Ireland, and he sent orders to the Marquis of Ormonde to conclude a truce with the insurgent Irish, and they retired to Galway to prepare for a fresh campaign. O'Neill fell back upon the interior of the province.

A little later the Marquis of Ormonde landed in the south and succeeded in triumph to Kilkenny, installed in the chair of the President of the Supreme Council, the Legislature of the Confederation of Irish Ireland assembled. A few months later

OLIVER CROMWELL

At the head of a large, well-appointed and powerful army, was sweeping away the remnants of the Confederation, as well as the royalist government which had supported it. Into the further history of those times I have neither room nor desire to enter in these events it is, in most cases, not worth while to inquire. One word as to the part played by Owen Roe O'Neill in the stormed Drogheda, and, having put his insurrection down, he marched that when advancing southwards he preaching death and ruin around him, the terrified royalist and Confederate chiefs hastened to submit whose skill had never been at fault, and who lay inactive with the remnants of his gallant army by the waters of Lough Erne, had outraged him by every form of contumely and insult. Owing to the course of events, he was the one man in Ireland fitted for the task, conquering prejudices and passions which seemed to attempt it. But it was not to be; his career was run. His death, unknown, caused, traitors say, by poison administered by a band of a gentleman of the Pale, was upon him when he was on the verge of a victory. He died as he sat, army, borne in a litter, he began his last campaign, and pain compelled him to halt at a small village on the road. He felt the leaves of death in his blood; he bade adieu to his companions, and was borne to the neighboring castle of Clough-puner, and died before the news of his country's hopeless ruin could sadden his soul. What the cause for which he had lived, fought

THE DISTURBANCE AT LIMERICK.

We have now received full accounts of the disturbance which took place in Limerick during the great Home Rule demonstration held on Easter Monday, and for the first time feel justified in making editorial reference to it. Exactly as we imagined, the version sent here by telegraph was exaggerated—as the report of everything widely published in the smallest degree to discredit Ireland always has been so long as we can recollect. Our readers will at once call to mind the description forwarded to this country of the "rioting" which was alleged to have taken place at the laying of the foundation stone of the O'Connell Monument in Dublin, and one to which a reference to the newspapers will recall the long fierce articles about Irish lawlessness and intolerance, and about the necessity of a strong government to prevent different sections of the population from flying at each other's throats. These few individuals grew curiously very intolerant, and clamored for a spirit of despotism, but they escaped every punishment upon themselves and were subjected to no repression whatever. They were clearly and unmistakably in the wrong from beginning to end and so deprived themselves of all claim to public sympathy. If they had succeeded in getting to the place quickly, they could only have created a disturbance, and their protest they could only make in a way which would give them the appearance of being numerous as they were not. They failed to do so, and the Rulers should be grateful for it. But to insult their Queen and Royal Family is a thing which the Rulers should not do, because it did not require any carrying arms to make the insult to an inoffensive people more galling, and especially to show that the men who tried to create one were more hated than good. They are inclined that the same result followed the very murders of thousands of soldiers and their sheer starving of the chiefs of foreign misgovernment. These men may oppose the programme of O'Donovan Rossa; but in common honesty they cannot help acknowledging the excellence of his qualities, and admiring the pluck and fidelity with which, through good report and ill, he has clung to his opinions.

Superintendent Keating of the Almeboon is being investigated again. It has transpired in the evidence that he has been in the habit of constituting city officials with enabling pigs, and making presents of new potatoes to others. County Clerk Reynolds is having a fancy Jersey saw provided with leather notches to her quality at the city's expense, and the Supervisors dont see but his next fitting boots ought to be the official cobbler.

The Mayor and Board of Supervisors have accepted the invitation to be present at the yearly excursion of the Knights of the Red Branch on Sunday at Belmont.

MAY FESTIVAL AT THE SACRED HEART PRESENTATION CONVENT.

The May Festival at the Sacred Heart Presentation Convent was celebrated with the usual pleasing and impressive effect. The addition to the extensive schools building just been completed, afforded new facilities for the promotional exercises. These schools are so constructed as to connect the building and grounds and form a[illegible] promenade for such exhibitions as well as supplying ample accommodation for loungeing, etc. After the procession the pupils entered their respective schools for the opening of their several courses and other refreshments, as noted on the subjoined programme. There was a numerous and respectable assembly of spectators, who seemed highly gratified with their youthful proteges' general appearance and address. One of the most striking features in the programme was the[illegible] of distinction bestowed by the Queens on each of the children in each school as had during the year[illegible] themselves by good conduct and general improvement. The following were the programme of exercises:

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of April 15.

ANTRIM.

At the Belfast Police Court last week there were several prosecutions brought by Mr. John Rea against James Griffin, for fraudulently tampering with certain poor-law voting papers, so as to make them in favor of Mr. John Carruth, a candidate for St. Ann's Ward, Belfast. The offence was proved in the case of a man named James Bagley, whose name had been written on the paper by the defendant in Bagley's absence. Their Worships imposed a fine of £10, or in default five months' imprisonment.

There was a meeting of the magistrates in the Town Hall, Belfast, on Friday, under the Presidency of the Mayor, for the purpose of considering what steps should be taken in view of the proposed demonstration in honor of the Cooke statue by the Orangemen of Belfast. There was a large number of the magistrates present. What resolution (if any) was come to has not been communicated to the outer world.

ARMAGH.

A musical entertainment was given in Lurgan, under Orange auspices, on Tuesday evening week. Major Stewart Blacker, who presided, referred to votes given by the Ulster members, on the motion of Sir T. Chambers, in the House, on the subject of monastic and conventual institutions, and the names of the members who voted for the motion were cheered. Major Blacker asked where was his friend of Ballybilling on last occasion, and suggested that the cheer to be given for him should be reserved until he had offered some explanation of his absence.

CARLOW.

There was not a single Prisoner for trial at the quarter sessions of the county of Carlow

On Wednesday week the committee of management of the Templemore-Thurles dispensary district held a meeting for the purpose of appointing a medical officer. The meeting was largely attended, and resulted in the election of Dr. Charles Allen.

CLARE.

The Clare Advertiser of Saturday records a generous act of Rev. Father O'Shaughnessy, late P. P. of Milltown-Malbay. The Local Total Abstinence Society was a few pounds in debt, and "Father Ned," as he is affectionately called, contributed £20 out of his slender resources to wipe out the liabilities.

CORK.

Mr. Baggot, the Cork publican in whose house some men were found in a state of insensibility from drink a few days ago, has been fined £10 by the magistrates at the police office for having supplied them with drink.

A public meeting was held in Middleton last week for the purpose of establishing a monthly fair in that town. Six fairs are already held in the town in the year, and a resolution was passed in favor of establishing six more, to take place on the second Monday in January, March, April, June, August and December.

The Cork butter season of '75-6 closed on Saturday. The receipts during the year were 441,193, which is the largest on record for the previous year of 363,320. The prices this year were lower than last, but a good average price was the throughput maintained.

At the Cork borough sessions a few days since a case was brought by Mr. Jas. Varian, proprietor of the Royal Hotel, against the sub-sheriff of the city, to recover £60 for the maintenance of two prisoners during the summer assizes of 1875. The prisoners in question were those suspended for the trial of Mary McMahon for murder, and Maloney and O'Sullivan for the Foot-office loss robbery. The sub-sheriff disclaimed personal liability, and maintained that the cost should be charged to the Crown. The case was tried by a jury and they awarded the plaintiff £20.

DOWN.

The Belfast News Letter announces the death of Mr. Richard Stitt Joyce, "one of the eight that first won the Ribbon Shield for Ireland, making on that occasion the highest score ever made at Wimbledon and winning their valuable prizes."

A successful tenant-right meeting was held on Wednesday night week in Banbridge. Mr. Crawford, M. P., and Mr. Andrews, Q. C., were present. Resolutions approving confidence in Messrs. Crawford and Andrews, and condemning Mr. Mulholland's Land Bill, were passed unanimously. A meeting was also held at Rangor last week with similar results.

DUBLIN.

The Rev. George Harold, late C. C. of Palmer and Rollyrock, has been appointed promoter of the opposition to the above Bill, which, nevertheless, has twice brought down upon him the censure of some of his Protestant and non-resident brethren. Like other men of his cloth, he is managing to keep his hand in. Mr. Jerry O'Leary, who is by now in Dublin, failed to exhibit sufficient nerve in proceeding, even against Shepherd, who could bring a bench to pass judgment on any point of law he chose to raise. He simply says that the "Land Bill Fund" will be used to handsomely buy out the revolutionists are ready but to settle their great blow. Very many Irishmen think an honorable settlement is longer has not the least possible hope for the purpose by the late Mr. W. O. Murray, and the site, which adjoins the town, was given by the proprietor, Captain Blake Forster.

At a public meeting held a few days since in Ballinasloe to arrange for the presentation of an address to Major Cosgrove, on his retirement from the position of land agent of the estates of the Earl of Clonmorris, which he has held for thirty years, the chairman of the meeting stated that during that period no threatening letter had been sent to the landlord or the agent, and no attempt made to assassinate either of them.

KERRY.

At a meeting of the Tralee branch of the Catholic Union last week it was resolved to open a subscription list in aid of the persecuted clergy of Germany.

Mr. Crosbie, Coleman has been re-elected Chairman of the Killarney Board of Guardians. He has held the office without interruption for a period of twenty-nine years.

The report of the Killarney District Lunatic Asylum for the year 1875 has just been published. The accommodation at present is for 260 patients, but additional buildings are being erected for 100 more. The number at the asylum at the end of the year was 378.

KILKENNY.

An outrage of a particularly mischievous character, says the Freeman, was discovered to have been committed in Kilkenny. Some miscreant or miscreants had refused to pay; but they had to consent, having no place to go to.

MEATH.

On Tuesday last, Mr. Daniel Neill, a steward at Clonstreeny, county Meath, went out as he usually did to shoot rabbits, and was found by Mr. Wade in about an hour afterwards lying on the ground in an insensible condition, with all the evidences of having received in his neck and head the contents of the weapon which he carried. Mr. Wade, with his usual kindness, dispatched messengers with all promptitude for the priest and doctor; but before either had time to arrive the poor sufferer breathed his last. As no person was present when the sad accident took place, the prevailing opinion is that the trigger of the gun caught in one of the branches of a tree which the deceased was in the act of climbing for the purpose of shooting the rabbits therefrom. The funeral, which took place on Thursday week, was one of the largest witnessed in the neighborhood for many years.

ROSCOMMON.

At the Castlerea quarter sessions there was only one criminal case for trial.

SLIGO.

At the Sligo quarter sessions last week the Chairman briefly addressed the Grand Jury, and said he was happy to meet them in the new, commodious building, which was a credit to the county, owing chiefly to the enterprise of the town and county. He believed there was not a finer jail in Ireland, and the building is large and commodious. The conduct of the people generally was highly creditable, both as to religious and moral point of view. There were only three cases to go before them, and he might say there would be nothing were it not unfortunately from the cause of which he generally complained—Intoxication.

TIPPERARY.

The Lord Lieutenant has revoked the license to carry arms granted to Philip Mahony, of Ballyvonare, county Cork, parish of Nenagh, barony of Lower Ormond and county of Tipperary, N. R.

WATERFORD.

At the Waterford quarter sessions last week, George Waters, Esq., Q.C., Chairman of the county, addressed the Grand Jury, and congratulated them on the fact that their duties would be very light. There were only two cases to go before them—one was for an assault, not of an aggravated nature, and the other was for larceny.

At the meeting of the Dungarvan Guardians held on Tuesday week, Dr. Cleary, P.P., chairman of the Board, appeared before the Board and explained his views on the question of removing the Christian Brother's books, and connecting the schools of the workhouse with the National Board of Education. He said several gentlemen spoke for nearly an hour, treating the subject ably and efficiently. Mr. John Quinlan proposed, Mr. H. Fitzgerald seconded, and it was unanimously carried: "That the books of the Christian Brothers be retained in the schools, and that Dr. Cleary be appointed inspector." It was then moved by Mr. A. Anthony, seconded by Mr. M. Flynn, and also unanimously passed: "That a vote of thanks be passed the ex-officio Guardians for the friendly spirit they manifested in adopting the views put forward by Dr. Cleary." This harmony is again restored at the Guardians' meetings, and the friendliness and cordial feeling which always prevailed at the Board established on a more firm basis than ever.

WEXFORD.

The death of the Very Rev. John Canon Sinnott, P.P., took place at the parochial house, Ballyfarnon, on Saturday, in the sixty-second year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his sacred ministry. The Roscommon People, it is lamented not only by his parishioners, by whom he was loved and revered, but by the clergy of the diocese, by whom he was regarded as a man of great intellectual powers, and by the talismen of a conservative character, and zeal in the discharge of all the duties pertaining to his sacred office.

WICKLOW.

At the Wicklow quarter sessions the Chairman, in addressing the Grand Jury, congratulated them on the peaceful state of the county, there being only two cases of very trivial importance to be disposed of.

O'DONOVAN ROSSA.

A Brief Sketch of his Remarkable Career.

O'Donovan Rossa will arrive in San Francisco next Thursday or Friday evening, and will be received by a delegation of prominent citizens, and on Sunday he will be the guest of the Knights of the Red Branch, and will accompany them to Belmont to take part in the great Irish National demonstration. He has escaped from the prison in the Pentonville mansions since its inception, and in the Phœnix organization (so-called) previous to that.

He is a gentleman of good education and of superior natural talents. Of all the imprisoned Fenian leaders there was the most popular as O'Donovan Rossa. His frank and genial manners gained him a large good will of all with whom he came in contact, and his thorough devotedness and independence of character, his great courage, his quick perception of his organized associates; while his intrinsic good qualities as a man and a friend had so endeared him to his neighbors in his native district, that few men in the South of Ireland had a larger personal following than he. He is somewhat above the middle height, very cordial and affable, with an open and rather handsome countenance. His first experience of an English prison was when he was arrested with several others for the Phœnix conspiracy, and confined with his companions after several months of incarceration, the jury before which he was tried not having agreed to a verdict.

No sooner was he restored to liberty than he resumed his revolutionary labors, and was the managing of the Fenian movement in the South of Ireland up to his removal to Dublin in 1865, when he became manager of the Irish People newspaper in that city. But his labors were not confined to his connection with that journal. He made frequent tours to England and Scotland, and more than once to the United States, in the service of the organization. He was arrested in September, 1865, with the other conductors of the Irish People. When tried, soon after, he defended himself with consummate tact.

On being convicted of treason and felony, he was sentenced to penal servitude for life. While in prison he displayed the same indomitable pluck which always characterized him. Of course he was subjected to the many penalties, such as dark cells, bread and water, etc. On one occasion, for a trivial breach of prison rules, he was subjected to the indignity of having his hands tied behind his back for twenty-one days, in solitary confinement, which position compelled him to eat his food, such as it was, in quadruped fashion. But evidently this brutal treatment did not have the effect of subduing him, for he is now servilely engaged in organizing and arousing his countrymen in the United States to aid in the same cause for which he has suffered so much. His will address the people at Belmont Park next Sunday on the subject of Irish revolution, and also deliver a course of lectures previous to his departure from this coast. His sufferings for and devotion to the cause of Irish independence have made him popular with his countrymen.

O'Donovan Rossa is now about forty-five years of age, and the proprietor of a hotel in New York. His stay in San Francisco will be brief.—Call.

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1876.

THE BLIND MAN'S BRIDE.

When first, beloved in vanished hours
The blind man sought my heart to gain,
The world was bright as flowers;
Now fresh and fair those flowers appear,
The bright'ning light made these to blow,
But dimmed were all to me.

As laugh, as years rolled swiftly on,
They talked to me of Time's decay,
Of notes from the soft closing eye,
Of locks frosted by age;
Of all these lessons I heeded not;
The world was changing for me.

And still, beloved, still His grows cold,
Well wander 'neath the genial sky,
And ne'er know that we are old.
By counting happy hours gone by,
They check their speed, and we
Say brown locks are beautiful as gray,
But oh the voice which first I love,
Still keeps the same sweet tone to me.

Mrs. Mrs. Norton.

THE GREAT AMERICAN WEAKNESS.

Deacon Grimes called the other day upon Mrs. Butterwick to ask for a subscription to the Missionary Society. The following conversation took place:

"Your husband is a Presbyterian, I believe, Mrs. Butterwick?" said the deacon.

"No," replied Mrs. B., "he belongs to no church. He is a man of sense, and has no crotchets. That's what I say to him, that while he is living so much he'd better give something decent, that'll do him some good. But he says he has no time. He spends most of every day among his various kinds. He's the smallest man for such things you ever saw, and all the time Wednesday to his Red Men night, Thursday to his Temperance Club, Friday to his bowling, along with the Odd Fellows, and all day Sunday he is visiting sick and widows and orphans of dead members. If there were sixty days in a week, I believe he would have lodge to attend every night.

"My trimmes, that man would spend more money on his regalia than he would afterwards. And he's awful mysterious about them. You never can tell by looking at him what the current of the Chicago wave reversed, and it now discharges its waters, as well as when it broke Michigan, into the Illinois, and through that, via the Mississippi, into the Gulf of Mexico, instead of into the Gulf of St. Lawrence."

As a relic of olden bigotry in Maryland the following from the Maryland Gazette, Annapolis, of July 31st, 1745, will be read with interest now that intolerance is again cropping up here and there throughout the land: "Last Thursday the following persons were executed at Gallows Hill, Thomas Higby and James Carter. They suffered as they had lived, ignorant obstinate Roman Catholics, and at their desire were buried into their coffins with their clothes and crosses and other religious trumpery in them. Their behavior was reported by his Excellency. These men were all English subjects taken on board a French privateer, going to Scotland in that service."

Josh Billings says: "The inwerly is larger bird than the goose or turkey—it has two wings, and they are made to fly with, and it wears its wings on the side of its body."

Unknown to all the world's bright zone,

Unknown where flesh hath bestowe

The light of earth's renowne!
Unknown in life, unknown in death,

But where the lowly noonday trod

Unseen, unheard, his mighty rod,

Where fiercely burned the fever flame,

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— The wittiest and most genial priest in England is dead—Dr. Marshall, Catholic priest of Bedford. He was one of the first converts in the Oxford movement, and was remote to the late Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Winchester. He was a splendid preacher, a holy priest and a cheerful companion.

— The Redemptorist Fathers recently gave a mission in Leeds, England, in which all the local clergy co-operated. The result was the addition of 5,000 to the population of 20,000, not less than 12,000 went to confession. Twenty-five hundred were confirmed, and one hundred and sixty converts were baptized.

— We notice the death of Rev. Edward Buckley, one[illegible] many years in Rohersnbrenna, parish of Rathfarnham. He was a leading health for some time. One of the oldest clergymen in the diocese of Kildare and Leighlin, Rev. John Mc-Donough, P. P. Rossnaile, died recently, aged eighty-four.

— The Pope is about to create Mgr. Fontana, Bishop of Ayer, a Count of the Roman Empire, with the title of "Private Domestic Prelate of His Holiness and "Assistant at the Throne Pontifical." This is a rare distinction, and modern Italian honor upon the prelate who is the object.

— On the Feast of St. Joseph's Convent of Mercy, Ottawaville, was[illegible] Wednesday, 15th ult., made their religious profession—Miss Cecilia Hughes (in religion, Sister M. Ignatius), Rochester, N. Y.; and Miss Kate Cooly (in religion, Sister M. Augustine), of Kilkenny, Ireland.

— On Sunday, May 7th, the Feast of the Patronage of St. Joseph, the new church of St. Charles Borromeo, at Twentieth and Christian streets, Philadelphia, was solemnly dedicated by the Most Rev. Archbishop Wood, who celebrated Pontifical Mass at 10:30. The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Bishop O'Hara, of Scranton, who, as pastor of St. Dominic's, was present at the inception of all that section of the city.

— Several years ago a few converts in a[illegible] to erect a convent for the Sisters of Mercy and endure worth of Church property in Dubuque, Iowa, by the payment of the last of four thousand dollars. Recently, however, upon discovering that during the widespread ebb of the tide of immigration the Church had been the neglected, took immediate steps to relieve the vast property of its incumbrances. The deed in full of the same was offered, too, twenty times the amount was tendered; but the good Sisters have his proved of flesh, and this time his sound was the whole property. The sum was brought to the Convent, and has been safely deposited in the vaults of the Bishop.

THE UNKNOWN SISTER OF CHARITY.

Unknown to fashion's tinsel throng,
The restless and the vain;
Unknown where ringeth folly's song
And pleasure's syren strain;
Unknown where Sickle fame bestows
Her evanescent crown,
While for a fleeting instant glows
The light of earth's renown;
Unknown in life, unknown in death,
Her name and deeds unsung,
She toileth not the trumpet breath
To waft her deeds on high.
But where pleads at noonday rod
Or at the fatal way;
And where, beneath his weighing rod,
The stricken thousands lay—
Where Eternity hurled the fever flame,
And rang the dying groan,
Full well the Sister's holy name
And gentle face were known.
And while her life's unwearied summer breathed
On her the breath of heaven,
The final eternal was wreathed
The "deeper waiter" beyond.
She saw in every tortured one
Her anguish-laden Lord;
For Him her holy work was done—
For Him it claimed reward.
What though no flaunting banners wave
Where mercy's meaty shine;
What though above her nameless grave
No sterling monument swells;
Who scanned her soul's deeper sway
Who knew her purpose pure,
The unfinished temple of the King
Were her triumphal pride;
And where Love wrote her blessed name
Above his radiant throne,
In heaven's light of glorious fame
She lives forever known.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— The wittiest and most genial priest in England is dead—Dr. Marshall, Catholic priest of Ross. He was one of the first converts in the Oxford movement. He was a secretary to the late Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Winchester. He was a splendid preacher, and a holy priest and a cheerful companion.

The result was that out of a Catholic population of 30,000, not less than 15,000 went to confession. Twenty-five hundred were confirmed, and one hundred and sixty converts were baptised.

— We notice the death of Rev. Edward Buckley, curate for many years in Robertsbridge, parish of Mathfarnham. He had been in failing health for some time. One of the oldest clergymen in the province of Kildare and Leighlin, Rev. John Mooney, F. P. Rossenille, died recently, aged eighty-four.

Bishop O'Hara, of Scranton, whose eloquent effort, Sunday's, was worthy of the utterer of all that section of the city.

— Several years ago a Jew obtained a title to over one hundred and fifty lots and valuable pieces of Church property in Dubuque, Iowa, by the payment of the tax of four thousand dollars. Bishop Hennessy, upon discovering that during the widowhood of his see the interests of the Church had been neglected, took immediate steps to relieve the vast property of its incumbrance. The money for the taxes was offered; ten, twenty times the amount was tendered; but the Jew would have his pound of flesh, and this time his pound was the whole property. The case was brought to the Courts, and has been settled forcibly to the claims of the Bishop.

— The new Catholic Cathedral at Savannah, Ga., was dedicated on Sunday, April 30. There was an immense attendance from other cities. Indisputable Evidence.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1874. Dr. R. V. PIERCE, M. D., Buffalo, N. Y.: I wish to add my testimony to the wonderful curative properties of your Alt. Ret. I was a sufferer from Catarrh for several years, and almost despaired of ever finding relief. I was induced to try your remedy, and after using three bottles I was entirely cured. I have since recommended it to many friends, and have yet to hear of a single case in which it has failed to effect a permanent cure. I have recommended the use of three medicines to many of my friends, and they are now among the most successful physicians in the house, and freely endorse them. I am now in the enjoyment of health, which I thought, an impure state of the blood, and to no one can I more heartily refer than to those who have known me for years. I will only mention one of the many cases that have come under my notice. Mrs. Hiram Kinney, Tremont, Ontario, of whom I have frequently heard my wife speak, was for years afflicted with a humor in the blood, which was completely controlled by your medicines. She was also troubled with bronchitis and a hacking cough, which had so much reduced her system as to render her unable to walk across the room without resting. She was induced to try your medicines, and after using a few bottles was entirely cured. Yours truly, W. H. CHAMBERLIN.

The Emperor of Brazil and suite arrived in Washington last Sunday. He registered at the Arlington as Viscount Dom Pedro. He attended St. Matthew's Catholic Church in the morning; in the afternoon he visited Arlington and Mount Vernon, and spent the evening at the National Observatory. Dom Pedro's programme is to visit Philadelphia and the Navy Yard, and it is probable that courtesies will be exchanged between him and the President.

VOL. XIX. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1876. NO. 33.

J. O'DONOVAN ROSSA.

HIS LECTURE ON Irish Liberty and English Prison Life
—AT—
Platt's Hall, Wednesday, May 17, 1876.
[Phonographically Reported for The Monitor.]

J. O'Donovan Rossa was greeted with a large audience at Platt's Hall on Wednesday evening. The subject of his lecture was "Irish Liberty and English Prison Life." Supervisor Hayes presided, and there were also on the platform, Capt. M. Greany, Mr. Burke Phillips, Judge Cooney, Capt. John Finnegan, Captain Stackpool, and Mr. O'Leary. Supervisor Hayes said: In the absence of the Mayor, the Committee have selected me to do the honors of the evening. It becomes my pleasant duty to introduce the eloquent lecturer, O'Donovan Rossa, a gentleman well known to you all if not personally, by name and reputation. His name is spoken of with respect in every hamlet and cities where an Irish heart beats. He is a gentleman who has suffered in prison, and has been tortured for the interest he has taken in Ireland and in the cause which is dear to every man, woman and child who has a drop of Irish blood coursing through his veins. I now have the pleasure of introducing to you the lecturer of the evening, a gentleman who has been an inhabitant of this city for years, as he stated to the Judge on a certain memorable occasion."

MR. O'DONOVAN ROSSA,

On coming forward, was greeted with prolonged cheering, and several bouquets were presented to him. He said:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen—I thank you very cordially for the reception you have given me this evening. I assure you there is some prejudice against strangers coming into this country, and that I was one of that class I can well understand. I know of a good many people who have undertaken to speak for me, and I come here to speak for myself this evening, and you will have to excuse me, if you please, after listening to me. There are a good many things about Ireland to speak of, and I do not know that I can say anything to give you information, but that did not break his spirit of independence; for a few nights after he delivered a lecture on "Native-American Ireland" in a Boston hall, in the course of which he gave utterance to some expressions which gave offense to a few Native-Americans in the audience. After the conclusion of the discourse he was applauded by some half a dozen individuals, one of whom told him he had given expression to some things which he—the Doctor—knew not to be untrue. "Do you see that door, friend?" asked the Doctor. "Yes," replied the now half-frightened individual. "Well, get through it before I rise from my seat, or I'll put you through it quicker," answered the Doctor, in a tone of unmistakable earnestness. He rose from his seat, removed his spectacles, and when he came "to look for his man" he was only in time to see him shoot through the door and disappear around the corner.

A Widely Applicable Remedy.

Few remedies are applicable to such a wide range of disorders as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and it is no wonder that so many physicians adopted to the care of such—such a pressure would be manifestly absurd—but on account of its wonderful superiority effect upon the general tone of the system and its alterative action upon the organs of nutrition, secretion and discharge. Besides the numerous properties as a remedy for intermittent and remittent fevers, dyspepsia, constipation, atrophy of the liver, general debility, urinary and uterine affections, it invariably proves to be highly serviceable in overcoming scrofula, hypochondria, rheumatism, insomnia, and many other disorders, and therefore, should be in possession of every family, ever one wanting the benefits of a safe and an imperfect appearance of the physical functions.

THE EXHIBITING FUND.

Some of you have got up a prejudice against me, and I see one in it on account of this Skirmishing Fund. I have heard myself spoken of as a terrible fellow, as if I were the very devil on earth. [Laughter.] I think I must not be myself at all, as the old song says. However, there is one thing I do say fearlessly, I will say it and will not quibble, and I have the liberty to say it. It is this, that England has ever behaved murderously, and that she has behaved dishonestly, and never scrupled to read texts anything that opposed her interests in Ireland; and if we are going to war, why we go to war with an enemy that has no mercy or compassion in any manner, and that has no honor to appeal to. If we are to go to war, I go in just for fighting the devil with his own weapons. [Applause and Laughter.]

You must put on your boots and horns if you are going to fight with the devil, and if you are to go to war with England you must not have any punctilious scruples about how you shall treat her. In so far as I am concerned honor, to give it a name, is out of question."

Respecting the character of the Fenian leaders, I will read for you an extract from Isaac Butt's pamphlet. It was written without any gathered round them at first there are few men who tow deep in the principles of Irish nationality, or the merits of political sincerity, or a deep and earnest devotion to the welfare of Ireland in their cause, and if an unselfish and disinterested devotion to that cause. I was placed by my self-imposed duty in a false light. I gave me some opportunity of observing them in a position of difficulty and danger. Both I and those that were associated with me in that relation have been which few men in their position would have thought wrong. No money or selfish object was ever sought on. Only, very many messages were courteously to which I could not attend. And we were the most overstrained anxiety to avoid even a semblance of departure from

THE LAWS OF HONOR.

There was not one of them who would have purchased his safety by a falsehood, by a concession that would have wrought dishonor to a cause, or by a disclosure of counsel did not need sentinelling our failure, regretting that I would not be a senator. He men and look to my own interests; and he began to play the poor servant girl, cheated out of their dollars. "Hard Times," I said, "those minds were you elected out of?" and he said, "Oh, I was too cute for them; they did not get a dollar of my money." Oh, I dwelt on those we must rely to work out the independence of Ireland. We are the representatives of an enslaved country. We would have more respect paid us but for this one brand of slavery on us, and the fact that our mother land is in chains.

Respecting the character of the Fenian leaders, I will read for you an extract from Isaac Butt's pamphlet. It was written by one who had every only had his mother evidently met some one she was glad to see, but he had recognized in the same person the woman who had been so kind to him in the street two or three days before.

"And you, Elsie," said she, when her questions permitted her to speak, "how does it happen that I find you in America?"

"Ah! sure, Miss Kathleen, dear, it's no wonder ye'd say so, and it's a long story it is, an' a heart-sore, too.

"Poor Elsie! Some more English lyrzany, I suppose. Well, I'll wait for the story. Come here, Eugene. This is my son, Klien, my only child—the last of the name, and born in America."

"Ah! a brave, fine man to bear his father's name." She kissed his little hand extended to her, as we read of subjects kissing the hands of princes; then she looked into his face with a deep, searching look, which he bore with the steady gaze of a young eagle. "God bless him, Miss Kathleen! Shure he has the Murrogh eye, though it's the pity her or yer father he is, all out. Ah! wasn't it meself sold, when Bridget, the crachure, could see the way he sand up for her among the scholars—meself said it was more like a Murrogh than anythin' I'd bard sence I kem to America!"

"But, mamma!" said straightforward Eugene, "you didn't tell me who is Bridget's mother?"

"Who am I, dear, is it? Shure I'm proud to say it—it's the one mother nursed us, an' it's her foster sister I am, an' we wor reared together, so' married or single, sorra a day we wor parted till the heart-break kem. Dis he know, Kathleen?"—this in a half whisper—"is the burnin' shame on us all, I mane?"

"I know all about my father, ma'am," said Eugene proudly; "and I am not ashamed he was a martyr for God and Ireland; and when I'm a man I'm going to fight against England!"

"A! this God bless him, Miss Kathleen, agrah; isn't it like a book he talks, an' didn't he look like grandfather all out, when he said it? An' shame when did a Fitzgerald or a Murrogh want the pluck or good words whin spakin' was to the fore at all!"

Just then the door opened, and Eugene's defender of the day before entered whistling. At sight of the visitors he stopped short, and stood in the center of the floor, in a way, a funny picture of unbounded astonishment and queer bashfulness commingled. Under one arm he carried a bundle of papers, and under the other a package from which something was dripping in a rather irregular manner over his clothes. This little Bridget, instead, from motives of pity for the boor, to take out of his grasp, and his mother snatching his torn hat from his head as the same moment, said the latter, formed a rather comical tableau. Eugene, however, was equal to the occasion, and at once observing his embarrassment, and his mother's evident amusedcedness at this rude entrance, by an action that contained both politeness and delicacy. Going over to where she boy stood, at a loss what to do with himself, he took him by the hand and led him to where his mother sat. "Mamma," said he seriously, "this is Bridget's brother; the boy that defended me when our fellows were going to hurt me the other day. And I want you and grandpa to be his friends."

"Ah! bless the crachure. Sure he's my own! he's one of the rale old stock!" said Mrs. Maher in an aside, at sight of the graceful and gracious act.

"And grandpa and I," said Eugene's mother taking the boy's rough and, if it must be told, rather black hand in hers, "cannot be otherwise than friends to your defender and friend Master Klien."

"Thank you, ma'am," said the newsboy with a bow, not graceful to be sure, but regarded as the best one of the whole range of

YOUNG IRELAND.

Jimmy O'Hara, whisper—when the time for school is over,
Don't run home to your mother, but old whitethorn, and I'll show you pleas gaiety—
Shoulder sticks, Jimmy, rusty and red and old,
But dearer to you and to me, boy, than newest hurley of gold.

You remember the bright Blue Bower, Jimmy, that spring's south the branches there,
Thrushes and blackbirds building, and linnets by scores without and red-cock and jay?
But the finest music down there is the night, and I thought
Out in the nine with the shamrock and that blooms on by my mother's grave.

So I came with my spade one evening, when the Hawthorn had ceased their song,
And sirred deep in the stony earth, Jimmy, for the roots were many and strong;
And the treasure you hold in your hand, boy, I turned with the flesh of clay.
And the Blue Bower was high in the mountain ere the last sun I recorded away.

And my heart beat fast with a wild delight as I counted them one by one,
And I sweet them, and felt more proud, Jimmy, than a king on his golden throne
God's rest to the hands that bore them, their struggle was not in vain,
Brave work for the boys in the winter nights to polish them up again.

And the leather bootlet will come, Jimmy, from the tail of the Sally pony,
And we'll mount a prancer instead of our own brave boys, the flower of Sally ponies,
With our sashes and green cockades, Jimmy, we'll march to the tune of the Rose,
And I place on a Kinmel Artygarv, the foremost in freedom's race.

We'll never forget the hours, Jimmy, we've spent in the Bower this year,
Planning our lives for Ireland, or what would make the birds sweeter,
While the birds showered down the blossoms and the silver rain-drops shook,
And we nestled up from the western hills the pillow of gold to look.

And we've stolen away from our comrades' play to the Bower of our long ago—
Those glorious days when the Northern clans, by Thomas Moore and Hope led on,
Through many a God of damnation blood stood victories on freedom's shore.

And we knelt on the sod and prayed that our hands might arise for her cause one day.

And blister our hearts saying learn, Jimmy, and fierce the task may be,
From the blazing hearth and the old men's tales of the exploits of Owner Roe.

And we've heard with heart-pain bounding the battle's thrilling cheer,
And we've seen the flag struggling high the blackened rafters among,
And glimpses of a future glory flashed by on the wings of song,
And sang prayed hand while the sky grew dim at the tale of our country's wrong.

O, think of the glorious day, Jimmy, when our flag with its harp of gold—
And the smiles of heaven's bright angels nestling in every fold—
Shall fly on the hills sails, boy, and flash on the waves of the sea,
And we'll call with that flag through the blood of the false to wave in Dub in free.

And many a vengeful exile from us exile of the setting sun
Shall come to be native hills again with wife and children and gun;
We'll run a race from Bantry Bay to the mountain-skirts of grand Tyrone,
And the sweet Bower that's now a LEE FAIRIES from the grass of old Athlone.

And side by side we'll fight, Jimmy, to breach or on open field,
With the exultancy back through all the battle's smoke and our lasting blades to shield;
And if I fall you'll look on me, boy, with a tear in your eye,
And dash its fields again, boy, in the face of the Saxon foe.

A Presbyterian Divine on the Education Question.

There have been a good many things written on the education question by Catholics and Protestants, but we have seen nothing better—perhaps we might say nothing so good as the following extract from a letter written by Rev. Dr. Dabney to the Superintendent of the Virginia State Schools. They put the argument in a more intelligible form for Americans than all the pamphlets and lectures published during the last year. We undoubt the letter will have a greater effect upon public opinion. He says:

You think it inconsistent in me to disapprove any State action, because I am not a professor in a "free school"—the so-called public seminary. That seminary is, indeed, truly a "free school." It shanghies, low, for that word." Founded and sustained by the general taxation of the people, good men, it gives free tuition in divinity to young men of all denominations—even the most opposed to the one professing the ministry. It is honestly and really a free school"—supported by free gifts, attended by free, voluntary pupils. No penny of the salary of its teachers is exacted by the tax-gatherer from any individual, except by a projector or an incubation which would disappoint. Your free school," like not a few of the other pretensions of Radicalism, are in fact exactly opposite to the name falsely applied to them. Because of those who pay the money for them do not, and freely," but by compulsion. They are virtually taxed to pay for what they have a priori. And the exemplars you most love and imitate not only are not thus supported compulsory, but the attendance also, as your consciousness will doubtless cause you to do in Virginia and in a few years The only freedom of your system it is your freedom to nourish people's money.

We begin by reasserting the familiar oh, because, we often see ourselves practically dismissed, that the principle upon which the State introduces into the personal obligation and duties of every individual citizen a general care and agrarian. It is the the teaching of the Bible and of sound political science that the education of children belongs to the sphere of the family and to the duty of the parents. The theory that the children of the Commonwealth are the charge of the Commonwealth is a pagan one, derived from heathen sparta and Republican Rome, and connected by regular, logical sequence with legalized prostitution and the dissolution of the conjugal tie. Ton dispensation of Divine Providence decentralizes the social grade and the duty of the children on those reaching adult age by the diligence and faithfulness of their parents, just as the pecuniary condition of children at that epoch is determined. The desire of providing for their children a desirable condition in all these respects in the grand stimulus which Providence has provided for the efforts of parents. It is the strong motive that youth shall inherit the estate you have labored for from your parents, and prove it by their own exertions, as said by the Christian philanthropy of their lather-

Words of Wisdom.

In these latter years those who sought to abandon religion with patriotism have had many trials to endeavor to make it professe to endure. Yet it would seem not only that nothing was easier, but that no difficulty could exist. True patriotism requires that the love of country origin; true religion cannot exist without foundation; for the sentiment of right, justice pure and ennobled from on high—this basis is the heart of both, being, as it were, a common pulse—the pulse of the soul and the pulse of the body—the pulse of religion and the soul of patriotism. But though truth be immaculate and immutable, and good men and true men will err in their application of it to the conduct of human things, and not less but rather more to ninsity on each and every point existed, drawn a foolish dream. Much would have been one of stagnation. It did not exist in the days of the Liberator—not even during his struggle for Emancipation—nor in his battle against the Veto—nor in his long labor for Repeal. There were Catholic clergymen and Catholic laymen opposed to him on all these occasions but their opposition did not make him or his followers less earnest in the faith, or less ardent in the pursuit of their great object.

They differed strongly and spoke strongly, because their faith was strong. Apathy may be an infinitely worse symptom than difference. Scarcely in this country as yet is there a Protestant writer of bigoted insolence, and extracted from an article which might be called a silly boy's statement to attack the Vatican. "The Pope advanced," writes Mr. Aldrich, "to the center of the upper end of the room, leaning heavily on his ivory-handled cane, the prince in black and the Cardinals in scarlet standing behind him in picturesque groups. It was a pleasure to turn from the impassible prime minister [Cardinal Antonelli] to the gentle but intelligent lovely figure of his aogus master, with his small, sparkling eyes, remarkably piercing when he looked at you point-blank, and a smile none the less winsome that it lighted up a mouth denoting unusual force of will. His face was not at all the face of a man who had passed nearly half a century in arduous diplomatic and ecclesiastical labors; it was certainly the face of a man who had led a temperate, blameless private life. . . . Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti was born at Sinigaglia, May 13th, 1792; the week previous to this reception he had celebrated his 83d birthday; but he is on such vigorous terms with the duties of his cream-white skull cap of brocadeth pattern, and the beautiful scarlet of the same material—a costume that lent an appropriate of height to an undecided, sinuty-looking face. With his silvery hair straggling from beneath the skull-cap, and his flowing robes, the Pope looked a little, a little heavy, and perhaps because of the double chin, a very beautiful old man. . . . After passing the evening at the Vatican, I was addressed to his guest on the occasion of forthcoming Jubilee. French, in which he wished a prosperous voyage to those pilgrims whose houses lay beyond the Seas. Many of them, he said, would be touched, as he did briefly, on the miseries of the Church, an adorable fire came into his eyes; fifty of the pilgrims, winters skipped from him as if by enchantment, and for a few seconds he stood forth in the prime of life. He spoke some five minutes or more, and nothing could have been more dignified and graceful than his manner and the manner of his words. The benediction was followed by a general rustle and movement among the princes and Cardinals at the farther end of the room; the doubtful sound of the departed softly, and closed, and that was the last the Pope saw of us."

Miraculous Cure.

A young Washingtonian named John Brenneo, says the Georgetown Courier, left home about five weeks ago with the earnest hope of obtaining relief from a seemingly incurable disease through the efficacy of the waters of Lourdes. It may here be stated that several marvelous recoveries have lo recent years been from time to time effected at the grotto, and therefore the water is greatly prized by devout Catholics everywhere. Lourdes is in France, in the department of Hautes Pyrenees. Writing to his intimate friend and schoolmate, as also to his family, Mr. Brennon says, under date of Hotel de la Grotte, Lourdes, March 27, 1876:

Dear Friend: I have arrived in Lourdes all right, after a very tiresome and disagreeable journey. Traveling here and in the United States are very different things, particularly in cold weather. However, I am here at last, and I am now to tell you I possess a most beautiful miracle on Saturday, March was the Feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, and also the anniversary of her principal apparition in the grotto. In this miracle—a miraculous cure of a young woman from Bordeaux—you have been paralyzed for the last ten years. I was left in the 7:47 train to join another train at 10 in a cart and placed in the center aisle, near the altar. The priest who gave her Communion had to come outside of the railing to do so.

Immediately after Mass she was carried down to the grotto, and, after using the water, she stood up and walked to the altar and received Communion. She is a heavily breakfast, a thing she has been unable to do for years. Her self-joy, as well as her head was much drawn to one side that she could hardly swallow anything but a little soup. Her tongue was drawn also, that she could not speak. She is now perfectly well, and indeed so was every one who saw her. She was laughing and crying and trying to talk for joy, and the whole audience of 4,000 was singing and clapping. It is really a most beautiful sight. I have seen a number of cases which may be considered miraculous, but this is the most wonderful of all. I have been to the grotto twice, and I am going there again this morning. I will write you again in a few days, and tell you all about it. I am feeling very well, and am enjoying myself very much. Your friend,

JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

The A. O. H.

A correspondent asks us about the religious status of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in the diocese of Cincinnati. We answer, that the A. O. H. is not under the ban from censure, but is classed among the Catholic societies of the diocese. It has no taint of secrecy—it is not even considered suspicious. In all its workings it exhibits a healthy Catholic spirit. Its members receive the Sacraments in a body twice a year, in accordance with a law of the organization. They participate in all Catholic celebrations, and show a respect for authority and generously at the call of Catholic charity. As far as the ecclesiastical authorities of the diocese of Cincinnati are concerned, the A. O. H. is above reproach.

The only fault that we can find with the society is a strong inclination at funerals to useless expenditure and foolish extravagance. The money spent on coffins in profit lines display could be devoted, without harm to the society, to other and better purposes. This fault is noted, however, is no unfriendly spirit—on the contrary, we would counsel correction in behalf of the poor members and for the benefit of widows and orphans. The past history of the A. O. H. in this quarter of the country is satisfactory. We are quite certain that the different branches of the order have no affiliation with any dangerous societies under other names elsewhere. We believe that they would repudiate with sincere scorn any such alliance. Their loyalty to the Church, of which, as far as we know (and we think honesty that everybody wondered how he could love her, and by and by he went on to think that an explanation would be in order. He borrowed a claw of tobacco of a man near the door and remarked, "I'm going to hog that girl all the way home, though I know she isn't very pury." "I wouldn't," briefly replied the man. "And that's where you fool yourself," continued the young man. "When I'm hugging a hundred acres of clean, nice land with forty head of stock on it, I can make the home-liest girl in the world look like an angel; I can, I can."

Archbishop Williams and the "Pilot."

It is a truly excellent and admirable work which Archbishop Williams of Boston has taken upon himself in connection with the affairs of Mr. Patrick Donohoe, of the Boston Pilot, who lately fell ill to bankruptcy. Mr. Donohoe, besides running his newspaper, had been carrying on extensive banking business, receiving on deposit, in sums ranging from $25 upward, the savings of hard-working men and women, who put their entire trust in his integrity. The amount of these deposits from laborers, mechanics, servants, washerwomen and needlewomen, reached, according to the published list, as high as $73,000, and their losses resulted in an incalculable amount of sorrow and suffering. Into the care of Archbishop Williams and his priests their pitiable tales were poured, and he began to cast about for some way of relieving them. After a time he offered to purchase the Pilot, put $30,000 into its business, and raise more money in its behalf. We now learn that, after consummating the purchase, the Archbishop proposes to pay every dollar due to the people who have deposited money with the former proprietor. This is a noble deed, which will be appreciated not only by the beneficiaries, but by the people at large. The Archbishop has won a strong place in many some other people connected with banking institutions would do well to follow. He was born

Irish and Catholic Journal in California.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

SATURDAY ..... MAY 20, 1876.

SUBSCRIBERS will please specially look at the printed label on the margin or wrapper of the paper; the date thereon shows when the subscription expires.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The remittances to this office have been falling off steadily for some time. Now, this is by no means as it should be. As every subscriber can find how his account stands by simply looking at the wrapper or margin of his paper, there is no excuse for negligence or forgetfulness. No person should be deterred from remitting by the fact that his indebtedness is small. Our expenses are always the same, and have to be met punctually each week. There would never be the least difficulty in the way of doing this if our patrons who only owe a little would send on that little to us, and so keep clear on the books. As a word of advice has at all times been lost in good part by our subscribers, and has produced excellent effects, we trust this gentle reminder will be both acceptable and fruitful.

EASTERN MISUNDERSTANDINGS.

It is generally believed that "ta'le has no legs." Considering the large number that have traveled from this place in reference to the Chinese question, and are now wandering through the columns of the leading newspapers, we are strongly inclined to doubt the correctness of the old saying. It seems to us as though if were truth which has not the power of locomotion, because we cannot notice that it has yet made its appearance in the same quarter. How the Eastern people can take up with such strange and erroneous ideas upon a matter not at all mysterious in its nature and open to the fullest examination, puzzles us extremely. Certainly it does not reflect any credit upon their intelligence. The public journals speak as if the objections we have to Chinese immigration arise from the dislike of our working people to put in competition with cheap labor. They insinuate, if they do not openly assert, that our white mechanics are paid too much; they regard the influx of Mongolians as a happy means of bringing down wages to the proper standard. In both of these things they are very much mistaken. Our artizans and mechanics are not averse to, and have no dread of, honest, able competition of any kind. Their exertions are not a cent in excess of what is required to maintain themselves and their families in decency and comfort. They are not extravagant, and do not demand more than a fair remuneration for their labor. If they chose to adopt Chinese fashions and manners of living, they could compete with the Mongolians easily enough; but, we fancy, that would be the reverse of advantageous to the country.

Americans want a comfortable home to live in, they like to see it wholesome food, and they have a desire to wear good clothing. Moreover, they think it part of a man's duty to marry and rear a family. Chinamen can make one home do the work of fifty, by stowing themselves away on narrow shelves in tiers. They can subsist upon stuff that affords no nourishment to a white man. They do not bring their own women with them, nor do they have any carry with the women of this country, and, as a natural consequence, they have no families. In no respect whatever do they resemble us, with the exception of the possession of wind. They are simply want to have labor cheap may say "Yes," but the bulk of the people of this country will indignantly exclaim, "No!" The great employers live off the money, to supply whose waste is their proper business, and any action that tends to lower the standard of comfort in which the latter live is really injurious to their interests, as the policy they advocate is a most short-sighted and suicidal one. But a walk of seventy minutes duration through the Chinese quarter in this city will better illustrate the Mongolian difficulty than could be done by writing a dozen leading articles. We do not think it possible that any intelligent man, after the briefest inspection of their abodes, could defend the policy which allows them free entry into the country. The question is one which affects us very closely; we have here practical experience of the evils resulting from Coolie immigration, and we can scarcely be patient under the misstatements and absurdities perpetrated by the Eastern journals. They can afford to philosophize about the matter, and discuss the pros and cons very coolly, because they do not suffer from the infliction, nor are they likely to. Yet they have no right to expect that we shall continue to suffer wrong and injury for the sake of carrying out their arrogant and theory of "universal brotherhood," or their fine dreams principles of philanthropy.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Special Committee which is now engaged in investigating the conduct of Federal officers in Louisiana is eliciting some very curious revelations. They do not such as to afford much gratification to those who have the welfare of republican government at heart. Indeed, in their way they surpass the most unpleasant stories about Spanish misrule and the oppression of the will of the people. The men who should be a terror to criminals only, have turned round and become the scourge of peaceful and law-abiding citizens. To cover up fraud innocent men are cast into prison, and kept there without trial until it pleases their jailers to release them. Important documents are abstracted from the Courts and destroyed, so as to secure the acquittal of indicted rogues. Objectionable parties are marked out for assassination, and parties are hired to kill them. All this is done not by outlaws or bandits or those led by the constituted authorities—by men who represent the Federal Government. What is to be thought of a country where governments is deliberately perverted from its proper functions and run in the interest of schemers and adventurers? Let another country, one of the European monarchies, for example, be described as the scene of similar outrages upon law, and what would an American say? He would certainly declare that the people should rise in their might and sweep the shameful institution from the land. But the unfortunate citizens of Louisiana cannot rebel, for they have had too much of that before, so all they can do is to wait patiently until the justice of their case convinces the men of the North acting through the ballot-box, shall hurl the radical faction from power and place honest men at the head of the affairs of the nation. According to all appearances they will not have long to wait. The cup of Republican iniquity is full to overflowing. They have perpetrated all the wrongs upon the people that they are capable of committing, and their career is drawing to a close. The time is approaching when the honor of this Republic must be vindicated and the world be taught that democratic institutions are not a failure.

REPUBLICANISM IN FRANCE.

Republicanism is evidently not the same everywhere. There are degrees and qualities of it which differ very widely, so that it is difficult to believe they are only varieties of the same system of government. The republicanism which prevails in South America is certainly not the same in character as that we have in this country, nor is it so well calculated to make a nation free and prosperous. The republicanism of France is also different to some very essential qualities, and we doubt very much whether it ought to be accounted republicanism at all. Americans, notwithstanding their national sharpness, are very apt to be deceived by a name, and so long as a government is called republican they are only too happy to accept it as such. Hence, they frequently lend their support to and encourage governments which are really most tyrannical and despotic than any monarchy or empire known to the civilized world. The scoundrels and schemers whom successful revolutions place at the head of affairs in South American republics, who assume power exactly as a highwayman takes one's purse, are accepted as popular rulers, with a better title to their position than the occupant of the most ancient throne. Common sense would, we think, suggest that the right of all rulers, by whatever title they are called, should be judged by the amount of good they do and the duties of government, and the degree of personal liberty enjoyed by the people subject to their laws. It seems to us that in the latter respect, French republicanism is eminently deficient. The individuals who in that country represent republican principles have adopted as their theory of government that there should be the fullest liberty to think as they do, but not the slightest liberty to think otherwise.

In the recent elections for Senators and Deputies this intolerance was exhibited in a very striking manner, so glaringly, indeed, that foreign journals most friendly to France were compelled to notice it. Upon the most trivial pretence the election of Bonapartists, Orleanists and Legitimists were set aside, and their positions given to Republican candidates, and the will of the people, the very foundation of Republican Government, was set at naught. A favorite excuse for this despotic interference with the freedom of election was "clerical intimidation." An indorsement from a Bishop or a priest was fatal to a candidate unless he happened to be a Republican, and was deemed a sufficient excuse for depriving him of his seat in the Parliament. One would imagine that Catholic clergymen had lost the common rights of citizenship, and dare not open their lips with advice or warning when the vital interests of their country were at stake. But any other class of men were entirely free to denounce or recommend candidates just as they pleased. The most disreputable demagogues, the most irreconcilable Communists, were accorded the privilege denied to the ministers of God—and this is a Catholic country too! It was no wonder, then, that the London Times, in spite of its notorious hostility to Catholicism, should say that the black senates of a Catholic priest had the same effect upon a French Radical that the sight of a red flag has upon a Spanish bull. Now, we think it will be admitted that in a free country there should be an equal privilege and no class restrictions. A priest should have the same liberty of expressing his opinions, and advocating them before his fellow-countrymen, as a lawyer, a journalist, a merchant, or any other individual. If he should have no more, he assuredly should have no less. The citizens of this Republic may attach great importance to the recommendation of a clergyman just as they think fit; but they are not prepared to admit that the fact of such a recommendation being given, should of itself be sufficient to annul an election, and invalidate the suffrages of the citizens.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE SPORTS OF MARCEL, AND OTHER TALES. LUCAS BROTHERS, AND OTHER STORIES. FLAMING AND OTHER STORIES. NEW YORK: The Catholic Publication Society, 9 Warren street.

These three books are identical in character with those we noticed a couple of weeks ago. Their appearance gives us cheerful proofs of the prosperity of Catholic literature in this country. The volumes are very neatly got up, paper, binding and typography being all that could be desired, and if there were no demand for them, the publishers would be likely to lose a great deal of money. But a demand there must be, or the venture would not have been made even by the most enterprising publishers. When, therefore, we find such really beautiful and attractive books printed for the Catholic public exclusively, we must come to the conclusion that the habit of reading is strengthening and extending among our co-religionists. We know no reason why the literature of America was totally anti-Catholic in sentiment. As a general rule, people will not read that which hurts their feelings or outrages their susceptibilities, and, naturally enough, Catholics did not patronize such publications. Not only is this unreasonable sensitiveness of mind gone, but they were, moreover, utterly false and unmeritorious in moral tone, and a great deal more calculated to do harm than good. It was necessary, therefore, to create a highly creditable specimen of Catholic literature in the domain of fiction, so as to drive out the objectionable works. The Catholic Publication Society, in a most praiseworthy spirit, came to the aid of their co-religionists, and succeeded in the Petaluma Pleading Mills; and all is excellent in execution. The gas fixtures are also an elegant specimen of California work, barring seven eighths of the glass globes, which are, as usual, (ours) headed by the reverend superintendent, and the carvings in the counters and searches is processed to the gave, on which, on the conclusion of the De Profundis, the grave is to be filled in. Several clergymen of the order, who will be happy to give them a hearty greeting when they come back among them once more.

We have to thank Hon. W. A. Piper for a copy of the Message from the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the commencement of the first session of the forty-fourth Congress, with reports of the Heads of Departments, and selections from accompanying documents," forming large volume of nearly 900 pages. It contains a large amount of valuable information on national matters, and will always be useful for reference.

New Catholic Church in Petaluma.

On last Sunday the church which has been lately erected at the corner of Howard and Liberty streets, in Petaluma, was solemnly dedicated to Divine service by the Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany. The rapidly increasing numbers of the Catholics of Petaluma had for some time made the existing church entirely inadequate to their wants, and accordingly their pastor, Rev. Father Cleary, commenced the erection of a new one about a year ago. The liberality of his congregation generously responded to his appeal, and, although not entirely finished, the church which was dedicated on Sunday yields to none in the State for beauty and convenience, although its cost has been comparatively small. It is solidly built of wood, resting on a heavy stone foundation, and consists simply of a nave, sanctuary, tower and vestibule, with a neat little style. The body which is free from pillars, measures seventy-two feet in length, by a width of fifty, to which fifteen is to be added for the sanctuary, exclusive of the belfry over at the west side, and a large front porch.

About four hundred and fifty persons can be seated in the pews, exclusive of the space left for passages on each side of the door and altar rails. A gallery for the organ, and also for the accommodation of the children, runs across the south end of the church; but all the rest of the building is open to the roof, which is an open timber one. At a future time it is intended to ornament this roof with carving and tracery, but for the present the principal timbers are only covered with the tower of wood of rafters sheathed with matched redwood. Most of the plaster work and the ornamental of the gallery front have likewise been left out for the present, but will no doubt be completed at no distant day. The sanctuary alone has been finished and painted in fresco, but that suits the spectator to perfection with considerable accuracy of mind as to the appearance of the church will be when completed.

The windows are of stained glass, made by John Mallon of San Francisco, and are a highly creditable specimen of California art workmanship. The pews, pulpit, altar rail and wainscot are all of California woods, varnished. The contractor for the church was Mr. Lowell, and the pews were made by Messrs. Bowman & Wells. Mr. J. W. Foley, Mr. P. J. Fogarty, and Mr. Gentile, of Petaluma, have the credit of the whole of St. Joseph's Asylum for the Blind (an institution in which the door-lead lady and gentleman is specially interested) in the (pews) headed by the reverend superintendent, and the carvings in the counters and searches is processed to the gave, on which, on the conclusion of the De Profundis, the grave is to be filled in. Several clergymen of the order, who will be happy to give them a hearty greeting when they come back among them once more.

Death of Mrs. D. Sullivan.

We regret to announce the death on Wednesday, April 19th, in Dublin, of Mrs. D. Sullivan, wife of Mr. D. Sullivan, of 71 Ambien street, in that city, and formerly of Bantry, in this county. Many friends there will mourn in her one universally regretted, during a long and useful life passed in their midst, throughout which, though not rich herself, she always found something to share with the poor and afflicted. And we doubt not that ever a wider range many friends of her children—Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, M. P., Mr. Daniel Sullivan and Mr. D. B. Sullivan —will sympathize with their sorrow for a dearly loved parent. Telegrams from Bantry and Skibbereen state that the receipt of the sad intelligence in the west of this county called forth wide public demonstrations for the deceased lady and her family. In Bantry and Skibbereen most of the shops, stores, &c., were shut early on Saturday and resolved business. We can scarcely wonder at these demonstrations, considering the places which Mrs. Sullivan was the means of shedding on the locality. She had given to national purposes five acres, and at one time were all together engaged upon the Nation; and, doubtless, her fine sense and brave spirit is due the best of mind and the activity of intellect which has marked the life of her son, Alexander Martin Sullivan, the popular leader of the cause of his country, and the editor of the Nation. Mrs. Sullivan would have a strong claim upon the affectionate regard of Ireland; but we know that the name will live in the heart of the Irish people, though the paths through which they have passed to the grave her sacrifices were different.—Cork Examiner.

FUNERAL OF MRS. SULLIVAN.

Sullivan, M. P., Nation; Daniel Sullivan, Nation; D. B. Sullivan, Nation; Alexander M. Sullivan, Nation; and three of her grandchildren—Master D. B. Sullivan, Master Alexander M. Sullivan and Master Douglas J. E. Sullivan. Rev. E. Quinn, Rev. D. Flanagan, Rev. D. Dempsey (cousins). Rev. John O Donnell (S. Laurence's). Rev. M. J. Aherne, O. M. I.; Rev. M. Kenny, O. M. I.; Rev. M. Gaughran, O. M. I.; Rev. M. O'Hee, C. C., Rush; Rev. J. Benson, S. J.; Rev. J. Gabriel, O. C., Clarendon Street; Rev. Published oak, strewn with flowers, was borne into the church by the family mourners, on the shoulders of the last sons of the deceased, assisted by Dr. N. C. Wheyte, M. P.; Rev. J. Walsh, C. C., Rev. M. J. W. Foley, Mr. P. J. Fogarty, and Mr. Gentile. Of the latter gentleman, the children of St. Joseph's Asylum for the Blind (an institution in which the door-lead lady and gentleman is specially interested) in the (pews) headed by the reverend superintendent, and the carvings in the counters and searches is processed to the gave, on which, on the conclusion of the De Profundis, the grave is to be filled in. Several clergymen of the order, who will be happy to give them a hearty greeting when they come back among them once more.

J. O'DONOVAN ROSSA'S LECTURE.

cause, as she is dead; and if there are any English spies here they know where James Stephens lived. In whatever respect the lady may be false, they are liars when they say whenever the question of Irish liberty is concerned. I was taken to London, and I thought I was taken there for the purpose of getting some fair treatment, because, as I told you, we were not allowed to keep a wink in the Dublin prison. I thought they would treat me like a human being under that great Christian missionary Government of England; but I was not there very long before I had to be sensible, however, I was determined to bear my imprisonment with dignity, as I thought that comported with the dignity of the cause. The night I was going up the steps to Pentonville Prison there were about twenty officers who came to the train to escort me. One of these men says,

"COME UP, PADDY!"

And I say candidly that if I had not had my hands manacled behind my back I would have given that fellow "Come up, Paddy!" [Laughter.] In that prison I remained four months, and during those four months I never experienced any vexations of pain like the vexations of pain I had to undergo in the matter of clothing. If I want to sleep my whole dreams would be that I was going to get clothing, and I and as I had tatter work to do, down to my cell, I would think of the stitches I put in, and I would think of the time I used to be in the world that I did not eat more than I do here. Every day I would dream that I had horses, or rats, or mice, if I came across them. England tried to break us down by a system of labor and I believe every man that was in prison just felt as I did that he was going to be deprived of his reason, and they put one on bread and water for the first month, and for the next month one ounce of bread in the morning and a pint of water, and the second night, for the purpose of breaking my rebel I would not have down or beg for something to eat. I kept up, however, and whatever may be said of my companions in prison, I acted as a man should act in my prison life.

PRISON REGULATIONS.

After four months in this prison of Pentonville something occurred that soured them. There was a report circulated that the Queen was coming to visit the prison of London, and so we were sent to Portland, an island in the South of England. The first week in this prison we were deputed to work in the quarries. We were marched down to the quarries. Some of our men got sick, and they ought to have been sent to hospital, but they were kept at work, and sent the medicine to them. I was for three months working by the side of William Mackey, and during that time this man was in a fainting condition for the most part. He was sent to the hospital into his boot and pulled it out streaming with blood that had accumulated. After three months of this I was sent to work in the organization we were dying in the prison. The convict told me that Ned would have to see me, and the priest and the schoolmaster told me the same; but the officers of the prison refused to allow me. I see him. I remember having heard a case spoken of before that of two Poles who were dying in Russia, and one of them was not allowed to see the other. I also remember what indignation was expressed in the English magazines on the conduct of Russia in the matter. These men will not accede to do anything to carry out the ends of justice and you must be prepared to do to England as England has done to you and others.

IF YOU GO TO WAR WITH HER,

You must make war with her as she makes it. Take the case of the invasion of the Normans in Ireland. They were clad in steel armor, but the Irish went down to fight with their naked bodies, and they were whipped by the Englishmen because they seemed to protect their bodies to the same way. I have met an Irishmen who would storm the idea of digging a hole in the ground and getting down into it to hide himself from it. [Laughter and applause.]

There is one other thing about the prison life which I will tell you. They had insert giving me books while I was well behaved [laughter] and among the books they gave me was one which outlined an account of prison life in England. It was the custom under the inverness of Millbank prison to be made to confess. Breams invite one day, and I refused to give him any admit. I said to him one day, I got a letter here last week or two which stated that you put your prisoners in an ordinary cell and give them a bible and a prayer book, and if they make a confession to you, you go to the governor and tell him what they confess to you themselves. I don't like to be a spy myself, and I am not going to be a spy for you. I am in prison for my country, and in it trying to outwear the Bible. I was then put into a dark cell for three days. They compelled me to give me no more spoons to the prison because I refused to be a spy. I was put in a darker hole down with certain spoons, I thought that my spoons were down in there, and I put my hand down and I found a dead rat. I was then

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of April 22.

ANTRIM.

On Saturday, John H. Orway, Esq., Chairman of the county Antrim, in opening the Belfast quarter sessions, said that he saw with considerable surprise that although only a fortnight had elapsed since her Majesty's judges discharged the prisoners from the jail of the county, there were fifteen cases to go before the Grand Jury.

There has been at the poor-law elections in Belfast a great deal of tampering with the voting papers, and in several instances persons have been fined £10 for the offence.

The Ardee Board of Guardians have unanimously adopted, and sent to Mr. Butt, M.P., a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land Bill. The chairman, Mr. H. Cobbe presiding over the meeting, said he did not like to interfere in politics, but as he found a precedent in that the Board adopted a petition before at the time Mr. Gladstone's bills was passed, he would carry out a precedent in this case. On motion of the chairman the Chairman granted him £60. Respondent is of the farming class.

The Chairman of the Tuam Board of Guardians (Mr. Robert Bodkin), has refused to receive a notice of motion signed by Mr. Gannon to the effect that, as the National system of education is not agreeable to the feelings of the Irish people, the cost of it should be borne by Government, and that if it were made denominational the people would cheerfully contribute their part of the expenses. At the land sessions of Ballinsloe, last week, E. Russell claimed from his landlord, Denis Webb, £25. 6d. for disturbance, improvements, and fine paid to out-going tenant. It appeared, however, that the claimant had made under agreement for a lease for twenty-one years; and, in consequence, was not entitled to any compensation for disturbance, nor was he allowed the fine paid to the out-going tenant. On account of the improvements the Chairman granted him £60. Respondent is of the farming class.

The Chairman of the Tuam Board of Guardians (Mr. Robert Bodkin), has refused to receive a notice of motion signed by Mr. Gannon to the effect that, as the National system of education is not agreeable to the feelings of the Irish people, the cost of it should be borne by Government, and that if it were made denominational the people would cheerfully contribute their part of the expenses. The meeting was a most enthusiastic one, and the intelligence with extreme regret."

At the quarter sessions of the Athlone division of the county Roscommon, Mr. Burke, addressing the chairman, said: "I am happy to inform your worships that there are no bills to go before the grand jury, and it affords me much pleasure to congratulate you upon the peaceable appearance of the county of the district and its freedom from crime."

Since the eviction for non-payment of rent last year of the man Egan, who lived at and occupied the land next Mr. Bridge, his wife has erected a kind of hut upon the public road. This week she was summoned by the county surveyor to the petty sessions of Ballyporeen, and the magistrates made an order that she should pay a fine of 5s or go to prison for two months.

There were but two land cases to come before the chairman, C. Holmes-Spunner, Esq., Q.C., at Nenagh, on Saturday, and of those one was subsequently withdrawn. In the second way the claimant was Michael Hogue, of Shoebeenmore, Borrisokane, who had been ejected by his landlord, Mr. David Clarke of Macclesfield, from over four acres of land, for which he paid a yearly rent of £6 5s. 6d. The valuation was £3 15s. Claimant sought seven years' rent for disturbance—amount, £50 15s. 6d. The defence was that the fields were town parks. His worship ruled to the contrary, and held that the eviction was capricious. He granted the amount sought, less by half a year's rent which was due, and the cost of the ejectment, which reduced the compensation to £32 10s., and 10s. were allowed for expenses.

WATERFORD.

At the last meeting of the Waterford Board of Guardians the tender of Mr. Jas. Moran, builder, of Manor, for the sum of £550, for converting the west wing of the union buildings into a suitable residence for the nurse as nurses, was unanimously accepted by the Board.

The New Bishop of Bankok, Siam.

Pagans Profoundly Moved by the Catholic Service.

Our readers will be glad to read of all that occurred at Bankok, the capital of Siam, on Sunday, the 16th of December last, when a Catholic missionary, Mgr. Vey, received the episcopal consecration from the hands of Mgr. Colombert, the Bishop Vicar Apostolic of French Cochin China, who had come from Saigon to preside at this imposing ceremony. For the Catholic Church there years without a Bishop, and therefore there was much excitement among the people, as will be easily understood, when the august ceremony was about to commence. The largest and richest church in Bankok, that of St. Francis Xavier, in the Annamite's Camp, was chosen for the ceremony. Christians and pagans came there together—more than 5,000 persons in all. All the missionaries of the Vicariate met there together, and all the consular body, European powers, headed by M. Garcier, the French Consul and Commissary, who is well known and highly honored for the care he takes of religion throughout the East. The European residents only too gladly accepted the invitation sent to them. The Prince Regent, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of War and other princes and mandarines occupied places of honor; then came our Christians, Siamese, Annamites, Portuguese, Chinese, Cambogians, to say nothing of a crowd of pagans anxious to see the festivity.

Be it remembered that this immense concourse of persons, differing so much in creed and belief, behaved perfectly well. The Pontifical High Mass was sung by the Apostolic nuncio. Every one and then the second King's band played some pieces that would not have been out of place at our finest festivals in France. The spacious sanctuary of St. Francis Xavier's church was quite too small to contain the ceremonies in an imposing style; the altar, raised on a flight of seven steps and richly adorned, was a grand spectacle. A rich Bankok merchant, M. Lomecin, clothed in a Roman cloak, a friend of the missionaries, enjoyed the honor of presenting the water to the consecrating bishop at the washing of the hands, just as the Senator of Rome does when the Pope pontificates. There is no need of detailing all the ceremonies, which were entirely conducted according to the prescribed rules; but there was one ceremony that particularly impressed the bystanders, especially the dignitaries of the Court, and that was the enthronisation. The consecrating Bishop, taking the newly-consecrated by the hand, led him to the throne prepared for him, placed in his hand the episcopal staff, and then entoned the Te Deum Ambrosian hymn—the Te Deum. The whole multitude caught up the spirit of the solemn moment, and in perfect silence—silence to the presence of the new member just added to the Catholic hierarchy—listened to the end. After a moment Mgr. Vey stood up and walked between the two assistant Bishops down the aisle of the church, imparting his first benediction on the prostrate people.

One of the ministers, still under the charm of that moment, said a few days later: "Even if I began as I am, without faith, what I see to-day has made me believe. I feel devotion in my heart." During the day's festivities Mgr. Vey received a congratulatory letter from the first King and another from the second, and presented in return the usual episcopal token, a pectoral cross glistening with diamonds. The royal band played until evening, when a brilliant illumination and fire works brought the Siamese in crowds into the Annamite Camp. Such was this day which will be long remembered at Bankok. During the week their lordships and bishops had an audience of the first King; they also went to visit the Prince Regent of the Kingdom, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Minister of War where they were received most courteously and respectfully.—Saint Indian Catholic Examiner.

ANECDOTE OF PIUS IX.

A certain old gentleman of Rome had two sons; and it seems that, being getting very infirm, and had some thoughts of making his will. Now, one of his sons he loved more than the other, and he told his favorite that he meant to leave the greater part of his money, while the other brother was to inherit but a small share. Soon after this conversation it chanced that the same son did something that displeased his father, and caused the old man to change his mind about the distribution of his money; and now he told his other son exactly what he had already told the first—namely, that his money should be his, and that the other should go penniless. When the brothers came to compare notes on the subject they found the old man's temper to be so variable his that they thought it not at all improbable he might do something to deprive them of wealth, they would divide it equally between them. Alas for their calculations! The old father found it all out, and, to punish them, came to the following strange determination:

He bequeathed them a few crowns each; but the main bulk of his wealth he left to a certain church, on the express condition that over priest said the first Mass in the church on the day after the old man's death, was to inherit the whole. After this disposition of his effects he had no more time to change his mind, for he died almost immediately. His lawyer opened his will at once, and could not believe his eyes or his ears when he read the strange document. But there it was in black and white; the two sons were beggars. But it was a sad puzzle; and the lawyer determined to lay the whole matter before the Pope, and see if he would do nothing in behalf of the two poor youths. He accordingly went to the Quirinal palace, and after a little difficulty obtained an audience of his Holiness. On being ushered into the presence chamber, he approached him with the usual genuflexions, and having kissed the cross on the Pope's sandal, he briefly stated what was his business, and put the will before his Holiness for perusal. He ran his eye over it, and as soon as he comprehended the matter, he desired the advocate to leave the will with him, promising at the same time that he would look to the affair at once. Satisfied with his success, the lawyer returned and communicated the issue of his mission to the disconsolate brothers, who were impatiently awaiting his coming.

Turn we now to the church where the Imported Mass is to be said. It is early dawn of the following day; the sacristans are at their work, preparing all the Masses that are continually said from day-break to mid-day. They are ignorant of the important event that are to attend the first Mass said in their church that day; but are laboring assiduously in arranging the vestments, and the candles, and the light, and the rest of the church furniture, when they are aware of a most unseasonable rolling and rumbling of carriage wheels about their church door. Anon, in march the Swiss guard, armed with sword and halbert, and station themselves in goodly array up the center of the nave; and now appear the prelates of the Pope's house, bold, clad in their rich purple robes—then is seen the silver cross gleaming aloft, and last appears Pope Pius with his pleasant smile and his graceful step. He has come to say Mass in the church, and he says it—his first; and he claims the legacy for his own. And then he summoned the two brothers to his presence, and he told them what he had done, and concluded by presenting the whole and entire inheritance to them. His longed-for revolutionary opinions are now hoarded crowns to a certain charity in Rome, for the support of many wandering Jews, and the rest of the money they have received most courteously and respectfully.—Saint Indian Catholic Examiner.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— Rev. James Archer, pastor of St. Patrick's church, St. Louis, Mo., died at the pastoral residence in that city recently.

— There are not less than seven Catholic negroes in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, training for the missions in their native country.

— We regret to announce the death at the Convent of Mercy, Brooklyn, May 1st, after a prolonged illness, of Sister Mary Xavier Stewart, in the 36th year of her age, and the seventh of her religious profession.

— Rev. Mr. Donegby, formerly Professor in All Hallows College, Dublin, left Rome on the 15th of April for Australia. Rev. Richard Heekel, Professor of Rhetoric in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, is staying in Rome.

— Sister Mary Francis Neale died at the Convent of the Visitation, Georgetown, recently, aged 77 years. She was a relative of Archbishop Neale, second Archbishop of Baltimore, and a descendant of one of the original settlers of Maryland. She was professed in 1817.

— Miss Ellen Hamill, fourth daughter of Mr. M. Hamill, Grange, Dunsoxe, and sister of Rev. James Hamill, Adm. St. Patrick's, and Rev. H. Hamill, Dean of St. Malachy's College, was professed in the Convent of Mercy, Cranmin Road, Belfast, on April 19.

— A religious, writing from Rome to the editor of the Roster de Marie, says: "The Sovereign Pontiff expects the severest trials for the Church to come about in a very short time (the words *exercer praj*procation*, and this is a very short time, were written in the letter), so he exhorts us to redouble our prayers."

— Longley has Lenox in, according to the latest news from Brussels, in a critical condition, and her death is expected at every moment. Not being able to leave her bed, she had to suffer exceedingly. During three days she was scarcely able to take food, but received Holy Communion every morning. Extreme unction was given her.

— The feast of Pentecost is to be observed into our diocese—the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, Diocese of Pittsburg, Diocese of Scranton, Diocese of Harrisburg, Diocese of Allegheny, and Diocese of Erie—on Sunday, June 4th. The Catholic population of about 500,000. It is only sixty-five years since the first bishop of the oldest one—Philadelphia—was consecrated.

— A solemn profession of three young ladies took place on Easter Monday in the chapel of the Sisters of Mary Convent of the Divine Will. The Most Rev. Archbishop of Cincinnati officiated, assisted by the Father Hinsse, pastor of the church of the Ascension. The young ladies who on this occasion were Mary Chantrell (in religion, Sister Mary Borgia), Elizabeth Cary (in religion, Sister M. Cecelia), and Elizabeth Dawson (in religion, Sister Mary Ignatius).

— Sister Benedicta Parsons, who passed from life to eternity years in the community of the Sisters of Charity, Nazareth, Ky., died a holy death on 19th April. She was born in St. Mary's county, Md., of an exemplary and highly respected Catholic family. Her brother, Rev. Wiley Parsons, died half a century ago at St. Mary's College, Emmetsburg. A priest of the same family, the late Father Simeon Bandelon was buried in the convent cemetery, near Rox. Selma. That cemetery is a garden wherefrom Almighty God will transplant the fairest and most beautiful of the flowers of paradise.

— The death is announced of Rev. J. Klinkenstrom, one of the most distinguished men born of the Society of Jesus in Europe. He was born at Vienna in 1812, being the eldest son of the painter, Frederick Klinkenstrom, who was also at the head of a famous institution for the education of the Austrian nobility; and he received his early education altogether from his father. When eighteen years of age he entered the Society, and recurring later to Vienna, he soon acquired great reputation as a preacher. For many years he presented on each Sunday afternoon, and also from time to the Church of the University, members of the highest ranks of society, even of the Imperial family itself, gathering round the pulpit.

— The Cork Examiner of April 29 says: "According to a Roman telegram, the top resemblies of some of the Great Powers have intimated that while several bishops and cardinals upon the best means of putting an end to the conflicts pending between the Governments and the Church. The Cardinals were unanimous in declaring that the only means of accomplishing this was for the whole Nation to acknowledge the spiritual independence of the Church. In the opinion of their Eminences there should be no ordination of either Power to the other in its respective sphere, but in a spirit of agreement between the two, regulated by concord and legally respected on both sides. The Pope and the Cardinals declared peace between Church and State to be impossible. The representatives of the Powers have since had other private interviews to their respective Governments."

— On the 30th April, at the presbytery, Thurles, a deputation from the parishioners of Fethard presented Rev. James Canterwell with an address of esteem and testimonial on the occasion of his removal to Thurles, as token of the high esteem they held him in, and the deep regret they felt at the departure from among them. This is another proof, if proof were necessary, of the great honor and unity existing between the priests and people of Ireland, and which all the more flourishes at every new trial." As of the 19th century is not able to sever. The reverend gentleman intended the deputation to be only a large number of guests, among whom were Most Rev. Dr. Croke, Archbishop of Thurles; The Very Rev. President and Professors of St. Patrick's College, Thurles; Rev. T. H. Kinane, Adm. Thurles; Rev. M. Sheehan, P.P., Drom, etc., to a sumptuous dinner at the presbytery in the evening.

— A movement has been set on foot to protect to Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati, by the laity of his diocese on the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination, which occurs May 31, has been manufactured in Newark, N. J. The Advertiser describes it as perfect. It is of solid gold, 10 inches high, weighs 700 penny weights, is 10¾ inches high, and will be used by the Bishop. The base of the cup are 30 ball-carat diamonds, simply and exactly mounted. On the base is a diamond cross, and above are eight of Peter, which is flanked by two large amethysts, similarly ornamented with diamonds. Intercept amiable between adjoining the engravings of St. Paul and the Virgin. On the center of the standard a row of smaller amethysts surrounds the central jewel. The bowl is of pure red gold, and three grapes, yellow and light red gold colors placed in wonderful contrast and harmony. But the real beauty of this work of art is in absolute grace of proportion. The stoning is exquisite in its side outline and the strange effect it has upon color and light and shade.

— The centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence will continue for three days in this city, commencing on the 3d and ending on the 5th July.

Church Lions and Statistics.

EDITOR MONITOR: It is an old saying, "When you do a thing, do it well," in reference to which I venture to suggest a little trifle regarding Catholic things, for the benefit of whom it may concern. Wherever there is a Catholic altar, some members of the congregation zealously devote some leisure time to the preparing of the lines to be used during the Holy Sacrifice and, in order to make every piece come forth anew in its snow-white beatness, they commonly use some starch. Now, as there are articles which must be starched and others which must not be so, it is good to know the difference, and to avoid some mistakes that are common enough to cause no little inconvenience. The alter is a rectangular piece of linen to be tucked round the mensa, much tighter than a neckerchief. It therefore should be washed and ironed without any starch whatever. Keeper how comfortable you would feel with something like a sheet of stiff paper tacked inside of your shirt collar. The Alb is a long, white robe. Its sleeves may be well starched a few inches near the wrists, so that will keep them longer in good order; but the rest of the garment should have exceedingly little starch, or else it will not hang necessarily from the girdle, and will lack the graceful dignity of drapery. The Corporal is a square piece of linen, of about twenty inches each side, on which the consecrated Host is deposited during the Sacrifice. As it is indispensable that it will not wrinkle in the folding, for then the smallest particle may be lost, the whole of it must be stiffened with starch, and ironed upon a bright, polished, and heated upon a gridiron or the like with a charcoal fire beneath and under it. When the place is hot, take the washed linen wet, put it into very thick starch, as thick as paste; rub it well in and wring it a little. After seeing that it is uniformly impregnated with the starch, get the help of a friend; take the Corporal by the four corners and stretch it carefully on the hot plate, stroking it all over with your hand so as to secure its square shape and uniform adherence to the plate. In a few minutes it will be dry and you can take it up from the plate, done to the most substantial and neat style of ironing. When so finished, it is to be folded in three equal parts at its width, and again in three equal parts at its length, in such a manner that the four creases pressed in it will divide the whole surface into nine equal-sized rectangles.

The Pall is a small, square piece of linen or cotton for covering the chalice. Its preparation is the same as that of the Corporal, of which it is supposed to be a defective part; but it is not to be folded in any way. It is to be finished straight and very stiff, so as not easily to yield under the pressure of the chalice veil.

The Purificator is a piece of linen about twelve by fifteen inches. It is used for wiping the chalice and the priest's lips and fingers after communion. It should be very starch at all in it. One might as well starch napkins and towels.

The Veil is oblong, as I have said, may by some be considered as mere trifles, but reverence for every thing in the house of God is a decorum and appropriateness of the Divine service, is so very desirable and worth the practice of learning how to do it, and of doing it well. THEOPHILE.

MR. DOORKEEPER FITZHUGH.—Washington, May 18.—The scene in the House today, when the Pitzhugh letter was being read, was extremely indicrous. Fitzhugh's political friends fought against the introduction of the subject until Speaker COX rebuked them. When Lamar rose to his Texas friend was read the more striking passages such as "His was a bigger man than old Ben Wade," and allusion to the delight of his son being appointed to a $2,000 situation, produced shouts of laughter on both sides of the House, and in the galleries a roar of laughter also greeted the reader's reference to the "thousand of miles you ever saw." During the reading of the letter and several newspaper articles, Fitzhugh moved nervously about the House consulting with any one who would talk with him.

Erwin Davis, a former banker and speculator of San Francisco, now living in England, is accredited with having written to a friend in this city that he was the active promoter of the Herzegovinian insurrection. The story goes that he succeeded in obtaining the management of a pool controlling $30,000,000 in England, which would absorb enormous quantities of Turkish bonds. It is stated that Davis, in a visit up the Mediterranean, passed near Turkey, when, after the formation of the great pool, went, as John Brown went to Virginia, to the real abandonment of a revolution, to incite insurrection among the then already feverish Herzegovinians, bring about a panic among English holders of Turkish bonds, and thereby break the bond market to satisfactory figures, or, as Mr. Davis had it, to "living prices." Whether Davis was the real agent, he is accused, is inspiring the Herzegovinians with treason or not, it is a well authenticated fact that rebellion among the people was announced to assume heights and shifting forms soon after his visit to the East.

In the windows of many London shops printed bills, surrounded by a black border, have been displayed, with the following heading: "In memory of the Irish political prisoners condemned for life and doomed to suffer their tenth year of penal servitude in English and Australian jails." The bills then give the "Roll of Honor," beneath which the names of eighteen prisoners, mostly soldiers and sailors, are given.

A Widely Applicable Remedy.

For complaints arising from a deficiency in the due performance of the digestive process, no preparation is so widely applicable as a wine range of disorders as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and the best because it has special properties for curing the various complaints which originate in the derangement of the organs of nutrition, secretion and drainage. Besides its well known power as a corrective of indigestion and its unfailing efficacy in all bilious disorders, it is a most reliable remedy for fevers, dyspepsia, constipation, nephritis of the urinary organs, general debility, kidney and nervous complaints. It is invariably proven to be highly serviceable in overcoming scurvy, erysipelas, rheumatism, neuralgia, and many other disorders and disabilities originating in poverty or impurity of the blood, arising from weakness or over excitement, or an imperfect performance of the physical functions.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—Rev. James Archer, pastor of St. Patrick's church, St. Louis, Mo., died at the pastoral residence in that city recently.

—There are not less than seventy Catholic negroes in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, training for the missions in their native country.

—We regret to announce the death at the Convent of Mercy, Brooklyn, May 1st, after a prolonged illness, of Sister Mary Xavier Stewart, in the 36th year of her age, and the seventh of her religious profession.

—Rev. Mr. Donoghy, formerly Professor in All Hallows College, Dublin, left Rome on the 15th of April for Australia. Rev. Richard Hackett, Professor of Rhetoric in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, is staying in Rome.

—Sister Mary Francis Neale died at the Convent of the Visitation, Georgetown, recently, aged 77 years. She was a relative of Archbishop Neale, second Archbishop of Baltimore, and a descendant of one of the original settlers of Maryland. She was professed in 1817.

—Miss Eliza Hamill, fourth daughter of Mr. M. Hamill, Grange, Dunseese, and sister of Rev. James Hamill, Adm. St. Patrick's, and Rev. H. Hamill, Dean of St. Malachy's College, was professed in the Convent of Mercy, Crumlin Road, Belfast, on April 19.

—A religious, writing from Rome to the editor of the Rosier de Morte, says: "The Sovereign Pontiff expects the severest trials for the Church to come about in a very short time (the words overstir prae proclaes, and this is a very short time, were underlined in the letter), so he exhorts us to redouble our prayers."

—Louise Lateau is, according to the latest news from Brussels, in a critical condition, and her death is expected every day. Not being able to leave her bed, she has to suffer exceedingly. During the months she has taken scarcely any food, but receives Holy Communion every morning. The ecstasy is continued.

—The line of Papal succession is now divided into six dioceses—the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, Diocese of Harrisburg, Diocese of Erie, Diocese of Harrisburg, and Diocese of Allegheny, and has 410 churches, 518 priests and a Catholic population of about 500,000. It is only sixty five years since the first bishop of the oldest see—Philadelphia—was consecrated.

—A solemn procession of three young ladies took place on the morning of May 21, in the chapel of the Sisters of Mary Convent of the Divine Will. The Most Rev. Archbishop of Cincinnati, assisted by Rev. Father Moynihan, pastor of the church of the Atonement. The young ladies who were received were Mary Cantwell (in religion, Sister Mary Borgia); Elizabeth Cary (in religion, Sister M. Cecilia), and Elizabeth Dawson (in religion, Sister Mary Ignatius).

—Sister Benedicta Parsons, who passed from life to eternity on May 1st, was formerly of the Sisters of Charity, Emmetsburg, Md., died a holy death on 19th April. Deceased was born in St. Mary's county, Md., of an exemplary and highly respected Catholic family. Her brother, Rev. Hilary Parsons, died half a century ago at Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmetsburg, and many of its some Catholic school survives. Sister Benedicta was buried in the convent cemetery, near Mrs. Seton. That sweet city of garden wherefrom Almighty God will transplant the fairest and most beautiful of the flowers of paradise.

—The death is announced of Rev. J. Klinkowstrom, one of the most distinguished members of the Society of Jesus in Europe. He was born at Vienna in 1812, being the eldest son of the palatine, Frederick Klinkowstrom, who was also at the head of a famous institution for the education of the Austrian nobility; and he received his early education altogether from his father. When nineteen years of age he entered the Society, and returning later to Vienna, he soon acquired great reputation as a preacher. For many years he preached on all Sundays, and throughout the Lent in the Church of the University, members of the highest ranks of society, even of the Imperial family itself, gathering round his pulpit.

—The Cork Examiner of April 29 says: "According to a Roman telegram, the reply of the cardinals of some of the Great Powers had conferences lately with several influential Catholics upon the best means of putting an end to the conflicts pending between different States and the Church. The individuals were unanimous in declaring that the only cause of there conflicts was the refusal to concede to the Church the spiritual and moral independence of the Church. In the opinion of their Eminences there should be no ordination of either Power to the other in its respective sphere, but an alliance and agreement between the two, regulated by sacred and loyally respected on both sides. Without this, the Cardinals declared peace between Church and State to be impossible. The representative of the Powers have sent an account of these interviews to their respective Governments."

—On the 25th April, at the presbytery, Tarvin, a deputation from the parishioners of Fetbard presented Rev. James Cantwell with an address and testimonial on the occasion of his removal to Tarvin, as a token of the high esteem they held him in, and the deep regret they felt at his departure from among them. This is another proof, if proof were necessary, of the great bond of unity existing between the priest and the people of Ireland, and which all the materialism and every other "ism" of the 19th century is not able to sever. The reverend gentleman entertained the deputation and a large number of guests, among which were Most Rev. Dr. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel; the Very Rev. President and Professors of St. Patrick's College, Thurles; Rev. T. H. Kinane, Adm., Thurles; Rev. L. M. Ryan, do., to a sumptuous dinner at the presbytery in the evening.

—A sacramental chalice, to be presented to Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati, by the laity of his diocese on the fiftieth anniversary of his priesthood, which occurs May 21, has been manufactured in Newark, N. J. The Advertiser describes it as follows: "It is of solid gold, 14 carats fine, weighing 700 penny weights, is 10¾ inches high, and is valued at $4,000. Around the bowl of the cup are 30 half-carat diamonds, simply and elegantly mounted. On the base is a diamond cross, and above an exhibit of Peter, which is flanked by two large amethysts, similarly ornamented with diamonds. Immediately beneath is the emblematic engravings of St. Paul and the Virgin. On the center of the standard a row of smaller amethyste surrounds the central swell. The bowl is of a dark red gold, and there are grapes, pulpies and light red gold colors placed in wonderful contrast and harmony. But the real beauty of this work of art is in absolute grace of proportion. The chasing is exquisite in its sole outline and the strong effect it has upon color and light and shade.

—The centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence will continue for three days in this city, commencing on the 3d and ending on the 5th July.

Church Linen and Starch.

EDITOR MONITOR: It is an old saying, "When you do a thing, do it well," in reference to which I venture to suggest a little truth regarding Catholic things, for the benefit of whom it may concern. Wherever there is a Catholic altar, some members of the congregation zealously devote some leisure time to the preparing of the linen to be used during the Holy Sacrifice. It is no order to make every piece come forth snow in the snow-white neatness, they commonly use some starch. Now, as there are articles which must be starched and others which must not be so, it is good to know the difference, and to avoid some mistakes that are common enough to cause no little inconvenience. The Amice is a rectangular piece of linen to be tucked round the neck, much tighter than a neckerchief. It therefore should be washed and ironed without any starch whatever. Fancy how uncomfortable you would feel with something like a sheet of stiff paper tucked inside of your shirt collar. The Alb is a long, white robe. Its sleeves may be well starched a few inches near the wrist, as that will keep them longer in good order; but the rest of the garment should have exceedingly little starch, or else it will not hang smoothly and gracefully, and will look like graceful drapery of drapery. The Corporal is a square piece of linen, of about twenty inches each way, on which the consecrated Host is deposited during the Sacrifice. As it is indispensable that it will not wrinkle, it should have no starch at all. The same remarks will be true, the whole of it must be so stiffened with starch as almost to crumble if you fold it. The most require the consistency of card paper. The best way to make it so is to use a plate of copper or brass sheet, well polished, and heated upon a gridiron or the like with a chamois dry spread under it. Put the plate in hot, take the washed linen wet, put it into very thick starch, as thick as paste; rub it well in and wring it a little. After seeing that it is uniformly impregnated with the starch, get the help of a friend, take the Corporal by the four corners and stretch it carefully on the bottom of the plate, smoothing it all over with your hand so as to secure its square shape and uniform adherence to the plate. In a few minutes it will be dry and you can take it up from the plate, done in the most substantial and best style of ironing. When so finished, it is to be folded in three equal parts of its width, and again in three equal parts of its length, in such a manner that the four crosses pressed in it will divide the whole into nine equal-sized squares or angles.

The Pall is a small, square piece of linen used for covering the chalice. Its preparation is the same as that of the Corporal, of course in a smaller size, and not so square, but it is not to be folded in any way. It is to be finished stretch-tight and very stiff, so as easily to bend under the pressure of the chalice veil.

The Purificator is a piece of linen about twelve by fifteen inches. It is used for wiping the chalice and the priest's fingers, and should be thin, absorbent, bound to put any starch at all in it. One might as well starch napkins and towels.

Those things, as I have said, may by some be considered as mere trifles, but the disciplinary people in the Church regards the decorum and appropriateness of the Divine service. Hence, is not this a worth while trouble of learning how to do it, and of doing it well. THEOPHILE.

The "Housekeeper" of our Health.

The liver is the great depurating or blood cleansing organ of the system. Set the great house keeper of our health at work, and the foul matter which gender in the blood and rot out as it were, the machinery of life, are gradually expelled from the system. For this purpose Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, with small daily doses of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, are pre-eminently the remedies needed. They cure every kind of humor, from the worst scrofula to the common pimple, blotch or eruption. Great sores ulcers kindly yield to their mighty curative influence. Virulent blood poisons, that lurk in the system as the effects of early mercurial torture, and by their concentrated power bring on rheumatism, gout, or kindred ailments, are thoroughly neutralized and built up anew. Enlarged glands, tumors and swellings dwindle away and disappear under the influence of these great restoratives, used by all leaders in medicines.

Claude, a child about three years old, was greatly afflicted with sores on his legs and feet, so that he could not wear his shoes and stockings. Had a great deal of trouble with him. Had tried many remedies ineffectually. At last we tried the Golden Medical Discovery, and in about three weeks he was entirely cured, his sores were all healed, and his health greatly improved. Respectfully yours, J. W. BOYD Versailles, Ballard Co., Ky., Jan. 19, 1875.

THE COMING OF SPRING.

King Winter sat on his roaring throne,
Ketched in regal state,
While Mirth in Winter's train stood near,
His moody will to wait;
But the jest hovered his hoary head,
And though pale with sugar mildly said:

"Mither, queue Spring!" the smiling came!
"I plold my princely right
To thro about; but know thou well
Thy smiles of sunny light,
And all thy loving, e'en as we,
Can never rule o'er Nature's heart

"As I have done, thy lord and king;
The shadow of my might Hath clothed the life-blood at her heart,
And held in prison'd night
Her every love joys, her joyful smile,
The very pulse of her life."

But the haughty Queen deigned no reply,
But waived her jewell'd hand;
Whereat King Winter with his train
Sped swiftly at her command!
And then she smiled her triumphs round,
While Flowers joy became profound.

The stormy winds low-toned their ayres,
And mournfully saw song
Glad words of welcome to their queen,
As they sorrynd her hoverie sweep,
Or shaked the snowbanna through the air,
Gilding shadows every where.

The little flowers came forth to see
Why such a revelerie was,
And the zephyrs with their morning care
Caressed them from below.
Long prince's cities they had been,
Now finished by their Queen.

The Forest pri nced sullen, grand,
Regardless of the rays
Which with love's messages
That made each golden gaze,
For I ended he his message error
Her presence only would be grace.

Who answered by the whispers to the throne,
"Her train afar I see!"
Then birds and lead-in hearts to work
A gorgeous canopy,
And many pairs for fairy feet,
While lowly multitude rose to greet.

As ebb passed by, the aged oak
Bent low to meet her view;
And truant branches touchingly touched
Her blushing pow'd brow!
She came, and as she onward passed
The wood-embraced beauties with light o'erspread.

Glad throbbed her heart at the bright relays,
Her chief the crown bore,
When the sun whom she had empire held
Through Autumn's sere wanderings power,
Now smiled at the enchantress' art,
And shining gave her all to rest.

O sacred Queen, thy gentle power,
Like a magic spirit, holy,
Did beneath its wings of light
A balm for every care;
God's mindless Mind, O happy life!
Thy days are crowned with blessings rife.

"OF IRISH DESCENT."

BY MRS. N. M. WARDS.

"Mamma," said Eugene, trying to reach up and lay his head on Denny's shoulder, which he could hardly do by reason of Denny's superior height, "didn't you promise awhile ago that you'd be Denny's friend?"

"Yes, my boy," answered she softly, "and I will keep my promise."

"A friend helps a person out, mamma; Denny helped me out the other day," the little boy pleaded, tears rising to his eyes, though he tried to keep them back. Denny fondled him pretty much as you have seen a big, shaggy Newfoundland dog fondle a baby-lamb.

"Indeed!" was mamma's answer.

"Now, Dennie, listen to me; it is because I am your friend I want to know this, do you believe me?"

"Yes, ma'am," he answered, with a look of honesty on his face not to be mistaken.

"Then will you at least satisfy your friend and good mother by telling us why you are not willing we should know how you got the coin?"

"No, ma'am," he answered with a readiness that astonished her, and with a appearance of fearless truth, not at all indicative of guilt, "coz if I told you that, then the very thing I can't tell'd be known."

"Oh, all right! all right! if you think it does it all mane!" cried his mother, bursting into tears.

And quiet little Bridget softly laid her hand on his cheek, saying nothing, but thing bright tears, that sprang without a sob, fell down over her faded dress. He took the caressing hand in his, with a gesture of dignity worthy of a monarch, and making a step forward, faced his mother proudly.

"Mother, look up," he cried in a ringing voice; "there is no need for yer head to be held low! I'm not a thief, and Mr. Morrogh was obliged to give an involuntary cry of admiration, as the speaker's figure transformed. His head reared itself proudly back; his eyes flashed with the fire of a true Irish heart; his hand, raising itself, like a quiet little girl's, raised itself in the unconscious motion of command.

"Look at me," he cried in a clear, proud voice. "I have done nothing to disgrace my father's name, mother," and the proud voice melted, and the hero was lost in the child, as he fell at her knees and laid down his head there, "Mother, I could kneel at the grave this minute and whisper in the sod the history of it all, and say, 'father, I did it.' Do you believe me now?"

"Believe him, Ellen," said Mrs. Morrogh, through her tears. But the mother did not need the words; already her arms were close around him; already was her eye eye shedding gems over his coarse and ragged locks—the gems no gold can buy; gems no shadow can deprive of their brilliancy; there they shone, and the poor old janitress was distinctly decked with the mother's tears of love and sorrow, that she had doubted her son.

"Shure it's gone, darlin'," she softly said; "the black doubt, shure; glory be to God, I see it all; it was the sore misfortune for me to have thought o' ye, but what wee fair and three, as God knows, I always found ye! Let it go, let it all go."

"No, mother," and he stood erect once more, "it won't go! A thing that once when ye'll see ye wor right to believe in me now, an' we'll only let it go till thee, that's all."

"You are a brave boy, Dennie," said Mrs. Morrogh, "and I beg your pardon for my fear that you had done wrong. Keep to the feeling of never doing that which could disgrace your father's name, and the world can never lead you astray."

Oh!" and she seemed to forget she had listeners, and talked softly to herself, "sweet and noble testimony of innocence that no other heart but an Irish one would ever have brought forward, in the face of anything else but the sight of his blessed Cross in the distance on the wild rock of St. Helena!—Montreal True Witness.

The library of the New York Xavier Union possesses one of the three only copies in this country of the proceedings of the late Ecumenical Council. There are seven large volumes, written in French, containing, besides the report of the proceedings, a portrait, with the sketch and signatures of each of the different prelates and clergy who attended.

"Little brick!" replied Denny, with that brave voice of his trembling just a little, "I believe you."

"No! I, Dennie," quietly remarked Bridget, who up to this point had said nothing at all.

Dennis kissed her.

"No need for any explanations, little woman," he said; "you an' I understand each other—don't we?"

"Yes, indeed," said Bridget softly, and that was all. The quiet little woman really had nothing to say, although her true heart was full.

As Mrs. Morrogh walked home with her two boys she thought softly to herself that no more beautiful scene had ever been secreted than that she had just witnessed. She thought of the noble qualities shining in the children, and the sweet, proud love of the humble mother. She tenderly looked forward to the future, and hoped the native nobility displayed by the boy would raise him out of his present lowly station; and she pictured to herself what a glorious career lay before his manhood, in becoming a citizen of this free land. She even dreamed of quiet and talented little Bridget growing into an intellectual and happy woman, owning power to charm refined circles and direct the minds of others; her deep pastoral nature developing, so that in grand poems she could sing the glories of God and of her native land. Imagine her feelings when she was aroused from such fancies by a voice saying near her:

"I arrest you on a charge of stealing."

Turning, she saw Dennis in the grasp of a policeman.

Christianity before Ancient and Modern Senates.

There is an old tradition that the Emperor Tiberius, who ruled the Roman Empire during the lifetime of our blessed Lord, heard of his wonderful doings, and sent ambassadors to Judea to have the great prophet brought to the presence. The Emperor was attacked with leprosy, hence he sought lonely places, like the beautiful Miseenum, leaving the affairs of the empire to the administration of worthless favorites like Sejanus. He was in hopes the miraculour cures imparted to so many by the wonderful prophet, whose fame was borne on a thousand sapphyrs, might be sought for himself. The ambassadors arrived in Jerusalem, but too late; Calvary had witnessed the deicide, and the risen Saviour had bade farewell to his disciples from the depths of Olivet.

While in Jerusalem they heard of the extraordinary towel of Veronica, and while trying to bring to their imperial master some memento of the crucified Saviour, they forced her to bring her treasure with them to Rome. They came, and Tiberius held most strange rain for some time in his hands. Shadows of sympathy passed over the tyrant face, and a sigh from a heart touched, perhaps with grace, betrayed an inward struggle; a beam of light was reflected from the sacred image—Tiberius was cured. Handing the towel back to the kneeling Veronica, he ordered a marble statue from the imperial treasury. Soon after he summoned the Senate to send Christ among the gods of the empire.

Whether the circumstance of the tradition were the reason that induced Tiberius to favor Christianity we will not venture to assert; but certain it is, as testified by Rosa Bella (II book, chap. 2), and Tertullian, in his apology, cited the Senate to get their section to send Jesus to God, for he alone could confer divine honors on sublunary mortals. The Senate refused, and the same historians give some of the reasons. First, because he was already invoked in the provinces without their permission (Specie quidem ex quod Senatus nec fortasse adhuc novum deum fieri). Secondly, because he was a jealous god, and would not hold fellowship with the other gods of the empire; and thirdly, it was unbecoming the Roman Senate to recognize as a god a blasphemer put to death by one of the provinces.

Solomon Jones once said that there is nothing new under the sun. It requires little stretch of imagination to follow the assertion beyond the precincts of the Upper Senate rejecting the divinity of Christ and the acceptance of Jesus's wife when the members of modern Parliaments reject his law. It has been asked in the Senates of London, Berlin and Turin, shall we make the law of Christ the rule of our guidance? And the answer with a large majority is negative. First, because His followers preach His doctrines (infallibility for instance) against which their lives are unfavorable. Second, because He is a jealous God, and will not allow his followers to have fellowship with Freethinkers and secularists. Third, because His law is one of humiliation, it is not popular in the eyes of the world, and suits the poor rather than the rich.

The same spirit of pride which caused the rulers of the past to fancy they could make and unmake gods, prevails in the parliaments of present ministers, as we imagine they can dictate to Catholics what they may and may not believe. Regardless of their own fallibility, governments refuse judgment and free will—regardless of the fact that the overwhelming mass of here that form the sheep and wealth of the nation—they persecute, they make their opinions accursed him; already were he eye shedding gems over his coarse and ragged locks—the gems no gold can buy; gems no shadow can deprive of their brilliancy; there they shone, and the poor old janitress was distinctly decked with the mother's tears of love and sorrow, that she had doubted her son.

"Shure it's gone, darlin'," she softly said; "the black doubt, shure; glory be to God, I see it all; it was the sore mistake for me to have thought o' ye, but what wee fair and three, as God knows, I always found ye! Let it go, let it all go."

"No, mother," and he stood erect once more, "it won't go! A thing that once when ye'll see ye wor right to believe in me now, an' we'll only let it go till thee, that's all."

"You are a brave boy, Dennie," said Mrs. Morrogh, "and I beg your pardon for my fear that you had done wrong. Keep to the feeling of never doing that which could disgrace your father's name, and the world can never lead you astray."

Oh!" and she seemed to forget she had listeners, and talked softly to herself, "sweet and noble testimony of innocence that no other heart but an Irish one would ever have brought forward, in the face of anything else but the sight of his blessed Cross in the distance on the wild rock of St. Helena!—Montreal True Witness.

Death of Mr. Ronayne, M. P.

Deep affliction was felt throughout Cork, May 7, on receipt of the intelligence of the death of Mr. Ronayne. It would be scarcely too much to say that a feeling of consternation prevailed. There were in his native counties so bright and cheerful, and those were such gayety and geniality in his disposition, that the idea of death could with difficulty be associated with him. Though a person of decided opinions and these most frankly uttered, he was always regarded with a friendly and warm feeling by opponents, while at his own side he was absolutely beloved. And rarely indeed he deserved all the esteem and all the affection that were bestowed on him. He was a strange combination of conspicuous practical ability and of the most lively enthusiasm. In the matters connected with his profession no sounder or shrewder head could be employed; in all that concerned his country he was actuated by a warm regard with a friendly and warm feeling by opponents, while at his own side he was absolutely beloved. And rarely indeed he deserved all the esteem and all the affection that were bestowed on him. He was a strange combination of conspicuous practical ability and of the most lively enthusiasm. In the matters connected with his profession no sounder or shrewder head could be employed; in all that concerned his country he was actuated by a warm regard for everything that was national, and by a passionate and earnest patriotism, which swayed all his thoughts and actions. It is not always that such qualities receive justice, but, while no one doubts his capacity for business, no one on the other hand ever questioned the sincerity of his political opinions. Before being elevated to public life he was well known for the possession of a wit which sparkled as brightly and played as shoreishly as that of any man who sat around the board of Curren. But he had, besides, the finest appreciation of what is needed to enable a man to make a good figure in politics, and some of his speeches were models of their kind, and especially for force of style.

In his early unsteady enoostenalism, and rather shrank from public life; his career, therefore, as a member of Parliament has been the less to be regretted, since the blossoms of their fanaticism, if public opinion would allow it, the raise the divinity of Christ in the Roman Senate were flung, by order of the tyrant, on the following day, from the parapets of the Sublician bridge into the waters of the Tiber. Laborers are now remaking the drive that has late for ever ries over the ruins of the Forum, where, in the pride of their power, the Senate opposed the introduction of Christ into the wall of fallen pride and the retribution of the persecutors of the Church cried ring out through the pages of history, from the lips of the Emperor Valerian—who was excommunicated by the Parsians, and whose skin, stuffed with straw, hung in one of their temples for the score of generations—to the downfall of the present monarch of the nineteenth century, who poured forth the blasphemies of his blasted throne in defiance on the wild rock of St. Helena!—Montreal True Witness.

Grant's Foolish Threat.

During a recent attack of "neuralgia of the brain," Gen. Grant threatened that if the Consular and Diplomatic bill failed because of a deadlock between the two Houses, he would withdraw all the Ministers and Consuls and let the service go to the dogs, in order to bring odium upon the Democratic party for the proposed retrenchment. This menace was intended to operate on the House of Representatives, and to bring about a compromise satisfactory to the Administration. We presume it will fail of any effect whatever.

Nothing could happen to this branch of the public service which would more effectually expose its inutility and extravagance than the extreme course proposed by the President. In fact, it is the best official remedy for existing abuses that could be adopted; for once stopped, the country would be brought to see the absence of any pretext for these costly sinecures, and would soon secure a thorough organization of the whole diplomatic machinery.

In Europe the diplomatic service is now maintained chiefly as a means of pensioning the younger sons of the nobility, and of opening the doors to another class, who, by their newly acquired wealth, exercise large political influence and seek social advancement. Diplomatic posts have become little more than official messengers, who carry letters to court, deliver messages to the sovereign, and serve as figure-heads at ceremonies. They have little, if any, influence, and the real negotiations are conducted directly through the Cabinets.

In this country the honors of diplomacy are reserved for needy politicians, ex-governors out of employment, and the favorites and favorites of the Administration for the time being. The volumes of our diplomatic patches which are published at large cost every year, are filled with the most dreary, tiresome and unimportant stuff. They become the laughing-stock of Congress and the country. They would be allowed to forget a period during which a more ambitious man with much less expensive habits would be far better off at home helping to raise crops. We should at least be spared the exhibition of vulgarity in a representative to a court, and we too seldom peel in the Cramers and that crew of ill-mannered adventurers.

Nearly all the important diffi ences between the United States and foreign Governments have been settled by specials agents or commissioners. Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, negotiated at Washington the northeastern boundary treaty with Lord Ashburton, who was specially detailed for that duty while Mr. Fox was the resident British Minister. The controversy for the settlement of the Alabama claims was made by a Joint Commission.

Steam and the ocean telegraph have changed the practical duties of diplomacy as they have nearly rendered it useless, and the only an official form remaining without any substance. If the whole system was abandoned, and special agents substituted when needed, and only then, a useless expenditure would be cut off, a bore removed, the simple habits of true republican government would follow, and we be no longer constantly growing into the habits of imperialism and monarchy, and following in the fashionable vices of the old world civilization.

Consuls are necessary as the ministerial officers for executing the laws of the United States in foreign countries relating to commerce. They should be men, no matter how they happen to be good or bad, capable or incompetent. But they already performed precisely the same duties in any way as is strained as it would be to say that the Postmaster at Philadelphia or Boston performs the mail passes through the office.

Intolerance.

There is not, perhaps, in the whole range of contemporaneous current religious literature a single word that is more frequently used, and, in most instances, more inappropriately applied, than that which heads the present article. When the spirit of the Church and of the Catholic people is referred to in the columns of our times (and that is not unfrequently), the word "intolerance" hangs ominously on the point of the Protestant pen, ready to spurt forth its venom in short and caustic paragraphs at irregular intervals. From the lips of the pulpiteer it careers around their meeting-houses, and is most conspicuously employed on long and solemn festive point. In every sectarian convention, camp-meeting, religious synod, and such like gatherings of the various sects, it would be far better off at home helping to raise crops. We should at least be spared the exhibition of vulgarity in a representative to a court, and we too seldom peel in the Cramers and that crew of ill-mannered adventurers.

Confiscation of Charities.

The charitable foundations in Italy are doomed to speedy extinction. Necessity has no law. The spoliation of Church property availed little to stay the deficiencies of the exchequer. There now remain but 20 507 lots of the ecclesiastical lands unsold, and it may be see, as the Italian Liberal newspapers confess with dismay, that this resources of the sale of ecclesiastical properties, of which the past Ministers made so large a use, is now, as it were, exhausted." The past Ministeries of the Left Right. The present Ministry of the Left is determined to exert itself after the old fashion of spoliation, and to suppress the lay corporations as their predecessors suppressed the clerical corporations. For his false to assert that the charitable foundations in Italy are vested in clerical management. That assertion is made merely in the interest of the enemies of truth, and with a prejudice against the clergy. The fact is that nine-tenths of the charitable institutions in Italy are vested in confraternities of laymen, or managed by local municipal boards. If there has been mismanagement or peculation, in the matter of these charities, the blame attaches to the lay administrators of those boards, and not to the clergy, who have nothing to say to them. If Italy is doomed to be troubled in future as she has been in the past, it will be easy to give the local boards power to make improvements or alterations. But the Government has no such power in the half measures. The confiscation of all the property in the peninsula is a large one, and one which will remember my name."

Under the reign of Leo the Isaurian the provinces dependent upon Salonica were for the most part in a state of revolt. He could give the signal of the great schism of the East. Constantine, the celebrated commander-in-chief of the army of the Obsequy, was the bishop of Thessalonica in 1185. The Sclavonian Balonica is situated at the head of an inner basin terminating the long gulf stretching up to the northward, between the masonry peaks and rugged mountains of Olympus and thea to the west and the rich shores of the Chalcidice and the peninsula of Cassander to the east. MR. MCKIBBENS will please especially look at the printed label on the margin or wrapper of the paper; the date thereon shows when the subscription expires.

ANOTHER APPEAL.

Quite a large number—indeed, a majority—of our interior subscribers are in arrears for two years, some even longer. The amount each one owes is trifling, but aggregates a sum running up into the thousands. We want the money; it is honestly ours. The person who contracts a debt with a newspaper is in some measure bound to pay it as though he contracted it with a shoe maker or grocer. The newspaper debt, however, are separately so small that it hardly pays to send an agent out collecting, costing, as it does, from twenty-five to fifty per cent., and in many instances going miles out of his way to collect a few dollars, only to be told when he reaches there, "I'm so sorry! I shouldn't have let the run so long, but it was so small. I haven't a cent in the house to-day, honor bright, and I'll send it to you next week." Of course the collector has to bide his chagrin and appear satisfied. But "next week" doesn't see the money come, and so has to take the same trouble next year, with probably the same result. This should not be. It is far easier and less expensive for the subscriber to forward his subscription by express than for the publisher to send out collectors. There are a dozen subscribers on our books who would be inconvenienced by the payment of their subscriptions, while their non-payment cripples us. The date on the margin or wrapper will tell you how your account stands; then remit immediately the odd to the nearest dollar, if more expense, if you prefer.

EXAMINATIONS AND COMMENCEMENTS.

We have elsewhere collected a few brief notice respecting the examinations and commencements of the various Catholic colleges and schools which have taken place during the present week. Perhaps they may not attract much attention from the ordinary reader who is merely in quest of interesting news, but to the thinking and reflecting man they convey a most important lesson. They give him a trustworthy indication of what will be the social position and influence of the Catholic population of the State of California during the course of the next thirty or forty years. In that particular respect the reports are, of course, far more important than all the political intelligence which is sought after so eagerly. There is, no doubt, a sameness about these examinations and commencements which has some tendency to weary, and the reporter, is, to a degree, compelled in the use of conventional phraseology, the reiteration of which is not exactly pleasant. Nevertheless, those who have the welfare of society at heart, as well as those who feel a pride in the progress of Catholicity among a highly educated and intelligent people, will not be deterred by such small inconveniences from studying these gratifying reports.

From all the evidence that can be gathered it is plain that Catholic education in this city and State is in a satisfactory condition. Of course there is much room for the multiplication of schools and colleges, but what we mean to say is that the institutions now existing are admirably conducted, and in a high state of efficiency. The Santa Clara College, the St. Ignatius, the Mary's and the Sacred Heart Colleges of San Francisco; the Francisco and Santa Ynez Colleges, Santa Barbara; St. Vincent's, Los Angeles; St. Joseph's, Bonneyville, and St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland, cannot, we are satisfied, be surpassed in the country. And the Presentation Convents and St. Vincent's and St. Rose's of San Francisco; the Notre Dame College of this city, San José and Marysville; St. Catherine's of Benicia, as well as the kindred institutions in Grass Valley, Sacramento, Gilroy, San Jose, Virginia and Yreka; Sacred Heart, Oakland; Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz, Los Angeles, Petaluma, and other places, are quite as accomplished in the education of females. The labors of the whole of them are a guarantee that the Catholic intellect of California will be highly cultured, and that the faith will not be allowed to die out of the hearts of the rising generation.

But it is especially the work in the higher colleges—those that aim at being something more than academies—which gives us satisfaction. It is a great pleasure to feel confident that the Catholic youth of this glorious State will be able to maintain their proper position in the world, and compete for the prizes of life with their fellow countrymen, of every religious denomination. But, while there ought always to be a generous and manly rivalry, we should be very sorry to find unkindness of feeling between the boys of the Catholic institutions and those educated in the public schools. They are children of the same country, the heirs of the same great heritage of freedom; their interests are bound up inseparably together, and anything which could tend to create dissension should be discouraged by both. Vicious sectarian, while narrow minds are incapable of entertaining a liberal idea, and visionary infidels who are unable to understand the principles of social stability, may grieve at the number and success of Catholic educational institutions, but we think all true Americans and genuine patriots will only rejoice thereat.

A GREAT DIFFERENCE FORGOTTEN.—The Rev. Otto Gibson in the anti-Catholic tirade which he foolishly imagined was an answer to Father Buchard's lecture, "Christian, or White man—Which?" thus put a few of his strong points—"Whenever comes this ceaseless hostility to our free schools, our free press, our open Bible? Always from Popery—never from Paganism." It should have added, and probably by would but he forgot it, "Whence comes these ceaseless patronage of my little barbecue? Never from Popery—always from Paganism!" It is true that "Papists" never paid Mr. Gibson a hundred and ten dollars for a Chinawoman, but, if evidence before the Senate Commission is at all to be believed, Pagans did. No wonder the reverend gentleman didn't want a stop put to coolie immigration.

FOOLISH BIGOTRY.

We do not know that any one of our readers feel much interest in the sayings or doings of the Presbyterian General Assembly, which is at present sitting in New York. Under ordinary circumstances, therefore, we should not think it worth while even to mention the fact that that very sapient and erudite body was engaged in its annual session. It has attended strictly to their own affairs, and did not go out of their way to insult other people, it would, indeed, be unwarrantable intrusion to make any comment upon their proceedings. But, inasmuch as certain members of the Assembly forgot the common laws of decency and decorum, and indulged in a coarse attack upon the Catholic Church, we think it right to expose their conduct and call down upon it the public censure that it deserves. The last General Assembly, it seems, left each Church session to decide for itself whether Roman Catholic converts" to Presbyterianism should be baptised again or not. There was an "overture" from the Synod of Missouri against this decision, and discussion on the matter was an order of the day for 26th May. A Rev. Dr. WILLIAM L. BRECKINRIDGE, of Missouri, spoke at length in favor of this overture. He might have saved time, if he had the inclination, in temperate and modest language, but he chose to make a violent philippic against Catholicity, which showed that he had neither good taste nor Christian charity. The General Assembly of 1835 had, it appears, solemnly and, of course, piously, decreed that the Catholic Church was no part of the Church of God, and the reverend gentleman wanted that decision sustained by an order that Catholic baptism should not be recognized, and, of course right in a sense little thought of, The Catholic Church is not a part of the Church of God, but is the Church of God whole, sole and entire. The Church of God is not and cannot be broken up into sects, and any person that is not in one unbroken body is not in the Church of God. Therefore no bishops and priests can hear the decision of the General Assembly without any great amount of apprehension. Indeed, a feeling of amusement is the emotion that gives most trouble in such a case. It arouses in the minds of Catholics in every country, at least wherever they hear of it,

O'DONOGHUE-PATTERSON.—Delivered his lecture on "Irish Liberty and English Prison Life" to a fair audience in Oakland, last Monday night, as it appeared in THE MONITOR of May 20. As we have several of that issue still on hand, such as may desire to preserve a true report of the distinguished gentleman's utterances on that occasion, can do so by purchasing that number of this Journal.

THE Call seriously informs us that the "new Sultan of Turkey is the nephew of his uncle, who has been deposed."

REFORMING A REFORMED CHURCH.

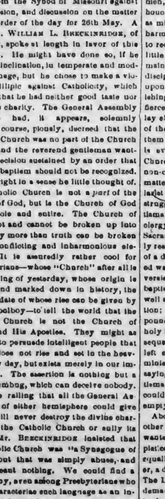
May is the month which the several "reformed" Churches of Great Britain and America have chosen as the time for holding their annual meetings, probably by way of set off to the fact that the Catholic Church dedicates it to the honor of the Blessed Virgin. Accordingly in both countries, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists and a score of other denominations are telling the world what they have been doing during the past year in the way of multiplying their churches, converting the heathen and, particularly, "stemming the Popery." "Popery" seems able to stand a good deal of that kind of work without suffering much, but the sectaries are not disheartened, and keep on their "overthrowing" all the same. In Dublin, Ireland, the General Synod of the Protestant Church, late the Established Church, is now in session, not for the purpose of attacking Catholicity, however, but of refining its own ritual and formularies. The Synod is composed of a number of bishops and clergymen, together with a lot of noble lords, honorable judges and gallant colonels, and, as might be imagined, it is by no means a harmonious body. The clergymen seem to recognize the necessity of preserving a respectable exterior, and have set about maintaining a semblance of ecclesiastical discipline; but the lay gentlemen are bent upon "liberalizing" the Church and abolishing restrictions of every nature. Several fierce encounters between the clerical and lay elements took place during the session of the Synod, and in almost every one of them the latter was triumphant—a fact that is evident when the work is done the Church of England in Ireland will be as non-committal and latitudinarian in the matter of doctrine as the most ardent sceptic could desire. There was a short struggle about the shape in which the baptismal service was to stand in future, the clergy wanting to have the nature of the Sacrament defined, and the laymen preferring to lay it up into conflicting and inharmonious elements. It is assuredly rather cool for Presbyterians—whose "Church" after all is only a thing of yesterday, whose origin is known and marked down in history, the day and date of whose rise can be given by any schoolboy—to tell the world that the Catholic Church is not the Church of Christ and His Apostles. They might as well try to persuade intelligent people that the sun does not rise and set to the heavenly music of Mr. Gibson's comet-like fiddle-bow. The assertion is nothing but a pitiful humbug, which can deceive nobody.

All the railing that all the General Assemblies of other hemispheres could give vent to will never destroy the divine character of the Catholic Church or sully its fame. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE insisted that the Catholic Church was "a Synagogue of Satan;" but that was simply abuse, and really meant nothing. We could find a great deal, even among Presbyterians who would characterise such language as an indecent slander, and think nothing the better of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE for having uttered it. According to the same mild-mannered and sweet-spoken individual, Catholicity is more Pagan than Christian. Well, it would be as well for him to study something about this before, and it has done no great damage to the Church yet. If reverend gentlemen of the Presbyterian denomination will but themselves to taking a rational soberness, and so make fools of themselves, they must not expect that men who are not possessed of the demon of bigotry will believe in the same way, nor can they blame the public press for criticising their utterances. Another reverend gentleman, named CHAMBERLAIN, crucularly declared that "if there was any organization in the world which bore a similitude to the Dragon—and old serpent of the Apocalypse—it was the Catholic Church." This wonderful discovery is not new, however. We cannot call to mind a single person of ignorant rather that lived any time during the last two hundred years who did not pretend to find the Catholic Church in the "beast" of Revelations, and get laughed at for his pains.

If the reverend gentlemen of the General Assembly are as "progressive" and "enlightened" as true Yankees ought to be, they certainly should furnish their hearers with some very sagacious reasons against "Popery," and not content themselves with repeating the stale and nasty libale of bigots, who are long dead and gone to their last account. As for refusing to recognize the validity of Catholic ordinances, it is a matter of no importance whatever. We are afraid they never can get a sufficient supply of "converts" from Catholicity to make the question worth discussing from any point of view. Presbyterianism is not making alarming inroads upon "Popery," is not apparently weakening the Catholic Church, and therefore our bishops and priests can hear the decision of the General Assembly without any great amount of apprehension. Indeed, a feeling of amusement is the emotion that gives most trouble in such a case. It arouses in the minds of Catholics in every country, at least wherever they hear of it,

THE DEPOSITION OF THE SULTAN.

The most important item of our foreign telegraphic intelligence during the week was that referring to the deposition of the Sultan. The revolution, which was of a very peaceful character, was unexpected by the outside world, but the diplomatic intriguers no doubt knew it was about to occur. The Russian representative at Constantinople is said to have been a leading spirit among the party who effected the change of sovereigns, but upon what authority the assertion is made we are not aware. The new Sultan, who is named MURAD, is a nephew of the former ruler, and is credited with being endowed with an active and intelligent mind. He has already consented to several reforms which never could be won from ABDUL-AZIZ, and his accession to power is regarded as highly favorable to peace. All Turkish securities advanced immediately upon receipt of the news of the revolution. Yet, it is hard to see any solid ground for such improvement. The rebellion in Herzegovina is not quelled, the attitude of Servia and Bosnia is as threatening as ever, and the prospects of the national finances are not brightening. It seems to us that a general and final break up of the Turkish Empire is inevitable, and that Europe will soon be free from the curse of a Moslem government.



GOVERNOR IRWIN has finally completed the appointments authorized by the last Legislature, in the selection of James D. Fay and H. F. Crane, of this city, and John C. Ball, of Woodland, as Commissioners to investigate land affairs under the Act. As provided by Assemblyman Harding. This is a very important Commission, having to do directly with the gigantic frauds which have characterized the administration of the Land Office for a number of years past, conspicuously so during the term of office of Robert Gardner as Surveyor General, as partially shown by a Special Committee of the Assembly, of which Mr. Harding was Chairman. The Governor could not have made a better selection than the gentlemen named. Judge Fay is a lawyer of ability, and of the highest integrity, and Messrs. Crane and

There were five in favor of the bill and seven against it. The matter was decided by six casting vote that the meeting should petition in favor. Notice was given, however, to bring it before another meeting.

A few nights since a fire broke out in the upper portion of the large flour mills of Messrs. Studdert, Limerick, and Mr. Wm. O'Malley. The flames ran through the building with great rapidity, and although assisted by a couple of hundred of the neighbours, could not be completely quenched, the hydrants failing to supply the requisite quantity of water. A few hours before the fire was one of the largest that has occurred in the city for many years.

In the course of a talk at dinner to the Grand Jury at Sligo Quarter Sessions, a few days ago, Sir Jonah Barrington, the chairman, Mr. Pepper, Q.C., said: "When I was in Dublin the other day, I met a gentleman from the north of Ireland, and in the course of conversation he told me that he had purchased a property in the county of Sligo, and I asked him what induced him to do so, and he said he was induced to do so because he found that the people of Sligo were the most peaceable people in Ireland, and that there was no county in which there was so little crime committed."

KING'S COUNTY.

At the usual weekly meeting of the Roscrea Board of Guardians, held on the 8th inst., the chairman, John Wesley, presiding, Dr. Grattan proposed, "That the motion reserved by this Board in favor of Mr. Butt's Land Tenure (Ireland) bill be adopted." LEITRIM.

The Rawnbey Board of Guardians has adopted a resolution in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill.

LIMERICK.

The Limerick Reporter says that tracts it worth of a most offensive character to the feelings that all as well as to the faith of Catholics, are principally distributed about the markets during business hours.

Captain Dumeresq, a retired naval officer, was discovered at 5 o'clock one morning last week in the North Avenue, Limerick, a short distance from his residence, lying dead upon the footpath. A revolver in of the hand. At the inquest it was stated that the deceased had been suffering from an effection of the brain, and the jury found that he had committed suicide.

A special meeting of the Limerick and Clare Farmers' Club was held on Sunday in Limerick. Mr. Mathew O'Flaherty, chairman of the Club, occupied the chair. Mr. Stanley proposed the following resolution: "That the thanks of the Irish farmers are due to Mr. Butt for his able advocacy of their claims to a good tenant right bill, and that we expect that Liberal Irish representatives will be in their place to support Mr. Butt's bill on the second reading of this bill on the Land bill." Mr. Fogarty seconded the proposition. Mr. Stebbing supported the motion. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

LONDONDERRY.

The Londonderry Provident Building Society has obtained a certificate of incorporation under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and has actively commenced business.

LOUTH

At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the Land and Tenants' Defence Association the Rev. Mr. Croften, rector of Ardee, stated that he had been to see the agent of this estate, and that all the tenants of the with the exception of one were satisfied with the proposed reduction. The chairman remarked that it was a matter of thankfulness to God that so many of landlords in every way were willing to settle matters amicably. He hoped now that before the Association broke up it would be suggested that it should be continued for the purpose of watching the estates. Mr. Croften request his arbitrator to meet for the gentlemen appointed by the tenants to-morrow (Saturday). Mr. Croften then retired to go to the suggestion of the chairman to meet the arbitrator to-day, the place about the middle of next month.

The second rifle competition for those in connection with the Irish Volunteer Force took place at Dundalk on Saturday. The firing was at 200, 500 and 600 yards. The total number of points of the competitors was 2,235 out of a possible 2,700. Mr. Rigby made the extraordinary best score of 218. Dr. Traill, Mr. Goff and Mr. Armstrong also made high scores.

MAYO.

While the contractors for the erection of the Parnell Monument were engaged excavating for a foundation, says the Connaught Telegraph, they came upon the skull, one hand and foot of one of the French soldiers who perished on the field. The texture of the cloth of the uniform could be detected, but on being touched it crumbled into dust. A few bullets were also found, which are in a good state of preservation. The remains have been reverently restored to their last resting place.

MEATH.

In reference to the Rathran murder case, the Drogheda correspondent of the Freeman, writing a few days ago, says: The body of the murdered man, Thomas Devlin, was exhumed by the police from the grave where he had been interred since the last eleven years. At the time of burial the body was interred in the clothing in which he had been discovered a few months after death. There would be much difficulty in recognising the body, as it was awfully swollen and decomposed state in which it was. On removing the coffin boards, the clothing was found all complete, but the boots which covered the feet were in a perfect state of preservation, the soles being of a rash and very damp nature. The skull was taken possession of by the police, for reasons of their own. On Saturday, in Navan, another remand was asked for and granted to the police, in order to further complete the evidence. The proceedings in the sekiog of the remand were but formal.

ROSCOMMON.

At the meeting of the Strokestown Poor Law Guardians, on the motion of Mr. Lynam, the scheme proposed by Dr. Lynam, C.E., for supplying the town of Strokestown with water in accordance with the requirements of the Sanitary Acts, came on for consideration. Mr. Rose Mahon highly approved of Dr. Lynam's plan, and on his recommendation the scheme was carried by a majority of twenty two votes to twelve.

GALWAY.

With feelings of very great sorrow we have to record the death of Mr. Charles Webb, which took place at his residence in Galway on May 8th. Mr. Webb was for many years an official in the Post-office department, during which time, from his amiability of manner and obliging disposition, he was a general favorite with the public. He retired from the service only a few months ago. His demise will be regretted by a wide circle of acquaintances.

Died, on 1st May, at the age of 103 Mr. Leonard, of Adergoole, parish of Oughterard, and 3 miles from Clifden. The deceased was in full possession of all her mental faculties and bodily powers up to the day preceding her death.

KERRY.

At the last meeting of the Guardians of the Tralee Union notice of a motion for a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill was tendered by Mr. Kenny, but the vice-chairman, Mr. Gerald O'Connor, refused to receive it, on the ground that the bill at last was political and extraneous to the duties of the Board. On a division, the ruling of the chairman was affirmed.

KILDARE.

The death is announced of Very Rev. Dean Hughes, P. P., Athy.

KILKENNY.

Mr. Clayton, an engineer whose name is well known in connection with factory work, has visited Kilkenny in connection with Mr. Whitworth's factory project. An interview was held with Mr. Sullivan, M.P., in reference to the proposed purchase of the Grenadier factory, but nothing definite or likely to be of advantage to the project resulted from it. The engineer had reserved his final opinion as to which of the sites was most suitable.

The Deposed Sultan.

Accounts of the revolution in Constantinople are very conflicting. The majority of the reports, however, agree as to the following particulars: The Ministers assembled on Monday afternoon at the residence of the Grand Vizier, and, on discussing the state of public affairs, they concluded that unless some remedial measures were adopted universal rebellion and a general collapse of the State would result. A resolution was adopted embodying these views, and a petition to the Sultan drawn up, praying him to abdicate in order to save the country. The Sultan received the petition with affected composure and said he would consider the matter. On Tuesday morning there was a great stir in the streets. Trade guilds, firemen, waiters, drawers, and water carriers, headed by Softa, formed in procession and marched to the Sultan's palace, unopposed by the military, who were apparently unprovided with orders to act in case of such an emergency. During the progress the procession was increased by thousands. The palace was guarded by mounted police, who did not interfere with the crowd, although the cries were raised of "Down with Abdel Aziz!" "Vive Murad!" In the meantime Murad, having been released from his own house, to which he had been confined by the Sultan, was conducted to a mosque and saluted as "Sultan Murad the Fifth." While this was happening it was suggested to Abdel Aziz that it would be prudent for him to remove with his four sons to the chief palace. He complied, and was escorted thither almost speechless.

LONDON, June 1.—A correspondent telegraphs from Constantinople the following account of the revolution: After vainly soliciting the Sultan to adopt reforms, the Grand Vizier and Hussein Avni Pasha and Midhat Pasha resolved to depose him. The Dolma Bagtche Palace was beset with troops. Murad was proclaimed Sultan in the presence of all the Ministers, Sheik Ul Islam and the Mollahs. The Sultanian Pasha, accompanied by Hussein Avni and Pasha, announced Abdul Aziz that the nation had deposed him, and that he should deliver up the palace to his successor. The multitude of the troops convinced Aziz that resistance was impossible. He, with his family, household and fifty-three boats, filled with women, were conveyed under guard to the Topkhano Palace. Hussein, Hobart and Dervish have recognized Murad as Sultan.

VIENNA, May 31.—The Austrian Ambassador at Constantinople telegraphs that the revolution might have avoided Mr. Layard's recall if Ignatieff, the Russian Ambassador.

Many rumors are current of the assassination of Abdel Aziz. It is reported on the other hand that he will be sent to a distant town in Asia, where he will be confined with his family.

THE TROUBLOUS EASTERN QUESTION.—London, May 30.—The Standard's Vienna correspondent telegraphs that the Porte has instructed its Embassador to Austria, who is at Pesth, to remonstrate against the expected official communication of the Berlin memorandum, as Turkey would be obliged to totally decline its proposals. The Porte instructs its Embassador to declare that the intervention of the friendly Powers is thoroughly inadmissible. The Porte cites several reasons why the propositions cannot be admitted, the principal of which are that a two months' armistice would only restore the activity of the insurgents, who are now disheartened by defeat, and that the sovereign rights of the Sultan include free action with regard to the disposition of his army, with which he considers Europe has no right, and the Sultan could never submit to such interference in those rights as would prohibit him from having troops within his own territory when he considered it necessary.

The Marquis of Hertington, in a speech at the laying of the foundation of the new City Liberal Club-house to-day, stated that the situation of foreign relations in the East was grave. Earl Granville said he believed there was some unnecessary alarm about the immediate future, still the Government had to deal with a state of things requiring the most serious consideration of the statesmen of Europe.

It has been announced that Montgomery Queen, of chronic celebrity, intends going into the business of ostrich farming in this State, and we are informed that he has purchased a tract of land near Hayward's, Alameda county, with that intention. Here is an item giving the experience of a gentleman in the business:

Mr. J. C. Douglass, an English settler in the Cape Colony, South Africa, commenced experiments about eight years ago with ostriches. He has now about three hundred on hand, having sold eighty-five. Feeds hard grain and the shoots of prickly vegetable matter per day, and the nest profit from the sale of birds and feathers in 1875 was £12,000, in the first two years. The cost of the beginning of the experiment is not given. The birds are hatched by artificial heat, and the process requires from forty-two days. In natural hatching one egg in ten fails; in the artificial process only in twelve.

THE INSURRECTION IN MEXICO.—Washington, May 29.—Official advices received from Mexico report that the State of Sinaloa in the vicinity of Vera Cruz remains about the same as reported two weeks since. The pronunciados have been threatening Vera Cruz and other towns on the coast. They seem to be carrying on a kind of guerrilla warfare. The railroad and telegraph to the city of Mexico have been cut by the rebels on the 17th of May the military train with 400 soldiers reached Vera Cruz, en route to reinforce General Escobedo at Matamoras. Advices from Tuxpan and Tabasco are similar to those from Vera Cruz. The rebels hold Misantlan. No foreign residents have been molested. The Mexican Government is proposed the greatest confidence in its ability to very shortly crush out the rebellion.

NEW YORK, May 29.—Information from Internal Revenue Supervisor Meyer, who is hunting up illicit stills in Bolinger county, is to the effect that there are crooked stills in nearly every creek in the county, and that there are several secreted in outof-the-way places in the woods, and considerable resistance has been offered to the Government force when arrests have been attempted. In the United States District Court to-day seven suits against distillers' bonds were decided, and judgments entered in favor of the Government, against Alfred Bemis for $70,000, and Lovie Teacher for $56,000. District Attorney Dyer will move for sentence against several minor members of the whisky ring in the latter part of the week.

The Great Mustang Race.

NEW YORK, May 26.—The Mexican rider succeeded yesterday in running the twenty-five mustangs 185 miles inside of seventy hours. The exact time of his riding from the start to the finish was six hours, eighteen minutes and forty-three seconds. The manager of the race advertised that Parshal would ride twenty-five mustangs 156 miles in seven hours for a stake of $10,000. It is not probable that any money was put up on the race. The race was evidently gotten up, like its predecessor, for the sake of the gate money it was sure to bring in. The manager was asked this forenoon to name the person who put up the stakes, but he declined to do so, saying the men who put up the money would not have their names known for all you could pile inside that track. The statement was too absurd to be credited by those who heard it. The race was evidently a money investment, and as such it proved even more successful than its predecessor, the crowd being immense. At the start there were 2,000 people; at one o'clock there were 5,000; by two o'clock the number had reached 15,000; and from that time till the close the spectators filling into the park entrance made a continuous procession. The entire number of spectators was 15,000, whereof 12,000 paid $1 apiece. The company was more than ordinarily respectable, there being very few betting men and very little betting. Parshal's riding was admired by everybody. The horses behaved better with him than with Rollins. The care that was taken of Peralta was in marked contrast with the treatment of Rollins. Old Joel may not himself and a common statesman. He ate hard-tack, ham sandwiches and mince pie, and drank from water by the quart. He rode always in the same direction, and came in at the end of each mile fifteen feet in advance. Peralta was in the care of Dr. Stanley, and was treated in a scientific manner. He was rubbed down constantly, too, taken with proper frequency in proper quantities. He was furnished with fresh cups with long sleeves, at intervals of five or six miles, which not only kept his head cool, but also by reason of the change in colors of the sleeves greatly relieved his eyes. He was also supplied in a scientific and different respect. He drew his horses much faster than Parker drove them. Parker's best time was 2:20; Peralta made seven miles in 2:17¾. The best time, however, was 2:14¾ and 2:12¼.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND DEALERS.

DIDN'T WANT HOME RULERS.

A very queer affidavit was read in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin. It had reference to a motion for a change of venue in an action for libel brought by Mr. Howson, a poor law guardian in Limerick county, against Mr Sheehy, a coroner and collector of rates in the same district. Mr. Howson tried the trial for Dublin, whereon Mr. Sheehy moved, on the ground of contentious that the trial could not be fairly expected to be conducted in Limerick. An affidavit of Mr. Howson was filed in opposition to this. It was a document of many clauses, but the two on which most stress was laid by Mr. Howson's counsel, and to which the Court gave most attention, were to the effect that there are a great many Home Rulers and Tenant-righters in Limerick county, and that the plaintiff, being known to be against Home Rule, and having, in his capacity of poor law guardian, supported a threatening notice of the Land bill of Mr. Butt, he could not get an impartial trial at the hands of a Limerick jury. They would all vote for a "man" against him. The judges unanimously condemned the affidavit, and declared that Home Rulers and Tenant-righters are to be found, not in Limerick only, but in every Irish county, that Limerick county is now business, and that there is not the slightest ground for the wholesale imputation set out by Mr. Howson on his oath. The trial will take place, therefore, where the cause of action, and the same judicial reproof of Mr. Howson's vigorous swearing will be administered when fancy they can throw discredit on men who are friends of the rights of Ireland and advocates of the tenant-farmers' cause.—Dublin Weekly News.

CINCINNATI (Ohio), May 21.—The celebration of the anniversary of the ordination of Archbishop Purcell commenced yesterday. Sunday evening a large number of his friends called upon him or sent valuable presents. Among the latter are a gold chalice from Cardinal McCloskey, a solid gold crucifix from a religious order in New York, and many other valuable presents.

LIVER COMPLAINT.

By R. V. PIERCE, M.D., of the World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y., formerly Physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

Dr. Pierce is the proper designation, pertaining to one of the system, and has very appropriately been termed the "housekeeper" of our bodies. He is supposed to preside in the kitchen room, and also in making good nutrient assimilations of the bodies of those who have died of dyspepsia, or from the effects of it. The principle of cause the liver has given evidence of having ceased to perform its functions. The symptoms are usually permanent in bowels, which are worse are constipation, although in many cases alternate with looseness of the bowels. Sometimes one and sometimes the other condition exists for a long day or week before the disease is fully developed. Many times, however, the first symptoms of any disorder of the liver are considered by the patient of little consequence, and are allowed to run on for months without any attempt at relief. In many cases, it is doubtful in the first, whether the disease originates in the liver or stomach, but in the majority of cases, it is doubtful in the stomach, but the symptoms indicating that the liver is the first to become involved. The symptoms indicating that the liver is the first to become involved are: Sometimes considerable pain in the right side, but more frequently a dull heavy sensation, with occasional sharp pains, when the disease has existed for some time, the pain often extends across the right side, and sometimes through to the back, and is frequently mistaken for rheumatism. The pain is sometimes very severe, and frequently the patient complains of pain in the left side, and sometimes in the region of the heart, which is apt to create fear of disease of that organ. The stomach is usually affected, sometimes very severely, at other times but little. Generally there is a loss of appetite, but sometimes the patient has a voracious appetite, but the moment food is taken into the stomach it seems to cause great distress, and the patient will relate that they have a faint, gone feeling at the pit of the stomach, which nothing seems to satisfy. Sometimes the stomach is very sensitive to the touch, and pressure over the pit of the stomach will cause pain. The bowels are usually costive, sometimes alternating with looseness, and sometimes the discharges are very dark colored, and clay colored. The kidneys sympathize with the liver, and become inflamed, which is indicated by pain in the back, and a dragging sensation in the loins. The urine is usually scanty, and high colored, and deposits a sediment on standing. The skin is sallow, and sometimes quite yellow. The eyes are sallow, and frequently the whites are tinged with yellow. The patient complains of a dull, heavy, tired feeling, no ambition to do anything, and the mind becomes confused on any subject requiring thought. Frequently the While this was happening it was suggested to Abdul Aziz that it would be prudent for him to remove with his four sons to the old seraglio. He complied, and was escorted thither almost speechless.

LONDON, June 1.—A correspondent telegraphs from Constantinople the following account of the revolution: After having deposed the Sultan to adopt reforms, the Grand Vizier and Hussein Avni Pasha and Midhat Pasha resolved to depose him. Redif Dolma Baghtche Palace was beset with troops. Murad was proclaimed Sultan in the presence of all the Ministers, Sheik Ul Islam and the Mollahs. Then Sultanem Bahn, accompanied by soldiers and officers, informed Abdul Aziz that the nation had deposed him, and that he should deliver up the palace to his successor. The attitude of the troops convinced Aziz that resistance was impossible. He, with his family, household and fifty-three beats, filled with women, were conveyed under escort to the Topkahar Palace, France, Italy and England have recognized Murad as Sultan.

VIENNA, May 31.—The Austrian Ambassador at Constantinople's telegraphs that the revolution might have been avoided by a timely recall of Ignitiief, the Russian Ambassador.

Many rumors are current of the assassination of Abdul Aziz. It is reported on the other hand that he will be sent to a distant town in Asia, where he will be confined with his family.

The Great Mustang Race.

NEW YORK, May 26.—The Mexican rider succeeded yesterday in running the twenty-five mustangs 150 miles inside of seven hours. The exact time of his riding from the start to the finish was six hours, eighteen minutes and forty-three seconds. The manager of the race advertised that Pasita would ride twenty-five mustangs 135 miles in seven hours for a stake of $10,000. It is not probable that any money was put up on the race. The race was evidently gotten up, like its predecessor, for the sake of the gate money it was sure to bring in. The manager was asked this forenoon to name the person who put up the stakes, but he declined to do so, saying the men who put up the money would not have their names known for all you could pile inside that track. The statement was too absurd to be credited by those who heard it. The race was evidently a money investment, and as such it proved even more successful than its predecessor, the crowd being immense. At the start there were 2,000 people; at one o'clock there were 4,000; by two o'clock the number had reached 15,000; and from that time till the close the spectators filling into the park enclosure made a continuous procession. The entire number of spectators was 25,000, whereof 12,000 paid $1 apiece. The company was more than ordinarily respectable, there being very few betting men and very little whisky drinking. Pasita's riding was admired by everybody. The horses behaved better with him than with Parker. The care that was taken of Pasita was in marked contrast with the treatment of Parker. Parker was left to himself and a common stableman. He ate hard-tack, ham and cheese and other plain fare, and drank ice water by the quart. He rode always in the same direction, and could not ride east of the 72d's and ended in consequence. Pasita was in the care of Dr. Stanley, and Parker in that of a scientific manner. Pasita was principally fed on, taken with proper frequency in proper quantities. He was furnished with fresh cups with long risers, at intervals of five or six miles, which not only prevented his head cool, but kept by reason of the changes in colors of the vessels greatly relieved his eyes. He was also regaled with champagne at intervals repeatedly. He drove his horses much faster than Parker drove them. Parker's best time was 2:20; Pesita's made several miles in 2:17's. The best time, however, was 2:14's, and 2:12's.

DIDN'T WANT HOME RULERS.

A very queer affidavit was read in the Queen's Bench, Dublin, on Saturday, in bail reference to a motion for a change of venue in an action for libel brought by Mr. Howson, a poor law guardian in Limerick county, against Mr. Butt, a solicitor and politician of the same district. Mr. Howson filed the trial for Dublin, whereon Mr. Sheehy moved, on the ground of convenience, that the Court should order the trial to be conducted in Limerick. An affidavit of Mr. Howson was filed in opposition to this. It was a document of many clauses, but the two on which most stress was laid by Mr. Howson's counsel, and to which the Court gave most attention, affirmed that there are many Home Rulers and Tenant-righters in Limerick county, and that the plaintiff, being known to be opposed to Home Rule, and having, in his capacity of poor law guardian, opposed a Land-tenure and Land bill of Mr. Butt, he could not get an impartial trial at the hands of a Limerick jury. They would think it a "crime" against him. The judges unanimously condemned the affidavit. They pointed out that Home Rulers and Tenant-righters are to be found, not in Limerick only, but in every Irish county, that Limerick should try its own business, and that there is not the slightest ground for the whimsical impression cast out by Mr. Howson on his oath. The trial will take place, therefore, where the cause of it arose, and the Chief Judicial reproof of Mr. Howson's vigorous swearing will be a lesson to all who fancy they can throw discredit on men who are friends of the rights of Ireland and advocates of the tenant-farmers' cause.—Dublin Weekly News.

CINCINNATI (Ohio), May 21.—The celebration of the anniversary of the ordination of Archbishop Purcell commenced yesterday. Sunday evening a large number of his friends called upon him or sent valuable presents. Among the latter are a gold goblet from Cardinal McCloskey, a solid gold crucifix from a religious order in New York, and many other valuable presents.

LIVER COMPLAINT.

DR. R. V. PIERCE, M. D., of the World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y., Author of "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," etc., etc.

Will favor in the capacity of a consulting purifying organ of the system, and has very appropriately been termed the chamberlain of our blood. This I have observed in the dissecting room, and also in making post-mortem examinations of the bodies of those who have died of different diseases. In the first stage of the liver the first gain given to the blood is that of color, and the next is that of power; afterwards are given the different properties of ratio, sheep and urine are increased in proportion to the gain of color; and a healthy liver each day secretes about two and a half pounds of bile. When it becomes diseased or torpid, if from any cause, it is dissolved in the portions of the blood, and is taken up by the absorbents and the bile must remain in the blood, thus irritating the entire system. Then we have the symptoms of torpid liver, such as yellow skin, sick headache, loss of appetite, bowels costive, eyes yellow, sometimes a dull pain in the right side, which is frequently mistaken for pleurisy.

The brain, which is the great electrical center of the whole system, becomes clogged with the poisoned blood, and fails to sufficiently perform its functions hence there is a deficiency of nervous energy, or want of the necessary fluid, causing gloomy forebodings of the future, and the mind is filled with the blues. The skin manifests disordered action, pimples, humors, blotches, and sometimes a high state of fever. The stomach and bowels participate in the general derangement of the liver, and we have dyspepsia, or indigestion, and the inevitable piles, dropsy, dysentery, or diarrhœa.

SYMPTOMS OF LIVER COMPLAINT.

A sallow color of the skin, or yellowish-brown spots and blotches, a bad taste in the mouth, dryness of the throat, coated tongue, pain in the region of the liver, extending through to the shoulder blade, and often mistaken for rheumatism, a dull, heavy sensation in the head, sometimes accompanied with a severe pain, dizziness, frequent attacks of coughing, sore throat, unsteady appetite, sometimes a craving for food and a loathing aversion to the sight, sickness and vomiting, dizziness, drowsiness, and disturbed sleep, cold feet, alternate chills and fever, aggravating pains in the sides, back and limbs, sometimes mistaken for rheumatism, and soreness through the bowels, constipation, alternating with diarrhœa, piles, fluttering of the heart, suffocating sensations when lying on the left side, dullness of the senses, confusion of ideas, dizziness of the head, with a rushing sensation as if falling, sudden flushes of heat, burning in the flesh, dreadful dreams, great nervousness, extreme melancholy, blues, horror of death, with a strong determination to commit suicide. All or any of the above symptoms will be likely to be present in any case of liver complaint.

TREATMENT.—Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which stands at the head of the list of Liver Remedies, which acts as an alterative or blood purifier, and thus eradicates the cause of the disease, and by a diseased liver these remedies are the only ones that will be required in most cases. Simply persist in the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and the disease will soon be changed to an entirely opposite state, when the appetite will return, the blood purified and enriched, and the entire system nourished and restored to health.

AT our request, Cragin & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., have promised to send any of our readers gratis on receipt of 18 cents to pay postage, a sample of Dobbins' Electric Soap to try. Send at once

Paris dispatches of the 26th ult. bring the news of the hopeless condition of one of the ablest Republicans of the French Senate, M. Casimer Perier, ex-Minister of the Interior under President Thiers. His death is momentarily expected. He was one of the seventy-five life members of the Senate chosen by the Assembly, and many of his colleagues will likely follow him compassion of those chosen are in the decline of life.

The Evil Fruits of Weak Digestion.

There is no pathological fact more clearly ascertained than that the most formidable issues of nervous disease are directly traceable to imperfect digestion. Insomnia, with its train of direful consequences, proceeds more frequently from weakened stomach than from any other cause. Many sufferers are prevented by this circumstance from taking proper nourishment. The true way to strengthen the nervous system is to invigorate the digestive and assimilative organs. Most weak people, stimulated under its exhilarating influence, will sleep sound. The daily use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will do more to renew and sustain the vital forces of the enfeebled nerves, and invigorate the whole system, than all the so-called nervine tonics in the world. Persons who are troubled with nervousness, should not allow a single dose of the Bitters to be taken before each meal.

The Deposed Sultan.

Accounts of the revolution in Constantinople are very conflicting. The majority of the reports, however, agree as to the following particulars: The Ministers assembled on Monday afternoon at the residence of the Grand Visier, and, on discussing the state of public affairs, they concluded that unless some remedial measures were adopted universal rebellion and a general collapse of the State would result. A resolution was adopted embodying these views, and a petition to the Sultan drawn up, praying him to abdicate in order to save the country. The Sultan received the petition with effected composure and said he would consider the matter. On Tuesday morning there was a great stir in the streets. Trade guilds, firemen, water drawers, and water carriers, headed by Softa, formed in procession and marched to the Sultan's palace, accompanied by the military, who were apparently unprovided with orders to act in case of such an emergency. During its progress the procession was increased by thousands. The palace was guarded by mounted police, who did not interfere with the crowd, although the orlea were raised of "Down with Abdul Aziz!" "Viva Murad!" In the meantime Murad, having been released from his own house, to which he had been confined by the Sultan, was conducted to a mosque and saluted as "Sultan Murad the Fifth." While this was happening it was suggested to Abdul Aziz that it would be prudent for him to remove with his four sons to the old palace of Im. He complied, and was escorted thither almost speechless.

LONDON, June 1.—A correspondent telegraphs from Constantinople the following account of the revolution: After vainly soliciting the Sultan to adopt reforms, the Grand Visier and Hussein Avre Pasha and Midhat Pasha resolved to depose him. The Dolma Bagtchee Palace was beset with troops. Murad was proclaimed Sultan in the presence of all the Ministers, Shaik Ul Islam and the Moollahs. Then Sulleiman Pasha, accompanied by soldiers and officers, informed Abdul Aziz that the nation had deposed him, and that he should deliver up the palace to his successor. The attitude of the troops convinced Aziz that resistance was impossible. He, with his family, including Zuleika and fifty-three boys, filled with women, were conveyed under escort to the Topkahan Palace. France, Italy and England have recognized Murad as Sultan.

VIENNA, May 31.—The Austrian Ambassador at Constantinople telegraphs that the revolution might have been avoided by a timely recall of Ignatieff, the Russian Ambassador.

Many rumors are current of the assassination of Abdul Aziz. It is reported on the other hand that he will be sent to a distant town in Asia, where he will be confined with his family.

The Tricolique Eastern Question.—

London, May 30.—The Standard's Vienna correspondent telegraphs that the Porte has instructed its Embassador to Austria, Germany, and Russia, to remonstrate against the expected official communication of the Berlin memorandum, as Turkey would be obliged to totally decline its proposals. The Porte also instructs its Embassador to declare that intervention of the friendly Powers is thoroughly inadmissible. The Porte can accept only measures why the propositions cannot be admitted, the principal of which are that a two months' armistice would only revive the activity of the insurgents, who are now disheartened by defeat, and that the sovereign rights of the Sultan include free action with regard to the disposition of his army, and interference in those rights as would imperil him from having troops within his own territory when he considered it necessary.

The Marquis of Hartington, in a speech at the laying of the foundation of the new City Liberal Club-house to-day, stated that the situation of foreign relations in the East was grave. Earl Granville said he believed there was some unnecessary alarm about the immediate future, still the Government had to deal with a state of things requiring the anxious consideration of the statesmen of Europe.

It has been announced that Montgomery Queen, of cireus renown, intends going into the business of ostrich farming in this State, and we are informed that he has purchased a tract of lat. near Hayward's, Alameda county, with that intention. Here is an item giving the experience of a gentleman in the business:

Mr. A. Douglass, an English settler in the Cape Colony, South Africa, commenced his experience about eight years ago with ostriches. He has now a flock of 300 on hand, having sold eighty-five. Each bird eats about twenty pounds of vegetable matter per day, and the net profit from the sale of birds and feathers is stated at $125,000 in the four last years. The cost of the beginning of the experiment is not given. The birds are hatched by artificial means, and the incubator requires forty-two days. In natural hatching one egg in ten fails; in the artificial process one in twelve.

THE INSURRECTION IN MEXICO.—Washington, May 29.—Official advices received from Mexico report that the State of affairs in the vicinity of Vera Cruz remains about the same as reported two weeks since. The insurrection there is threatening. Vera Cruz and other towns on the coast. They seem to be carrying on a kind of guerrilla warfare. The railroad and telegraph to the city of Mexico have been cut by the rebels near Vera Cruz, trains have been fired upon and communication was suspended for a week. Those advices are of May 18th, and on the 19th May the military with about 400 soldiers reached Vera Cruz, en route to reinforce Escobedo at Matamoras. Advices from Tampico and Tuxpan are similar to those from Vera Cruz. The rebels hold Matalan. No foreign residents have been molested. The Mexican Government expressed the greatest confidence in its ability to very shortly crush out the rebellion.

ST. LOUIS, May 30.—Information from Internal Revenue Supervisor Meyer, who is hunting up illicit stills in Bollinger county, is to the effect that there are crooked stills on nearly every creek in the county, and that there are several scattered on out-of-the-way places in the woods, and consideble resistance has been offered to the Government forces when arrests have been attempted. In the United States District Court to-day seven suits against distillers' bonds were decended, and judgments entered in favor of the Government, against Alfred Bemis for $79,000, and Louis Tesseher for $50,000. District Attorney Dyer will move for sentence against several minor members of the whisky ring in the latter part of the week.

The Great Mustang Race.

NEW YORK, May 26.—The Montana rider succeeded yesterday in running the twenty-five mustangs 155 miles inside of seven hours. The exact time of the riding from the start to the finish was six hours, eighteen minutes and forty-three seconds. The manager of the race advertised that Perrin would ride twenty-five mustangs 155 miles over a course for the stake of $10,000. It is not probable that any money was put up on the race. The race was evidently gotten up, like its predecessors, for the sake of the gate money it was sure to bring in. The manager was asked this forenoon to name the person who put up the stakes, but he declined to do so, saying the man who put up the money would not have their names known for all he could pile itself into the track. The statement was too absurd to be credited by those who heard it. The race was evidently a money investment, and as such it proved even more successful than was anticipated, the crowd being immense. The entire number of spectators was 15,000, whereof 12,000 paid $1 apiece. The entire party arrived in ordinarily respectable, there being very few bolting men and very little bolting. Perrin's riding was admired by everybody. The horses behaved better with him than with Parker. The care that was taken of Perrin was in marked contrast with the treatment of Parker. Of course Perrin was well and a common sunbeam. He ate hard-tack, ham and whickens and mince pie, and drank tea or beer by the quart. He always in the same direction, and came in at the end of the 25th mile and 155th mile with proper frequency to proper quantities. He was furnished with fresh tape with long slacks, at intervals of five or six miles, which not only kept his head cool, but also the reason of the change in colors of the mixes greatly relieved his eyes. He was also required to ride in a direction repeatedly. He drove his horses much faster than Parker drove them. Parker's best mile was 2:26; Perrin's best mile was 2:17½. The best time, however, was 2:16½, and 2:12¼.

DIDN'T WANT HOME RULERS.

A very queer affidavit was read in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin. It had reference to a motion for a change of venue in a libel action for libel brought by Mr. Hewson, a poor law guardian in Limerick county, against Mr Sheehy, a coroner and collector of rates in the same county. The libel consisted of the trial for Dublin, whereon Mr. Sheehy moved, on the ground of convenience, that the case should be tried at the Assizes to be conducted in Limerick. An affidavit of Mr. Hewson was filed in opposition to this. It was a document of many columns, but the two on which most stress was laid by Mr. Hewson's counsel, and to which the Court chiefly paid attention, affirmed that there are a great many Home Rulers and Tenant-righters in Limerick county, and that the libel complained, being known to be against Home Rule, and having, as he supposed, the sanction of his guardians, it would be impossible to get a fair jury. They would think all "rale to war" against him. The counsel for the plaintiff combated the affidavit. They pointed out that Home Rulers and Tenant-righters are to be found, not in Dublin only, but in every Irish county, that Limerick should try its own business, and that there is not the slightest ground for the wholesale imputations cast out by the defendant's affidavit. They urged that, if the case were to be tried in Limerick only, but in every Irish county, that Limerick should try its own business, and that there is not the slightest ground for the wholesale imputations cast out by the defendant's affidavit. A novel description of funeral was seen recently in the English town of Watford, when the remains of the Countess of Essex were buried in a cemetery there. Instead of an ordinary hearse a sort of wagonette was used, and instead of a black pall there was a purple canopy. The Earl's head coachman, dressed in his usual livery, drove this strange-looking vehicle. The coffin, of thin planks of polished deal, was pierced all over with holes in order to speed the progress of decay. The Earl of Essex, husband of the lady thus interred, has written some letters in the public press advocating the sort of change in funerals and interments which he has now himself carried into practice.

NOTRE DAME, MISSION DOLORES.

Eleventh Annual Commencement Exercises.

We were unable, owing to the lateness of the week, to give more than a passing notice of the exercises of this academy, which took place on the afternoon of June 1st. There being but limited accommodations for an audience, the invitations were obliged to exclude the parents and friends of the pupils, and none but the clergy and some members of the press were invited. His Grace the Most Rev. Archbishop and a number of the clergy of the city were present. An unusual, with the exhibition of this Academy, everything was conducted with an exactness and taste that were deserving of the highest praise. The exercises of the day were festooned with the national colors. From two pillars were suspended the Irish and American flags, held together in the center by the shield and look of an American eagle. The spirits of the pupils, especially the little ones, were excited to an unusual degree when they marched into the room and saw around them the beauties of nature and evergreens with which the hall was decorated; and the happiness they felt shone out like an inspiration through all their performances. Following was the programme.

"Shakespeare March," duet, on four pieces, Misses B. Bufford, M. Joyce; K. Jones, A. Hastings, M. Godfrey, F. Clark, M. T. Cleary and E. McLean.

"Welcome to Our Guests," chorus, Miss J. Geary.

"The Nightingale," vocal piece, Miss Annie Shockley.

"Fairy Dance," piano forte duet, Metal"—Misses M. Cleary, Lucretia Lacoste, Mary Cleary, Georgie Cleary, A. Slattery, M. O'Neil, A. Bennet, M. F. Bufford, E. Riley; J. Joyce, Mary Joyce, Mary Hastings, A. Coppa and L. Richards.

Piano solo, "Rondo Arabic," Miss E. Hefren.

Medical Charade—Character: Nightingale, Miss D. Packard; Notice, Miss E. Hefren; Time, Miss Em. M. Geary; Queen of the Bride, Miss A. Geary; Bridesmaids, Misses Lucretia Lacoste, Mary Cleary, Georgie Cleary, Mary Hughes; Second Week, Miss A. Slattery; Fortune, Lady, Miss Annie Shockley; Miss Em. M. Geary, Miss Mary Cleary, Miss Georgie Cleary, Essays—Women's Influence," Miss M. Kaney; Virtue is a Passport to Heaven," Miss M. Hess; "Keep my ship come in," Miss M. Phelps; "Then and Now," Miss Maggie Sullivan.

Solo to four pieces, "Centennial March," Misses M. Bonner, M. A. Slattery, M. Hefren, M. Hughes.

Charade—Whole, Good Conduct; Characters: Miss Mary Cleary, Miss Georgie Cleary, Miss Lucretia Lacoste, Miss Annie Shockley; Scene, Miss Mary Hughes; Locality, La Dame Blanche," Misses N. Hefren, M. Hughes, M. Cleary, Mary Joyce, Mary Hastings, Professors, Order and Domestic Economy.

Chorus, "Shepherd Boy," Misses Mary Joyce and M. Hastings.

Miss N. Hafren was the recipient of a beautiful gold medal, the gift of a friend, for excellence in music, she having won the first premium in her class. The medal represented a lyre, and was elegantly chased and richly inlaid. The music was very fine, the dialogues were well spoken, and altogether the exhibition was of the most pleasing character.

Among the compositions the Centennial paper by Miss Maggie Sullivan was the most meritorious. The young lady served up her Centennial sorcerss in such sensible and well-digested thoughts that we are certainly only too glad to publish the same hereinfre. Miss Sullivan spoke of America one hundred years ago, and gave evidence that she read the history of our land to advantage. The early struggles and triumphs of the young Columbia, the steady progress through the long years in the manufactures, the sciences and the arts; the wonderful discoveries and inventions of her sons, her grand resources, her mineral wealth, her commerce and, lastly, her bringing together all the nations of the earth to do her homage in the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, were excellently and neatly elaborated. The essayist, speaking of California, and what she was at the time of the Declaration of Independence, alluded to the work of the old missionaries who "sailed through the Golden Gate" and gave the name of their "sainted father to the city of San Francisco." A monument of those bygone days is before us in the time-worn church of the Mission Dolores. For one hundred years has it withstood the storm and the gnawing tooth of decay, and to-day, in its quaint old belfry and mouldering walls, it bears the look of sublimity. The trifle of Christianity, which for one hundred years have been proclaimed before its whites, has given to some significant generations have come and gone, young people have grown old, and the voice of many a holy confessor, which through the long years preached the truths of their Divine Master, are now hushed forever; yet still the old church, with its "wrinkled front," bears well its years, but, like an aged parent, is drawing gradually away from mortalness. It reminds us forcibly of the instability of worldly things and the certainty of their passing away. "Let us hope," said the young lady, in conclusion, "that the same transformation which this sacred spot has witnessed within the century just folded in the embrace of history, may be repeated in the next; that the improvements in the past are but a prelude and harbinger of renewed activity in the future. And let us also hope that, when the opening century shall have faded away, there may still be found near this hallowed spot hearts and minds as true and devoted to the interests of learning, humanity and religion as those of the pastors and teachers who in day do honor to the Convent of Notre Dame."

Following are the awards to the successful competitors in the classes, as published in the catalogue, which was finely arranged and printed by the enterprising house of Thomas & Co., of this city:

Gold Crosses—Nestor Pujolis—First Division: Graduate, Nettie Mclaughlin; premium, Nellie B. THE DEAD SISTER OF CHARITY.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

A soldier of Charity," aged eighteen, died in one of our Atlantic cities, during the prevalence of the cholera, while in voluntary attendance upon the sick.

"Bring out your dead!" The midnight street
Heard and gave back the hoarse, low call;
Harsh fell the tread of hasty feet—
Echoed through the dark the coarse white sheet—
Her cloth—and her pall.

"What—only one!" the brutal driver said,
As, with no sign, he opened away the dead.

How sank the inmost hearts of all
As rolled the dead-cart slowly by,
When creaking wheel and harsh hoof-fall
The dying turned him to the wall,
To hear it and to die!

Onward it rolled, while all its driver stayed,
And hoarsely shouted, "Ho! bring out your dead!"

It paused beside the burial place:
"Pass in your load!" and it was done.
With quiet hand and uttered face,
Meekly to the grave's embrace
They cast them, one by one—
Stranger and friend—the evil and the just,
Together trodden in the churchyard dust!

And then, young martyr! thou was there;
He white-robed sisters round thee trod—
Nor holy hymn, nor funeral prayer,
Nor through the damp and noisome air,
Orisa rose to thy God.

Nor fewer, nor crone, nor hallowed taper gave
Hope in the dread and bounty in the grave.

Yet, gentle martyr! thou shalt be,
In every heart of bloody feeling,
A rite so holy paid to thee
As if beneath the sternest tree
Thy sisterhood were kneeling.

At Pamper hours, like sorrowing angels, keeping
Their tearful watch around thy place of sleeping.

For then wast one in whom the light
Of heaven's own love was kindled well;
Redeem'd from martyr's night,
Through weary day and wakeful night,
By many deeds and words may tell:
Gentle and meek and lowly and unknown—
Thy mention mourned so by the God alone.

Where mighty hearts were falling—where
The storm-wind strewn green fruit with death,
O high-souled martyr! thou wast there,
Inhaling, from the heathenous air,
Poison with every breath.

Thy cheek grew pale, thy eye became
Unnaturally bright with fever flame,
Yet shrinking not from offices ill dread
For the worn dying and the unconscious dead.

And where the sickly taper shed
Its light through vapors damp, confined,
Blended in a strange faith thy trust
With God's and Nature's holy dust—
A new Election by the lord
Of suffering humanities!
Pointing the spirit, in its dark journey,
To that pure hope which feareth not away.

Innocent teacher of the high
And holy mysteries of heaven,
How through the twilight came each gleaming eye,
In mute and awful sympathy,
As day by day prayers were given;
And the ever-hovering Spoiler came, the while,
As a fiend's fostered—A deliverer's smile!

A blessed rest—and worthy one,
When, flowing from the wound, as then,
Before life's pathway had begun,
The hues to springtime flower and sun,
Had sealed her early end!
Early to bear beauty and her youth,
Giving to God her bosom's fairest truth,
Her pure obedience and her guileless faith.

Earth may not claim thee. Nothing here
Could be for thee a meet reward;
Thou hast a treasure in the upper sphere,
Eye hath not seen it, nor the ear
Of living mortal heard—
The joy of worshipping the promised bliss above—
The holy presence of Eternal Love!

Sleep on in peace. The earth has not
A nobler grave than thine shall be.
The martyr's fame is unforgot,
The lovely exercise of thought,
The fire of poesy—
These have but frail and fading hue on—this Shall have true Eternity enduro.

Yes, and when mightier names shall crumble down,
And human pride and power be all,
The herald's line of long renown—
The mace and the shield—the pomp and crown—
Perishing clutter all!
The pure devotion of thy generous heart
Shall live in heaven, of which it was a part.

FRENCH RADICALISM.

For some reason or other the French radicals have got it into their heads that infidelity must be a part of their political creed, and they rarely lose any opportunity for showing contempt for religion. This is the tradition of 1793, when nearly everything sacred was abolished by decree headed in the name of the Committee of Public Safety. A few days after the appearance of one of these decrees a French schoolman was summoned before one of the tribunals organized by the famous committee. He found a man sitting upon the bench with his hat upon his head. "What's thy name?" he brusquely asked. "Le Marquis de Saint Croix!" "But there are no more titles in France!" "Very well," was the reply, "Monsieur de Saint Croix." "The religious ban replaced the word monsieur." "Ah! my name then is de Saint Croix." "Let the patriotic de ha also been abolished." "But I think I have." "There are no more saints." "As you please, but my name is Croix." "That is equally forbidden and classical in the extreme." "Nay, for, citizen," cried the marquis in despair, "then call me whatever you please." "Under the Republic we have only citizens, and the second person (thee) is mutually used." "I do, de Saint Croix and no more and 'thee!' and 'thou!' the citizen judge in his replies. The latter had been put in each good humor by the pleasure he found in plaguing the marquis in this way that he let him off easy.

SEEKING THEM TO HEAVEN.

A Protestant clergymen of New York makes complaint through one of the Church organs that every time he is called upon to address the mourners at a funeral, he is asked to give assurance that the deceased has gone to heaven. He says that Protestant clergymen are expected to do this even in behalf of the vilest sinners and hardest characters that die out of the congregation," and that on incident in his own experience at the funeral of an "ungodly young man of notorious bad character, who met a sudden death." The pious mother of the young reprobate implored him to tell the people around the coffin that her son had departed for heaven, but the stern clergyman resolutely refused to accede to this request. He does not say that he gave any opinion about the man's destiny in another world; but the people doubtless drew their own inferences when they saw he did not conform to the ordinary custom of sending souls to heaven. The New York newsletter paper from which we glean these facts very properly justifies the clergymen, saying that he could not send to heaven a man who had chosen hell; and it was proper that he should avoid hypocrisy.

BY MRS. M. M. WARDE.

"He must go with me, ma'am," said the policeman. "Any one as takes an interest in him can hear of him at the Mayor's office."

Dennie rustily handed the shoe and its white captive to Eugene.

"You didn't do it, Dan?" said Eugene.

"No, sir!" cried Dennie emphatically. "Please tell my mother, little one, I don't even know what it is they think I stole, but I stole nothin,' that there's certain."

"Mamma," said Eugene, with tears springing to his eyes, "will you come back with me to tell his mother?"

"No, dearie," she answered, her face full of distress; "I will go and see grandpa first; he might be able to get him out to-night."

They walked home quite silent, and when they got to the house Eugene said:

"Now, mamma; I'll fix Shamrock in a box, so that if grandpa will let me go with him to get Denny out, I'll be ready."

So he went and got a soap box and fixed it cosy for a dog.

"Now, Shamrock," said he, as the mouse's eyes were watched through the hole in the big shoe, "don't you and me have a secret, and that is, that I'll do all I can do to get Denny out. And another secret is, I'm going to ask mamma to find out what she's crying about; it's not gored, I think the girls called it, or guessed, or something, and mamma, and we'll get it fixed, and then they can't make fun of her any more. Glory! Jingo! what's this?"

Shamrock nearly made his escape by it, for Eugene almost lost his hold on a bit of mouse's accommodation.

He drew out the little creature safely in the bag, and then went to grandpa.

"Look, grandpa," he cried, holding it up. Of course the first question was: "Where did you get it?"

He breathlessly told where. Now grandpa was a lawyer, and a very distinguished one.

"What did they accuse Ellen's son of stealing?" he immediately asked.

"We do not know," Mrs. Morrogh replied; "but, father, you surely do not think it is theirs?"

"I do, indeed, Kathleen, and the boy is either the victim of a mistake, or else a very sharp lad, who put this here to hide his own guilt."

"No, grandpa!" cried Eugene eagerly. "Denny could not be so bad! Look how he stood up for me!"

"I should be sorry think it, Eugene," answered grandpa gravely; "sorry beyond all words, to think it of his father's son. But this and the story of the coin put together look badly, and his fighting for you proves nothing. But stand up for him, boy! you are right in that, until you know he don't deserve it."

"And what is to be done, father?" asked Mrs. Morrogh. "Poor Ellen must not be left in suspense."

He took his hat. "Go you to Ellen," he said, "and tell her, even if the boy be proved guilty—which God grant he may not be—I will do all I can for him. I'll go to the Mayor's office now, and see what is to be done tonight."

"Let me go with you, grandpa!" pleaded Eugene.

"A true Morrogh!" said grandpa smiling, "Faithful in trouble as well as in triumph! Be it so, my brave Irish Socrates!" gently stroking his grandson's head.

"Come on! come on, then," said grandpa. "Let no one whet manner of boy this abandon of yours will turn out to be."

So they went. We will leave them, kind readers, and leave Mrs. Morrogh to go and console the poor mother in her humble home, where she will find always a shadow bad fallen.

When they reached the office, and grandpa had made his inquiries, to Eugene's dismay it was found out that Dennie was accused of the robbery of some money and an emerald ring! The accusation was not brought by the lady, but by another, for whom the police were on the lookout even now, were implicated in the set.

"This is never took them, grandpa," said Eugene stoutly; "it must have been the others, just."

"Easier to believe than to prove, boy," said grandpa. "But let us go and see the prisoner, and then what he has to say for himself."

There was poor Dennie sadly at the cell's lookup, the picture of sorrow and horror. His sad apart from the rest of the prisoners, but he sobbed on. His head was bowed over his knees, his whole attitude one of misery. Eugene pointed to him—he did not look up when they entered—and, for something or my own thoughts, not seeing to mind any one.

"That's Denny," whispered Eugene as he pointed.

"Don't say a word," said grandpa; "let me speak to him first."

He went quite close to where he sat, but Dennie did not yet look up. He seemed completely wrapped in some absorbing grief. And now very weird sigh escaped his lips—then he covered his face with his hands.

Now grandpa spoke. "What are you thinking of boy?" he said, and Eugene almost held his breath to hear the answer.

"Of my mother, sir," was the reply. "Poor Denny," said Eugene coming forward, "didn't I tell you?"

Dennie stood up and made a bow; he could not say anything.

"Of your mother?"

"Yes, sir; she's dead, and I'm glad of it, for I'm sure she'd have broken her heart."

"And you?" asked grandpa.

"I've been used to roughin' it, sir," he answered ingenuously 'mid among the sorrow I go with this here don't amount to anything."

"For them," pointing in the direction of the Mayor's office, "as are high up as fellers, and then it aint no difference whether we're good or bad."

"How do you know that?"

"I know, sir," said the boy, with a sudden rush of color to his sunburnt face, "I've seen poor fellers that done nothin' sent up for months 'cos they was newsboys, or bootblacks maybe. An' I've known other dressed up coves in store that stole lots, gettin' off all the time. I'll be sent up, but I didn't do it!"

"Can you prove that?"

"Ill try to, sir, for my mother's sake, but it won't be no use. If they only know'd one thing, though, they'd believe as best."

"And what is that?"

"Why, say of us fellows as goes in Mass an' confession ain't goin' to be caught in no such performance. Us that's Irish mostly, it is sir. But then they don't know that there"—a deep sigh here—"they think we git leave to commit sin in confession, an' steal to pay the priest for it."

Grandpa's face lit and his voice softened. "And what do you believe on that point?" he asked gently.

"I believe," said Dennie, speaking more like a man than a poor little captive boy, "that confession's all that keeps us from doin' what they think we are. And then there that is it, never goes to confession at all—that's the difference."

"Pshh!" said the old man—"Irish faith kept bright through all trials!"

And Eugene, seeing that grandpa's heart was touched, cried eagerly: "And oh! grandpa, you'll be kind to Denny, won't you?"

"If Denny will let me," was the answer, and he turned to the cowboy, still sitting in a dejected attitude.

"You must make up your mind, my boy, to trust in me," he said; "to trust in me entirely, or I can do nothing for you. Your own supposed statement of your case is no true, and betrays so much shrewdness, that I hope you can see how needful it is for you to speak openly to one who is ready to befriend you."

"Yes, sir," said Dennie.

"Very well. To begin with, you must tell me the true story of the sole."

The newsboy's countenance fell. "I don't have nothin' to do with the robbery at all, sir," he said.

"On the contrary, it would have every thing to do with it if mentioned in court," was the answer. "The fact of your having money for so expensive a purchase at the very time you were accused of stealing money for so expensive a purchase at the very time you were accused of stealing would be what is called presumptive evidence against you."

"Well, sir," said Dennie reluctantly, "I'll tell you, but not before any one else."

Grandpa obliged him by promising to take him to another room, and Eugene watched long and anxiously for him on their return. When at last they came the old man's countenance betrayed by the hand, and he put this in Eugene's little one, saying:

"There, Eugene, take your champion to his mother, and tell her he is worthy of his name and country. I will be answer for his bail for appearance in court, and there he will plead his own cause, as he has done before me, with Irish truth and Irish eloquence combined. It shall be his first speech at the bar, but, by God, not his last."

The Sorrows of the Conquered.

One of the marks of barbarism in the past was cruelty and outrage to the conquered people. The Romans plundered conquered cities, seized the manhood and comely youth of the subdued territory, and dragged them to Rome to be slaves and harlots; tyrants were placed in power over the remnant of the fallen nation, to continue injustice and spoliation in the name of their defeat. But this dark side of the Pagan character still exists in nations that consider themselves civilized. For several hundred years poor Ireland has felt the unmitigating, crushing power of a conqueror; she was robbed of her lands, an alien Church was forced on her, her commerce blighted, her schools closed, her people driven by famine across the bayonets to exile or starvation. Poland has writhed under all the horrors of subjugation, and, as in Ireland, a theology of the mildest rule would not erase the indignation that hangs around the memories of a tyrannical subjugation.

There are two provinces just now undergoing the lash of a proud conqueror. Alsace and Lorraine are groaning under the scourge of their Protestant conquerors. Our sessions may rant as intolerance, but the persecuting spirit shows against supposed Catholic influence. The Protestant Reformation was a revolt against the intolerance of Catholicism, and these two Catholic provinces. Although to the terms of the treaty of Versailles they have the religious convictions of those provinces to be respected, the persecution is carried on with a hatred of the Catholic Church more virulent than in Prussia itself. The apostasy of the Christian Brothers and the various protests was but a step to introduce the system of diabolical effort to corrupt the youth of the country. We will have no reference only to one requirement of the new system which will surprise and startle the admirers of German piety.

It has been nearly universally admitted that there is a prudence and even propriety in keeping boys' and girls' schools separate. Whenever Catholics have the control of the youth they insist on the advantages of this for the mutual advantage of both sexes, and the system is adopted throughout France. The German Government is determined that they shall be conducted together. The nuns and good religious women of Alsace have not yet been closed may keep girls until their shirts or tenth year, after that they must go to the boys' school. The German theory in support of the arrangement is that as the two sexes are destined to live together they should be brought in contact and become at once used to it. From this fatal system the immorality of the Government is commencing to blast the innocence of a country famous for its modesty and youth. Besides the suspicion of exaggeration on the second requirement we are to bring forward facts of recent occurrence, that we may remember the delicacy of our readers. It will be sufficient to say that in addition to the disgusting these schools, address the assembled pupils, blushing with childish innocence—"You will love each other, and will make choice of each other."

A piece more than the poor people try to resist this iniquitous system the inspector causes the girls' school with a posse of police, the children are called up and asked their age, all that owned to nine years were ordered to stand aside, and then marched off to the boys' school, with the command here at their head.

No wonder the banners of Alsace and Lorraine are draped in the deepest mourning as they hang in the sanctuary at Lourdes; no wonder the cry of the people rolls with indignation around the Chamber of Deputies at Paris, urging on another war. No wonder 40,000 have emigrated into the heart of France during the last two years.

Besides these diabolical efforts to ruin the morality of the children, there are reported some ridiculous contre temps that make us smile at the baffled pride of the conquerors. Leaders were arrested by the police court for the high misdemeanor of having a seat in the public gardens which a Prussian officer presumed to share with them, and the poor ladies were in every case heavily fined. The same suggestion visited with a severe rebuke (with the threat of magisterial penalties in case of relapse) the delicacy of certain ladies who had been too loud in their merriment at the peculiar taste in millinery displayed by their fair sisters from the fast circles of the German metropolis.

As in Ireland in the penal days, as in Italy in the hour of triumph for the power of darkness, the education and the morals of the country, and the administration of justice, are in the hands of a few proud and unbelieving men, whose mission of ruin and sorrow seems to come from the prime minister of an infernal kingdom. —Montreal True Witness.

MIRACLES WROUGHT BY RELICS.

Strange Scenes Witnessed at the West Hoboken Monastery.

The Sick Restored—Little Children Recovering Health and Strength—A Cripple's Crutches Rendered Useless.

We clip the following from the New York Sunday Mercury, a secular journal. The testimony which it gives is the more valuable, coming from a non-Catholic source:

In West Hoboken the Passionist Fathers have built a handsome monastery, with a fine church connected with it, and they have labored with much success in gathering a large congregation. For eleven years they have occupied their commodious building, planning, raising funds and building, and in that short space of time their fame has spread through this city and vicinity, so that every Catholic knows who they are and what they are doing. This is due to the fact that

MANY STARTLING MIRACLES

Are said to have been wrought by the relics in possession of the Fathers. Not a day passes but sick persons, cripples and infirm are brought there for the healing touch, and they come from all parts of the State of New York and New Jersey, and some from even more distant States. Some come but once, others find it necessary to go oftener, and as the number of those who seek the "grace of healing" increases, so does also the fame of the life-saving power grow and spread.

A representative of the Mercury, desirous of investigating these wonderful stories for himself, heard concerning the miracles wrought by the hands of the Passionist Fathers, visited West Hoboken, and was courteously received by the Superior and brethren. Father Vitalian, a genial-faced priest in the community, some twenty theological students, and half a dozen lay brethren. Father Vitalian, who is a cultured gentleman, of Italian birth, and thoroughly polished and genial with incoming strangers, is parish priest of the Church of St. Michael, connected with the monastery, and he very willingly answered the questions put to him. The good Father said it was true that

MANY MIRACLES HAD BEEN WROUGHT

By the relics in the hands of the priests. It occurred through faith and by the gift of God. Healing did not follow as a matter of was not expected that it would. Nor was it always instantaneous. People sometimes came two or three times before they experienced relief. It was unquestionable that such a power resided in the Church. It had been so in the beginning, and would so to time to the end. The very shadow of the Apostles wrought miracles, and handkerchiefs that had touched them had the same effect; and why not the relics of good and holy men who had succeeded them? It was not, of course, the relics in themselves, but God using them as a means to bless the hands of his appointed minister. We must always look upon God as the source of help in spiritual things as in nature.

RELICS WORKING MIRACLES.

"What relics have you, Father?" asked the reporter. "Oh, they are various. Sometimes a piece of the bone, or a portion of a garment, or a ring, or the like. You know you are all now hunting up relics of Washington, and anything he ever touched, his sword, his clothes, his sword, everything has a sacred value in his countrymen's eyes. So with us. We have relics of the Founder, Michael Darris, Michael Sharon (or Condon) and Patrick Melody, and Melody eight years ago. Darris and Wilson were two years ago. Darris and Wilson were two later are under sentence of imprisonment for life in the penitentiary at Trenton. Melody was shot dead.

"Have you any relics of Jesus?" asked the reporter. "Oh, yes, we have pieces of the vase, one a corporal and one a purificator. Five or six other soldiers were shot dead. Two were sent to prison for life—Michael Darris, who died in 1638, wrote the couplet—

Darris, the vase, wanton after all shine bright,
But locked in sear have neither heat nor light.

Robert Hogge used essentially the same idea when he wrote—

Lete lie like a landscape, which doth stand
Beneath at a distance, proper at hand.

Yaldon, writing "Against Enjoyment," did not improve the expression much, but helped to suggest the perfected lines when he wrote—

We're charmed with distant views of happiness,
But near approaches make the prospect less.

Gerth followed with these lines—

A distant prospect pleases us,
We find but deserts close and flowing air.

Campbell, who was remarkably successful in giving fresh and agreeable expression to his own thoughts and to those of others, finally crystallized the thought in the oft-quoted couplet:

The distance lends enchantment to the view,
And robes the mountain in its azure hue.

Edward Waller first wrote in English words a thought afterwards more improved in expression by Lord Byron. Waller's lines were—

That beauty's lilies and roses are one
Which on the shield that made bold die
And a feather of the same
Wherewith he went to meet on high.

Plumpiere, in his translation of Æschylus, and Thomas Moore used the same idea, but Lord Byron, in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," gave to the world to be used thereafter as a quotation:

So the grave coquette on principle is posed
To make admirers mourn upon the plain,
More warmly fretting clods of dust and stone,
Viewed but one feather on the head she'd worn,
And winged the shaft that quivered in the brain.

The Observance of Sunday.

The discussion over the propriety of opening the Philadelphia Exposition on Sundays has not elicited many wiser words than the following. Believe: "Believe heartily and with spiritual self-complacency condemn the European and Catholic uses of Sunday, we must recall the religious uses the Roman Church makes of the other days of the week. When Protestant churches are kept open all other days as well as on Sunday, and public prayers are continued in them morning and evening, and Protestant Christians are found going by early dawn to divine service, or looking at the clock every Catholic peasants do, it will be time enough for them self righteously to condemn the foreign and Roman freer uses of Sunday. There can, of course, be no such exclusive association of sanctity with the Sunday in the case of Catholics as in that of Protestants, and

ANOTHER APPEAL.

Quite a large number—indeed, a majority—of our interior subscribers are in arrears for two years, some even longer. The amount each one owes is trifling, but aggregated is a sum amazing to us in the extreme. We want the money; it is honestly ours. The person who contracts a debt with a newspaper is as much bound to pay it as though he contracted it with a clothier or grocer. The newspaper man, however, are appealing to no small effect. Hardly pays to send an agent out collecting, costing, as it does, from twenty-five to fifty per cent., and in many instances going some out of his way to collect a few dollars. So he told some he reached to-day. "I'm so sorry! I shouldn't have let this run so long, but it was so small. I haven't a cent in the house to-day, however, but will send it to you next week." Of course the collector has to take his chagrin and go empty-handed. But "a next week" doesn't see the money come, and he has to take the same trouble next year, with probably the same result. This should not be. It is the easier and less expensive for the subscriber to remit to the publisher, and to expect him for the publisher to send out collectors. There are not a dozen subscribers on our books who would be inconvenienced by the payment of their subscriptions, while their non-payment crippled us. Two dots on the margin or wrapper will tell you how your account stands; then remit immediately the debt to this office, at our expense, if you desire.

THE COMING WAR.

It is quite evident there are stormy times ahead in Europe. The Turkish Empire is falling to pieces—perishing through the mere force of natural decay—and various great powers are desirous of picking up the fragments and appropriating them. There is not a very good understanding between those who seek for the spoils of the Moslem; they are jealous of each other's designs, and watch each other's moves, and the inevitable result is that a very serious quarrel is brewing, and this may cost the lives of a hundred thousand men before it is terminated—and it may prove more. Russia, backed all doubt, pushing matters to extremities. She relies on her enormous, and thinks herself strong enough to bear down all opposition; but, at all events, she is the most active in scheming and intrigue. Her plan seems to be to urge Servia and Bosnia to declare war against Turkey, although they have no real cause for it; to see that the Servian hostilities would surely be followed by outbursts of Mahomedan fanaticism against the Christian population, and out of them a pretext for intervention and for finally be manifested. Some have showed observers of the situation are of opinion that the recent revolution, the dethronement of Sultan ABDUL AZIZ, and the accession of his nephew MURAD, the heroine, will postpone the war until next year at any rate; but the telegrams of each succeeding day indicate that Europe is not likely to enjoy even that brief respite from bloodshed. A certain feature of the complication is that it is difficult to determine who are to be the contending parties. The idea generally accepted is that Russia, Germany, Greece and the revolutionists of Turkey will be arrayed against Austria, Turkey, England and Italy. France is not concerned in the fight; the policy of her Republican Government seems to be the strict avoidance of entangling alliances, and the probability, therefore, is that she will remain neutral. England, who need to be regarded as the "champion of Protestantism" in Europe, is now compelled by the force of circumstances to be the Catholic ally, and with very poor prospect of success. Unless France comes to the rescue—a thing that is not probable—Russia and Germany would, we think, be too strong for Turkey and her opponents, and could eventually do as they pleased with Turkey. The navy of England may play an important part in the struggle, because it is the most powerful in the world; but one can hardly refrain from smiling at the news that England has already dispatched ten regiments to Malta by way of preliminary to the fight. These ten regiments would number about seven or eight thousand men, and they would not be a decent mouthful for a Russian or Prussian corps d'armée to gobble up.

It is questionable if England, exerting all her strength, could place 60,000 soldiers in any part of Europe, so as a military power she would rank little, if anything, above Greece in the coming war. Irishmen, who always regard England's difficulty as Ireland's opportunity, will not, it appears to us, be able to draw much hope from the impending contest. It will not be that fierce destruction which would warrant an insurrection on the part of the Irish people. Moreover, as ill-luck has it, she will be, if she fights at all, on the side which will have the sympathy of most right-thinking men. Of course this does not arise from any desire on her part to defend right or justice, for she never takes these things into consideration in her wars; but it simply happens that she believes her interests will be advanced in trying to check the encroachments of Russia and Prussia on their neighbors' dominions. If she war does commence; and every day seems to render it more likely, it may prove the most extended and disastrous seen in Europe since the time of the First NAPOLEON. It is absolutely impossible to see how it will end, or what effect it will have upon the political division of the continent. We may be assured, however, it will bring about astonishing changes in the map of Europe, and necessitate new editions of our geographies. It does not require much penetration to discover that in reality this war is utterly needless and without provocation. The people do not want it. The domestic difficulties of Turkey, such as they are, could be peacefully settled in the course of time; and we are sure that neither the people of Russia nor Germany are so in love with bloodshed as to willfully bring it about by taking what does not belong to them. All they want is to be allowed to till their fields in quietness; but their sovereign lords and masters want something different, and being loyal subjects, they must of course do as they are required. They could stop at home if they made up their mind to act unitedly, and ignore the commands of their superiors; but there is not much chance of their displaying so much good sense.

BLAINE'S PROSPECTS.

It is easy enough to see that Mr. JAMES G. BLAINE wants very badly to be the next President of the United States. All his public conduct for the last two years—or at all events, ever since the collapse of GRANT'S third term scheme—has been shaped for the purpose of helping forward his candidature. He has closely followed the current of popular opinion, or what seemed to be current of popular opinion, or what seemed to be judgment to be such, and taken advantage of all its eddies and currents to steer his own bark into the haven desired by his ambition. When a little bit of anti-Catholic feeling seemed the proper thing to secure the favor of a certain element in the population, Mr. JAMES G. BLAINE showed that he could surpass the bale and venom of the most rabid Vulgar Boy in denouncing against "Popery." There can be little doubt that his discreditable artifice was thoroughly successful, for at the present time it is universally acknowledged that the Democratic candidate of that numerous but not very intelligent party which views with alarm the progress of Catholicity in this country, and which is willing to inaugurate a veiled yet active persecution in order to check it. Added to these, he has the support of all statesmen and politicians of damaged reputations—and they, unfortunately, are not few—who feel that an honest and fearless President will be certain to sit down upon their designs and keep them in the obscurity suitable to their character. In this respect he is the opposite of BRISTOW, who is the representative of whatever is honest, patriotic and capable in the Republican party, and who is therefore in the

BLAINE'S MISFORTUNE

among his own household and in the ranks of his adversaries; and they have been scrutinizing, with very unpleasant minuteness, certain transactions of his which, to say the least, have an appearance of the reverse of corruption. He is combative, he is tricky and dexterous, and his activity in repelling the assaults upon him proves that he is not going to be silenced out of the field if he can possibly help it. One cannot help admiring his pluck and sedulity, even though the suspicion of his dishonesty is too strong to be smothered. The investigation that has already resulted in the ruin of a character to destroy MR. BLAINE'S prospects and frustrate his high ambition; but, it must be confessed, the evidence is not altogether conclusive, and there is room for him to wriggle out, though he must assume some very curious attitudes while so doing. From the telegraphic dispatches published in the week and the week preceding, our readers will be able to form for themselves a picture of the charges with reference to the $64,000 bribe, and also of his job in Northern Pacific shares, into which he seduced WARREN FISHER and AUGUSTA ADAMS, of Boston. There is no necessity for us to repeat the details in these columns. Looking over the facts it is hard to understand how MR. BLAINE can explain them away, or redeem his reputation from the unwelcome notoriety they cast upon it. The fierceness of his denials, and the vituperations of his accusers, which he indulges in, can deceive no person or make his case any better than it is. Indignation seemed the proper thing to secure the favor of a certain element in the population, MR

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of May 20.

ANTRIM.

The church which has been erected in Belfast by James Carlisle, Esq., J. P., in memory of his family, was opened a few days since for divine service in the presence of an immense audience. The President of the Conference said it was the most perfect Methodist structure in the United Kingdom.

CARLOW.

At the last Bagnalstown presentment sessions, P. R. Maiemore, Esq., applied for £140 as compensation for loss sustained by the burning of a hayrick at Kilgreany, on the 9th January last. There were several witnesses examined for and against the claim, which appeared to cause considerable interest. The magistrates and cess-payers, after some consultation, disallowed the claim.

On Sunday last (says the Carlow Post) the annual ceremonies in connection with the Feast of the Holy Cross were celebrated with unusual display at the beautiful church of Killeshin, which has recently undergone such internal improvements as to render it one of the neatest edifices in any parish in the diocese devoted to religious worship. At a quarter to 12 o'clock solemn High Mass was commenced, the celebrant being Rev. William Bourke, Carlow College. The sermon was preached by Rev. F. W. Boyle, Vice-President of the College, and was in every respect one of the most touching and eloquent which we have ever listened to on a similar occasion.

CLARE.

Information was given to the constabulary of Clare a few days since to the effect that the informant had received a letter threatening him with death if he did not give up proceeding a right to pay into a bank. The letter was found on a postoffice furrow. The informant of the police was brought before the district sub-inspector, and questioned as to the circumstances connected with the case. He refused to swear any information, but gave a detailed account of his relations with his neighbors. The opinion of the constabulary is that the letter is not of a nature calculated to excite very serious apprehension.

CORK.

The contest between the Great Southern and Western Railway Company and the corporation and Harbor Board of Cork before the Committee of the House of Commons has terminated in a compromise highly advantageous to the city. The Company are to be allowed to close Hargreave street, and add the ground to their property, and in exchange for this concession they agree that a quay eighty feet in depth shall be constructed along the foreshore purchased by them from the Steam Packet Company, from the end of Penrose's quay to Water street, which is to be made a piece thoroughfare.

At the last meeting of the Bandon Board of Guardians, among the admissions was an old man named Denis Murphy, who was sent to the Union from Weise, after spending fifty years in England, and a woman named Powell, who had been there eight years.

The Mallow Board of Guardians have adopted a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land Bill.

FERMANAGH.

A young lad of sixteen years, named Thomas Maguire, residing with his father, Patrick, at Market square, Enniskillen, attempted to drown himself on Thursday morning last by jumping into Lough Erne, at the Broad Meadow. He had been drinking with some acquaintances during the day, and on being reproved by his parents, he started off in a passion and sought in some manner to put them by putting himself out of existence.

GALWAY.

Rev. Patrick Loftus, P. P., Williamstown, has purchased the Spiddle estate at £1,650.

The Galway Vindicator announces the death on May 13 at Ballinaguilla, Loughgeah, of Daniel Geraghty, Esq., aged 85 years. The deceased was through life an exemplary member of the Catholic Church for the sacred ministry of which he ordained his brother, Rev. Patrick Geraghty; Rev. James Geraghty, Rev. Roderick Geraghty, and his brother-in-law, Rev. Thos. Kenney.

We regret to announce, says the Galway Vindicator, the death of Sister Mary Louis Tighe, which event occurred on Sunday last at the Presentation Convent in this city. The deceased lady was ever half a century connected with the Order, and had ordained herself to the entire sisterhood, by whom she is deeply and deservedly regretted.

A few days since a numerously attended and most influential meeting of gentlemen and farmers of the counties of Galway and Roscommon was held for the purpose of organizing a branch of the Tenant Protection Association for the above named counties. Among those present were Rev. John Kirwan, Adm. Ballinasloe; Rev. John McKeogue, C. C., do; Rev. Patrick Costello, C. C., do; Rev. J. R. Molonay, President St. Michael's Seminary; James Kilmartin, Shruhan House; John J. Madden, Walter R. Duffy, Esq., Ward, St. Ward, Matthew Hart, Ballinasloe; William Corcoran, P. Madden, P. Egan, P. Clonan, M. Kelly, F. Dowling, M. Kilkelly, P. O'Connor, Ballinasloe; J. Kidulf, P. Colgan, J. O'Brien, M. Dowsey, county Roscommon, etc.

KERRY.

At the Killarney petty session last week Eugene O'Keeffe, the local agent for a disreputable print called the Master Express, was prosecuted for having sold copies of that paper containing a scurrilous libel on one of the respectable persons residing in the town. On the defendant promising to have nothing more to do with the paper, the prosecution was not pressed, but the magistrate remarked that it was disgraceful for any person to lend himself to the circulation of such a publication as the one in question.

At the petty sessions in Tralee last week James Sugrue, a respectable tradesman, was charged with having threatened and assaulted some of the men employed in the Industrial School conducted by the Christian Brothers. It was stated that a bottle feeling existed among some of the tenantry in Tralee against the school. Sugrue was bound to the peace, and Mr. Nolan, Q. C., in giving judgment, declared that the magistrates would look upon any attempt to interfere with so important and valuable an institution as the school as highly censurable.

KILKENNY.

The death is announced of Rev. Bernard Scott, Kilkenny, chaplain to the Kilkenny union workhouse. Father Scott was the last male descendant of an old Kilkenny family, many members of which were eminent in the legal and medical professions, and some of whom were largely embarked in mercantile pursuits. Father Scott was a ripe scholar and a man of great and diversified literary taste, and one of his most recent acts was to coll from his library an extensive and miscellaneous assortment of books of general literature which he presented to the Kilkenny Catholic Young Men's Society.

LEIXRIM.

A man named John Moran, who was a patient in the county infirmary, Carrick-on-Shannon, died on Sunday last, and, though apparently in absolute poverty, it was discovered by the steward that he had sewed up carefully in his waistcoat thirty-one sovereigns. The amount has been lodged in bank, awaiting claimants.

LIMERICK.

The Limerick Town Council has appointed a committee to select a site for public baths on the Shannon.

The united parishes of Feenagh and Kilmeedy have sent, through Rev. P. Lee, P. P., £20 to the Irish Parliamental Fund. When I tell you (says Father Lee, writing to Mr. George Delany) the parish is a small one, and that this sum has been freely and cheerfully subscribed, I need scarcely say how sensibly alive we are to the sacrifices Mr. Butt is making for Ireland, or how deeply we feel the necessity of sustaining him as leader of the Home Rule party in the House of Commons.

LOUTH

At the last meeting of the Drogheda Board of Guardians Rev. Mr. Archer, Protestant chaplain, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Crawford, Presbyterian clergyman, appeared before the Board to complain of a case of alleged proselytism, a woman named Mrs. Forrest was lately a member of the Protestant congregation, Mr. Crawford, in a lengthened statement, explained that he has been in attendance on this patient in the workhouse hospital, and was on the last occasion visited by some of the Catholic lady visitors surrounding the place were intimated to Protestant feelings and free worship. Protestant ladies who might take an interest in the welfare of their sick poor could not run the gauntlet necessary to visit them in the present condition of the workhouse. He (the speaker) felt much difficulty in addressing or reading to chance members of his congregation there, and warmly advocated a separate ward and Protestant nurse for Protestant inmates. A long and deeply conversation followed, but nothing was done in the matter.

On Sunday an interesting event took place in the handsome church of the Augustinian Order in Drogheda, in the unveiling of a new costly pulpit of carved oak. The pulpit was presented to the Fathers of the order by a thanksgiving offering to our Lady of Lourdes, by a friend, of Drogheda.

At the last meeting of the Dundalk Harbor Board the secretary laid on the table a beautifully engrossed testimonial on vellum, from the Lifeboat Institution, to Mr. Laurence Watters, master of the tug. The testimonial is framed in oak, with gilt moulding, and bears the signature of the Duke of Northumberland, Mr. Chapman, Esq., and R. S. Lewis, respectively the President, Chairman, and Secretary of the Institution, appended to the following resolution: "Resolved, that the thanks of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, and the silver medal, be presented to Mr. Laurence Watters, master of the steam-tug Michael Kelly, of Dundalk, in acknowledgment of his highly meritorious conduct in putting off in the steamer with a party of the officers of the brigantine William Nelson, of Pembroke, which was wrecked off the end of that port during a gale of wind on 25th November, 1875."

MAYO.

The Castlebar Town Commissioners at their last meeting had a letter consideration the petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land Bill. The matter was the subject of a brief discussion, in which only one member spoke against its adoption.

MEATH.

While Mr. Thomas Billington street, Trim, was in the act of dressing an ox for the last market of Trim, he was rather surprised to find in the intestines the following articles—namely, two bits of hoop-iron, two and a half inches by three-quarters; one inch and a half nail, half a link of a two-inch chain, several small tacks, bits of iron, a large piece of leather, a piece of rope, bits, and a brass ring. The beast was about 800 lbs. weight, and in the highest condition. It is considered that the articles must have been in the pockets of some one met with by the beast.

QUEEN'S COUNTY

The Wolfhill and Modubay Colliery Company, says the Daily Express have discovered and are utilising a bed of coal, which is stated to be of good quality for household purposes. They have also a steam engine on the road to Athy for facility of conveyance of the coal to the railway.

ROSCOMMON.

On Sunday, Farn Cottage, in Strokestown, the tasteful residence of Thos. Robarts, Esq., was almost completely destroyed by fire. The family were absent at divine service when the fire commenced, and before a messenger could be sent to give the alarm, so far that all efforts to check its course proved futile.

SLIGO.

Intelligence reached Sligo on Saturday, from Tubbercurry, of the sudden and unexpected death of Mark Bicknam, Esq., county inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary, stationed at Sligo. It appears the deceased gentleman left Sligo on Tuesday last on a tour of inspection of the constabulary stations in the county. He arrived at Tubbercurry on Friday, and stopped at the hotel there. On the following morning he was found dead in his bed.

TIPPERARY.

At the last Nenagh spring assizes a resolution was passed to the effect that no one member of the extra police force for the North Riding of Tipperary be specially taxed was at that moment on the strength of the force in the North Riding. The Grand Jury requested that the Chief Secretary would immediately bring before the Irish Government the necessity of doing away with the extra police for the North Riding. Sir M. H. Beach has written in reply to this, pointing out that, owing to unavoidable circumstances, the actual strength of the police force must often be above the nominal strength, and that all the Government can do is to prevent any county having a disproportionate number of vacancies.

WATERFORD.

The diocese of Waterford and Lismore has constituted £778 16s. 10d. to the Maynooth College Clerical Fund. If to this be added the individual contributions from clergy and laity already acknowledged, the total contribution of the diocese of Waterford falls little short of £1,000.

WEXFORD.

The Most Rev. Dr. Warren paid his first visit to Wexford on Thursday last. Upon arriving at the railway station, he proceeded direct to the college, where he received a most warm and enthusiastic reception. The President, professors and students united in presenting him a beautiful address. The front of the college building was tastefully decorated; a large flag floated from the tower, and almost every window had a banneret or something to bid welcome or wish many happy years to the truly consecrated Bishop. His Lordship also visited as many of the convents and schools as his short stay allowed him.

Mr. Alexander Stewart, manager of the Wicklow branch of the National Bank, has retired on full pay, as superannuated. The branch, which has now been in existence for upwards of thirty-three years, was opened under the sole management of Mr. Stewart.

The Negroes and the Church.

The Baltimore Catholic Mirror says: In the last issue of the Mirror mention was made of the wall of the Wesleyans over the progress made by the Catholic missionaries among the negro race in this country and facts were given to prove that under Catholic teaching the freedmen were rapidly becoming a law-abiding and intelligent people. That the able efforts of the Catholic missionaries are more acceptable to the negroes than the "gigantic work" of Our Freedmen's Aid Society," may be inferred from the following editorial, which appeared in the New York World of Monday last, under the heading of "The Catholic Church and the Negro:"

Mr. Edward W. Hyden, who is a full-blooded negro, a university graduate and the head of a prominent negro school in Liberia, contributes to an English magazine a remarkable article on "Christianity and the Negro Race," a compendious piece to his "Mohammedanism and the Negro Race," published last fall. In his introductory recital of facts connected with the history of American slavery, he recalls the slaveholding records of Penn, Whitefield and Edwards, the latter of whom defended slavery as a matter of Scriptural right of succession to the negro, and the teaching of the negro himself by Christian divines of all shades of opinion the duty of submission. He reasons that slavery has travestied and diluted, and his morality grew all away. Since the civil war and the abolition of slavery, social and moral progress has been made, though necessarily if it has been slow, mainly because the negro is taught not to be himself, but to imitate some one else—to copy the white man in all.

From this general indictment Mr. Hyden passes on to discuss a question which Americans will take a special interest—the relative claims of the Catholic and Protestant Churches to the respect and allegiance of the negro. The text in the article published in the Independent by Bishop Brown, M. Brown of the African M. E. Church, warning the colored people against the aggressions upon their ranks of the Roman Catholics, and the reply of George T. Downing controverting the Bishop's position, Mr. Hyden's comments are marked by frankness, acuteness and ampleness of information. He does not believe that the thoughtful and cultivated Protestant negro can read history without being impelled irresistably to acknowledge the deep debt of gratitude his race owes to the Catholic Church. The only Christian negroes that freed themselves and maintained their position of freemen—the Haytians—were Catholics, and "the greatest negro the Christian world has yet produced"—Toussaint L'Ouverture"—was also a Catholic. Rome has canonized many negroes, male and female, but Protestantism has no colored saint.

A negro in the sixteenth century rose to be professor of Latin and Greek in the schools attached to the celibacy of Grenada, and married a lady of rank, and erected a monument to his memory in the cathedral; in the same century another was a negro bean tolerated Benjamin Backcher, says Mr. Hyden, is the most distinguished negro produced by a Protestant country, and the only literary recognition he ever received was an appreciative letter from Jefferson. A recent book by the historians of Brazil extol the name of Henry Dias, the negro general. Moreno, the Portuguese historian, rates the negroes, as soldiers, as preferable to the Swiss. The books cited with the Pretender to the throne of Guadeloupe and Martinique. When, on the other hand, he has been seen acting as general in a Protestant army, or have Protestant negro soldiers proved as efficient? In 1872 Martinique sent as her delegate to the French National Assembly a negro, M. Fitz Papy. If the British colonies were represented in the House of Commons, would the people of Jamaica or Barbadoes do as much? When in the Legislative Convention held in this city in 1874 it was decided to consecrate a negro Bishop of Hayti, the English Bishop of Jamaica, the Bishop of Jamaica, dissented, alleging that after two hundred years of residence in Christian colonies and forty years of freedom, the island has not yet produced a priest of purely African race, that "no negro of pure blood would command that respect in Jamaica which is due to the priest and pastor."

Under Protestant rule, Mr. Hyden concludes, the negro is kept in such a state of ignorance and irresponsibility that he is scarcely fail to be constantly dependant, and therefore, in an emergency, useless.

Another Tragedy on Shipboard.

The barque Caswell was brought into Queenstown on Saturday morning, May 13th, by the gunboat Goshawk, and from the log book we have obtained the following account of the tragic occurrence of which she has been the scene. The vessel sailed from Antigoth, in Bolivia, on the 1st of January, with a crew composed of three Greeks, two Italians, brothers, and four British seamen; two of whom were mere lads. She had besides three officers, all Englishmen—namely, William H. Best, captain; W. M. Wilson, first mate, and Alex. McLean, second mate; Peter McGregor, a Scotchman, carpenter, and Peter Griffin, a colored man who was steward. When the ship had been four days at sea the Greeks and Italians who were armed with revolvers and knives, conspired and murdered the captain, first and second officers and the steward. The English sailors were unarmed and do not seem to have interfered. The ringleader in the affair was one of the Greeks named Pano, a man of herculean frame, and desperate character, who enjoyed complete ascendency over the foreigners, and was greatly feared by all the members of the crew. The murderers were at first inclined to murder the carpenter, but as they wanted to take the ship to Buenos Ayres they spared him and his four companions to assist them in working the vessel. After the massacre the muti neers divided the property of the unfortunate officers and all the other valuables to be found in the ship among them, and installed themselves in the officers' berths. The vessel proceeded around Cape Horn, and as far as the mouth of the River Plate, where the Italians who had not been on the best terms with the Greeks, went off with their share of the plunder in the life-boat, having first warned the Englishmen that their lives were in danger. The Greeks, after this, made overtures to one of the British seamen, John Dunne, to assist them to get rid of the others, and this determined the Englishmen to strike for their lives. This took place on the 12th of March, finding Pano on the deck, Mefiregor, the carpenter, and Carrick, an able seaman, cut him down with an adze. His companions were in their berths, and before they had time to arm themselves Carrick and McGregor were upon them with axes. One of the Greeks was killed and his other desperately wounded. The Englishmen were once more masters of the blood-stained ship, and having thrown the bodies of Pano and Morelli, they navigated the vessel to the Irish coast, bringing the surviving Greek, Haumbo, with them, lashed to the deck. He has nearly got over the effects of his wounds. The Englishmen say that he took no active part in the mutiny and helped to kill the first and second mates. The tragedy far surpasses the massacre on board the Lunda in atrocity, and the narrative of the occurrence in the log-book, couched, as it is, in the rough language of simple seamen, is of thrilling interest. Intelligence was received at Queenstown last night that the Italians who left the ship in the life-boat have been captured in South America, and are being sent over to this country.—Cork Examiner.

A Wisconsin editor illustrates the prevailing extravagance of the people of the present day by calling attention to the costly baby carriages in use now, while, when he was a boy, they hauled him around by the hair of the head.

Ligouri (eldest daughter of the late Thomas Mahon, Esq., Dublin), and Miss Mary Anne Slattery, in religion Sister Mary Catherine (third daughter of M. Slattery, Esq., Tralee.)

Modern Women.

It is a sad commentary upon our boasted civilization that the women of our times have degenerated in health and physique until they are literally a race of semi-invalids, nervous, dyspeptic, and sickly, while only here and there a few noble examples in the profession of the medical, teach them how to regain the use of health by a perfect and speedy cure. By a very large proportion the treatment of many thousands of cases of this character peculiar to women, Dr. Pierce, of World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y., has perfected, by the combination of certain vegetable extracts, a special specific, which he does not scruple to term scientific, and which admirably fulfils a physiological purpose, being a most positive and reliable remedy for the weaknesses and derangements peculiar to the women of the present day. This lauded remedy is designated Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. The success which has attended the administration of this wonderful medicine has worked cures as if by magic, and with a certainty that has been followed by no medicines. Weak back, nervous and chronic uterine diseases incident to women, are prompted to speedy cure, in which as well as in the treatment of all those complaints which are the result of functional derangement of the delicate organism of the female system, and by which so much beautiful lady may be robbed of her birthright—the possessing of a family physician. Favorite Prescription is sold by druggist in medicines generally.

The Evil Fruits of Weak Digestion.

There is no pathological fact more clearly constructed than that the most formidable phases of nervous disease arise from imperfect digestion and nutrition. Insomnia, with its train of direful consequences, proceeds more frequently from wasted condition of the stomach than from any other cause. Mere sedatives are powerless to cure nervousness, and can cause no permanent benefit to the patient. The true way to strengthen and invigorate the nervous system is to strengthen the digestive organs, upon whose condition the nervous system is so intimately dependent. The daily use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will do more to brace and soothe the wasted and perverted nerves, and induce sound, refreshing sleep—nature's grand restorative—than all the so-called nervines to be found in the pharmacopœia or out of it. A wine-glassful of the Bitters should be taken before each meal.

The State election in Oregon, on Monday, resulted in a Democratic victory. The Democrats have 15 majority on joint ballot in the Legislature.

One of Blaine's Affairs.

To the Editor of the Sun.—Sir: I enclose to you copies of a letter and receipt, the originals of which were signed by the Hon. James G. Blaine, which he will not deny.

In consequence of Mr. Blaine's letter I invested $5,000, which formed a portion of the amount receipted for by Mr. Blaine. For some reason Mr. Blaine was unable to deliver the scrip and bonds according to his contracts, and, after more than a year, and with some difficulty, I succeeded in recovering my proportion of the contribution.

I do not wish, however, to find fault with Mr. Blaine for the failure of the Northern Pacific scheme. It was well arranged, and if Jay Cooke had been able to sell the bonds at 90, those who controlled the franchise would have got the forevermost lands free from incumbrance, which, as Mr. Blaine expressed it, would have been a "splendid thing" to do; and I have no doubt of the sincerity of Mr. Blaine's assurance that "at the worst" it would have been "far more valuable than the Union Pacific" and we all know how "that would leave it."

As it has resulted, however, the Credit Mobilier operation was the better one, and Mr. Blaine's sagacity was at fault in not foreseeing the net loss of Jay Cooke.

Mr. Blaine, in his recent very satisfactory vindication of himself in Congress from charges which, it seems, falsely connected him with Mr. Caldwell, uttered the following moral reflection: "Whatever concealment is desirable, avoidance is advisable; and I do not know any better test of conduct than the question, Will it bear business transaction." When I read this sentence it occurred to me that I had been considering my share of this transaction already too long, and I felt an almost irresistible impulse to obey the wise precepts of this teacher of ethics. Hence the letter.

"Keep my name quiet, mentioning it to no one, unless to Mr. Caldwell," who seems a small fry of duke sort to that ingenious financier, Col. Scott.

Very truly yours,

AQUILA ADAMS.

BOSTON, May 30, 1876.

MR. BLAIN OFFERING TO SELL A NORTHERN PACIFIC INTEREST.

ACCOUNT, MAINE, November 25, 1873.

My Dear Mr. Fisher: A year ago and more I spoke to you about purchasing an interest in the Northern Pacific Railroad for yourself and any you might choose to associate with yourself. The matter passed by without my being able to control it, and nothing more was said about it. Since then the Jay Cooke contract has been perfected, the additional legislation has been obtained, and the whole line will be pushed forward rapidly. By a strange revolution of circumstances I am again able to control an interest, and if you desire it you can have it. The whole road is divided into twenty-four shares, of which Jay Cooke & Co. have seven. The cost of the road is ¾ of 1-24, or 1 192 of the entire franchises, being that portion of the 50,000,000 acres of land which are being divided as the road is built, and a like proportion of the Land Company stock. Not having used to take and dispose of the 53,000,000 acres of land covered by their grant as amended by the law of last session. The amount of stock—which this 1 192 would have in the road would be about $1,000,000, and the number of acres of land it represents is nearly 275,000.

The road is being built on the 7.30 bonds, $25,000 to the mile, which Jay Cooke takes at 90.

Instead of mortgaging the land, they make a stock company for its ownership, dividing it pro-rata among the holders of the franchise.

The whole thing can be had for $25,000, which is less than one third of what some other sales of small interests have gone at. I do not suppose you would care to invest the whole $25,000. I thought for a small flyer eight or ten of you in Boston might take $2,500 each; for $2,500 thus invested you would get ultimately $42,000 stocks and the avails of some 27,000 acres of land.

Five of you at $5,000 each would have a splendid thing of it.

The chance is a very rare one. I can't touch it; but I obey my first and last impulse in offering it to you.

All such chances as this since Jay Cooke got the road have been accompanied with the obligation to take large amount of the bonds at 90, and hold them not less than three years.

I will be in Boston Tuesday noon, and will call upon you. Of course, if you don't want it, let it pass. You can write me as the Lincoln lease of stock to a considerable amount, and certificates of land stock also. Of course, in contracting for the land, you pay one sum only, mentioning it to no one unless to Mr. Caldwell, who is under the impression that you have returned, but I have said nothing.

Yours truly,

J. G. BLAINE.

(Signed)

This stock will be far more valuable, of the worst, than the Union Pacific, and see where that would leave it.

THE MONEY PAID—BLAINE GETS $25,000.

[Confidential.]

BOSTON, Dec. 1, 1870.

Received of Warren Fisher, Jr., twenty-five thousand dollars in trust, to consideration of which is to deliver to me or my order properly authenticated certificates of an interest in the North Pacific Railway Company equivalent to seventy-five (75) per cent. of the twenty-four (24) principal shares in which the franchise stock of said company is divided.

Certificates to be in the name of Elisha Atkins.

HOW BLAINE WAS INDUCED TO REIMBURSE MR. ADAMS.

[Private.]

OFFICE OF ADAMS' EXPRESS BROKERS, } 31 STATE STREET, BOSTON, Nov. 9, 1871. }

My Dear Mr. Agassiz: Not having seen or heard from you recently, and having many anxious that you should recover your money back from Mr. Blaine, I inclose you a form of letter which I wish you to send to him at once.

If he goes to Washington there will be considerable delay in getting at him, and I think you may have longer delay in having the matter settled. This latter which I inclose has been submitted to Mr. Atkins, who has been appointed to Mr. Atkins, who

A DREAM OF THE FUTURE.

I dream'd a dream, a dazzling dream, of a green isle far away;
The glowing west to the ocean's breast calleth the dying day,
And that island green was as fair a scene as ever man's eye did see,
With its shrubbery bold and its campina old, and its lawns and its vistas free!
No foreign foe did that green isle know—no stranger band it bore,
Save the wanderer toss'd from sunny Spain and from Erin's distant shore;
And the joyous band's heart would fondly start, red the sun-mist's rays would smile.
As their thoughts would roam o'er the ocean's foam to that lone and "santy isle."

Years passed by, and the artless sky blessed with a new-born light,
And Erin born's star shone bright afar o'er the lost world's darkness night!
And the diamond shrines from plundered mines, and the golden flame of Love,
Melted away to the haze of day at the simple speed of a prayer.
The light stories o'er the island green played with its merry bands,
And the lives of Saxi weaved dim and pale ate the stain of the morning streams!
And "twas joy or hour, in the bright air clear, from out each sunny glade,
The sabbing bell, from the quiet cell, or the cloister's tranquil shade.

A cloud of night o'er that dream so bright soon with its black wing came,
And the happy scene of that island green was lost to the light of shame;
For the fiend of hell, betrayed her trust, and let in the spoiler, Doubt, fair, wan fair—
And a rancor hid from a world's ken dwelt with their warbeaps filled the isle.
A fatal spell on that green isle fell—a shadow of doubt and gloom
Fell, withering fell, from shore to shore, like the breath of the simoom;
And each green hillside was crimson dyed, and each stream ruined red and wan
With the shrieking blood of the brave and good—of mother and maid and child!

Dark was my dream, though many a gleam of hope
Did flash through it, like lightning in a shielding storm, or the sunrise thro' a midnight sea;
And many a time, with its wings undone and with its soften light,
Would the morning rise on ransom slain, but to rise on again in night—
For to sicken prey of the people there still raised their tortured haves,
When the sense of right and the power to smite are the spirit that commands.
For those who would sneer at the monster's tear, and heed not the suppliant's sigh,
Will be wont to say that first power's law—a hooded saint's cry.

At length, came a war that bids of woes a dawn with a sheeter smile,
And in battle's roar a voice of power awoke the slumbering isle!
And the people all obeyed the call of their chief's accepter's need,
Vowing to die or to shelter by his side, the name of their own dear land.
My dream grew bright as the sunbeam's light as I watched the isle's career
Through the various scenes and the joys serene of many a future's year—
And the day I hail'd did my bosom fill as I gazed on a planet's place
Where a nation rose more in power watched o'er the rights of that lone Green Isle!

BY MRS. M. M. WARDE.

The next day poor Denny was brought before the Mayor. Grandpa was there, and Eugene and his mother, and little Bridget had her mother, overpowered with shame and sorrow.

"Did she think Denny was guilty!" ask my readers. Well, you know appearances were against him, and, indeed, she did not know what to think. The hardest thing of all was she had to tell the truth, and that would cost a scarlet blush. You may imagine how a mother would feel in such a case. Indeed, to go there, as she did that day, determined to tell the truth, because it was the truth, in spite of the shame that it knew it would injure his case, required the very highest type of heroism. So this heroism upheld her; sorrow and shame were in her heart, but this was there, too, to strengthen it.

It was easily proved that the robbery had taken place; that the other boys had been engaged in it, and that some of the stolen things had been found in the possession of all but Denny. But, so far, nothing had been proved against him. He was arrested only on the word of the others, who had been accused of being a partner in their guilt. He did call it guilty now, and therefore became the object of those accused in dragging him.

His mother was called.

"What does your boy do to earn a living?" was the first question asked her.

"He sells papers, sir, and does other odd jobs betimes, or holdin' horses or the like."

"Where was he on the day of the robbery? Was he the one we gave him.

"A Wednesday, sir. Shure he was out as usual."

"About four o'clock, was he at home?"

"No, sir."

"Is it usual for him to be home at that hour?"

"No, sir; he's on the evenin' route thin."

"Now, did you know of him to have more money than usual on Thursday?"

She faltered, grew pale; poor mother.

The question was repeated. She looked up steadily into the face of the questioner.

"Yis, sir," she said slowly; "good wages!"

There was silence a moment then.

"How did you know it?"

"He—he brought ours, sir, to remind me. Did witnesshes!" and she wrung her hands as the cry escaped from her heroic, bleeding heart: "To make me say it, but he wouldn't have me say it, for only was it remimber his cruel mother of Ireland!"

There was then a silence, which was a tribute to the mother's woe. After it, the more question:

"Did he confess to you in any way for possessing so much money to buy those sels?"

"Oh! oh!" and she wrung her hands again. "He didn't—he refused."

"You may go down."

And the heroine sat down, and in sight of God's angels, my dear readers, her humble, wounded heart was that of a glorious martyr, enduring worse than death for the truth.

Several boys on the "evening route" were then called, and they testified that he had been absent from his usual round on that memorable day, and that it was known last he was "up to some game," and left his business of selling papers to attend to it.

So the two things were beginning to look pretty dark for Denny, when grandpa was called. Grandpa was well-known and distinguished for his talent among the lawyers, and for the high moral tone of his character in the city. So how he stood up to testify and why he would do something towards exonerating the boy.

Also it would be only profound the beautiful ring, told the story of how it had been found, and it was immediately identified as the stolen one by the owner.

When he had given his testimony, said he:

"Gentlemen, it is an unusual thing, but I move this boy be allowed to speak in his own defense. I am quite willing to appear as his defender, but I have invited some of my colleagues to listen to the pleas which I know he can make, hoping it will produce an impression regarding boys of his stamp, upon which it would be well for those in charge of the city's interest to act. After he has spoken I will bring proof of all he says. Come forward, Dennis, and speak exactly as you spoke to me last evening in the lock-up."

Dennis stood up; every eye was fixed upon him. He was so overpowered for a moment that he could not speak at all. He raised his eyes to where his mother sat, but he could not see her face. She had covered it up in her hands, afraid to look at him. But those poor, frightened eyes fell upon little Bridget and Eugene, clung side by side, holding hands. Her face was pale, her lips apart, her eyes eagerly seeking his—those eyes inset, and her look went through his soul. Quickly her sunburnt hand was lifted to her forehead, and she made the sign of the cross. He saw—he forgot his fear, and began in a clear and steady voice:

"I never stole anything in my life, and I know them that never did, and was sent out of this very room to the House of Refuge! So, there's a little fellow among us, he used to be better than most of us, he was tuk up for stealin' an' sent there, an' we all knowed he never done it as well as could be. People don't usually git out o' there, but he got out somehow, an' come to us, an' we all agreed to keep him hid an' attended to him. So we did, an' when the fuss o' hunting him was over, we let him out, an' nobody minded him, an' he just went on with us as usual.

"Now," and the rods words took a sweet, low tone, from the softened tone of the boy's voice, "the reason I liked the little fellow, Jerry, was the kind blood of the brave and good—of mother and maid and child!

"Well, one day, thought many a gleam of hope in the future, I had books,

Like a thankful heart from a watching storm, or the sunrise thro' a midnight sea;

And many a time, with its wings undone and with its soften light,

Would the morning rise on ransom slain, but to rise on again in night—

For to sicken prey of the people there still raised their tortured haves,

When the sense of right and the power to smite are the spirit that commands.

There was then a silence, which was a tribute to the mother's woe. After it, the more question:

"Did he confess to you in any way for possessing so much money to buy those sels?"

"Oh! oh!" and she wrung her hands again. "He didn't—he refused."

"You may go down."

And the heroine sat down, and in sight of God's angels, my dear readers, her humble, wounded heart was that of a glorious martyr, enduring worse than death for the truth.

Several boys on the "evening route" were then called, and they testified that he had been absent from his usual round on that memorable day, and that it was known last he was "up to some game," and left his business of selling papers to attend to it.

So the two things were beginning to look pretty dark for Denny, when grandpa was called. Grandpa was well-known and distinguished for his talent among the lawyers, and for the high moral tone of his character in the city. So how he stood up to testify and why he would do something towards exonerating the boy.

Also it would be only profound the beautiful ring, told the story of how it had been found, and it was immediately identified as the stolen one by the owner.

When he had given his testimony, said he:

"Gentlemen, it is an unusual thing, but I move this boy be allowed to speak in his own defense. I am quite willing to appear as his defender, but I have invited some of my colleagues to listen to the pleas which I know he can make, hoping it will produce an impression regarding boys of his

Death of Ben Hall, the Australian Bandit.

The Queenslander of a recent date contains the following interesting sketch: Towards the latter part of 1864 the gang created by the armourer Gardiner, and of which, after the disappearance of that worthy, Ben Hall, became the acknowledged chief, had, by death capture and desertion, been reduced to three—Hall, Gilbert and Dunn. Burke had been shot dead by Commissioner Keighly's pistol at Rockley; the bloody-minded ruffian O'Malley and man his fate at the hands of Mr. Campbell at Golmbia; Vane, after certain bush negotiations with a priest (Rev. Father McCarthy), had surrendered to the authorities; and others not known to fame had disappeared from the scene from one cause and another. The halo of romance which had once surrounded the band had passed away to a great extent; the gold fields of the Lachlan and Lambing Flat were no longer so "disgustingly rich" that the possession of the rods by the bush-ranging fraternity was regarded as a good joke, and daily cases of stick-ing up so agreeable a excitement. People had enough of it, and felt a sort of shame at the existence, for so long a period, of a state of things that had brought disgrace on the district and discredit on the colony. The gang had attempted nothing commensurate with their great reputation since the unsuccessful attack on the Araluen gold escort at Major's Creek. There was a reward of £1,000 each on their heads; and knowing that at least one of their most trusty henchmen—and "intagraphs" had been already guilty of treachery, they could not but feel that any moment the cupidity of others in the interests of the law might be excited to their betrayal. In this there was no risk to the informer, who had only to supply such information as would lead to one or more of the band—dead or alive—and the Government would do the rest. The name of the informer would not appear, nor would he be called upon to give evidence against them, if taken alive, or to appear to the business in any other way.

The reserve fund of these three desperate men must have run low indeed, or some more powerful influence was at work when they drew up into a camp about 11 o'clock in front of a certain large store in Bathurst street, Forbes, for the purpose of robbery; inasmuch as the owner of the store had been no enemy of theirs during his colonial career, and he should have been thus selected was something more than a "nine days' wonder" in the town when the news became known.

However, landing over their riding horses and sundry pack horses in the custody of Dunn, who was to keep guard outside (the store being closed), Hall and Gilbert quietly stalked in by the side door, armed with their revolvers. The owner was not at home, but the lady of the house and the storemen were behind the counter making up the day's cash takings. It may have been their thoughts were upon the future of the bushrangers boded no ill—they know them, and probably that was not the first time they had been there and been lonely departed, but when the cash box was taken possession of, and the lady and men calmly pocketed by one, while the other proceeded to pack up crimson shirts, leather dresses, and other drapery, and to rifle the store generally of a good deal of its most valuable stock, and confined was the operations. Resistance was never for a moment thought of; but the mistress said, in a depressing way, "Well, I feel's though you'd serve us like this." They did their work in the most deliberate manner, having been carefully adjusted on the pack saddles, took their departure without hurrying in the slightest degree. So quiet was there was the old stereotyped story in the papers of the police having been baffled in pursuit with the usual stereotyped result.

This was the last affair in which the gang were engaged. The trio parted company, and Dunn going in one direction, and Hall in another.

The treachery they dreaded began to do its work almost immediately after this operation. Hall was late one evening, being at been shot near the Binalong, within thirty miles of the scene of his last exploit; Gilbert followed suit on the head of a couple of rifle balls through the chest at Binalong, Dunn escaping with a revolver ball in his foot at the same time as the latter, after a short further period of exciting adventure, meeting his death on the scaffold.

The writer was in Forbes when the body of Ben Hall, pierced by seven bullets, was laid and thrown across the back of a horse in a sack, which only partially concealed the ghastly corpse, was brought into the town by the police.

It was no act of gallantry on the part of the latter that the career of the man, who had so long been a terror to the force, was at last brought to a close.

The chance of earning £500—the other £500 being for the capture of Gilbert—was one not to be met with every day occurrence, and so thought one of Hall's old acquaintances, known as the bushranger of the night on the Billabong, which he had frequently done before, and arranged about a meeting for the night in question, when the friend was to bring the outlaw's supper, and they were to discuss the situation together.

But long before the hour when this meeting was to take place, the bushranger's confidant was etcessed with the police magistrate at Forbes; and the scene evoking a display of detachment of troopers—both black and white—under the direction of sub-inspector Davidson, left the town on special duty. The information with which they had been furnished was so minute that they knew the precise position of the very tree under the branches of which Hall would take his supper at the house of his friend and then camp for the night. On reaching the paddock, therefore, the officer had only to divide his men in two parties and watch until daybreak, knowing that unless by a miracle the outlaw's days were numbered.

It appears from the evidence taken at the inquiry that, very early on the following morning, Hall rose from his bed of gum leaves, shook himself, and taking up his bridle was about to start for the stockyard, of where his horse was grazing, when Davidson called out to him to "surrender." Whether, like the Irishman's, the sub-inspector's exclamation was "surrender thro tunnel" and then shooting before a response before entering the drawing-room, where the whole police group had assembled to witness the ceremony.

Mr. Russell and the officiating clergyman had entered the room in the meantime in an orderly manner. It is clear, however, that the bushranger never attempted to use his revolvers, of which he had two in his belt. The bell rope was one of the fine rich drawn ones were stations in all—cut his leather belt in two, and passed right through his body. The revolvers fell to the ground, and while the bushranger hung on to a sapling with his death-grip, the firing was kept up until the body was riddled with no less than thirty-two holes, after which, being considered no longer dangerous, it was taken possession of by its gallant captors.

The blood in many was duly paid, and although of course the name of the informer was not officially revealed, there was but one person credited with the baseness and the terror of this man, when in his cups, Leal Gilbert and Dunn, who were still at large, should visit him with their vengeance, was extreme. He had purchased a farm on the banks of the Lachlan river, two miles from Forbes, and the house which he erected to be around on it for a residence was as strong as a guard-house. The writer of this sketch of an incident connected with the remarkable period of the history of the present colony of New South Wales, visited the farm on one occasion at the request of the owner, and was surprised at the character of the preparations made for defense in case of attack. "Oh, Ben!," said he, "does sent work that he'll murder me about that affair of Ben Hall; but I'm prepared for him at any rate." Revolvers, rifles and bowie knives were everywhere at hand to meet any possible emergency—under his pillow, arranged over his bed, and within reach of his hand, and in every corner of the room.

But Gilbert never carried out his threat, his own death occurring soon after, and Dunn was never seen in the Lachlan district after the sticking-up of the store in Forbes.

[The "Gardiner" mentioned in the first illnes of the foregoing is the man whom the San Francisco Post made an endeavor to glorify and convert into a hero (selling his name with their great reputation to the unsuccessful attack on the Araluen gold escort at Major's Creek. There was a reward of £1,000 each on their heads; and knowing that at least one of their most trusty henchmen—and "intagraphs" had been already guilty of treachery, they could not but feel that any moment the cupidity of others in the interests of the law might be excited to their betrayal. A Rhode Island Romance.

In connection with Newport and piracy the following incident, full of exciting and touching story, which, as the author says, seems more like fiction than fact. We give the domestic tale—which would make a much more charming and attractive theme for a romance—entitled "Rachel Wilson and Arden"—in the words of the historian:

Samuel Cranston, a gentleman of noble descent, and one of the highly distinguished men of the time, a merchant in Newport, on the breaking out of the French war of 1755, found his business completely paralyzed, and being of an active temperament of mind, was induced to start on a voyage for Jamaica, in a beautiful sloop, called the Rachel, with a cargo of staves or seventeen, and two negroes, his sole property. When off the Keys of Florida, they were attacked by a piratical vessel; they defended themselves to the utmost, satisfied that, should they fall into their hands, no mercy would be shown them; but all their efforts proved of no avail, and they were compelled to surrender to the enemy. Such was the cruelty and ferocity of these pirates, that neither prayer nor expostulations had the least effect on their hard and obdurate hearts, but the captain and crew were all inhumanly butchered on the spot, with the exception of Mr. Cranston, who was spared in order to labor on board the vessel as a common servant.

To a mind like his it must have been deeply humiliating to be suddenly thrown from an affluent position to servitude, and compelled to herd with brutes in human form. In this condition he was doomed to labor for many years. The thoughts of home would rush on the mind, producing having been carefully adjusted on the pack saddles, took their departure without hurrying in the slightest degree. So quiet was there was the old stereotyped story in the papers of the police having been baffled in pursuit with the usual stereotyped result.

This was the last affair in which the gang were engaged. The trio parted company, and Dunn going in one direction, and Hall in another.

Marriage Quandie Se Bene Gesserint.

The Judge of the Divorce Court, in London—overworked, and entirely unable, from lesson of the number of cases of matrimonial discussion on the cause list of his tribunal—has at length given voice, and addressed a cry to "society" in England. He delivers his soul at long last on the habits, manners, fashions and amusements that seems to be so fearfully relaxing the bonds of domestic life, and that are choking his Court with a filthy accumulation of conjugal infidelity. But it is the voice of one crying in the wilderness. It is the effort of one standing on a river bank, begging the waters to cease running past in such wild volume; their sound being far beyond his reach or hearing. Sir James Hannen appeals in vain "Society"—not bob nailed-shod and bargon-clad, low classed society, but patent-leathered-booted and breadcloth-and-silk-appareled and diamond-decked society—laughs back in his face, flouts him to his beard. He is, it says, an old fool—a "grandmotherly" old moralist, who wants to arrest "Progress" by a syllabus of his own. The journals of fashionable circles, the organs of the upper ten thousand and of the middle ten millions, turn to comparatively moderate example.

Vanity Fair is a weekly newspaper published in London, which prides itself upon its semi-caricatures of public men. But its letter-press is after the "upper" and fashionable style of literature which gentlemen loungers at the clubs, and lady loungers in the drawing-rooms, read and digest at their leisure, for their "edification" and "refinement." Speak the truth and shame the devil," is the motto of "Vanity," when suggests that "A should feign asleep;" it is the "high moral" tone of "The Saloon" that "Society" is the "Court of Appeal" to which the Public condemned. After the opening words of the "Introductory" Ad purposum est summarium or the salutation, "Health and prosperity, Ladies and Gents," and in Domino salutem et apostolicam benedictionem, "Vanity" proceeds to tell us that the Pope "has thus ratified Count Antelli Rolls are signed by a Cardinal, and the others merely by the Secretary, who is supposed to prepare them. The publication is entrusted to the Agency of the Count himself." It is quoted by the words with which they begin. Thus the one promulgating the decree, and the one publishing it, are both of the Blessed Virgin Mary, is known as the Bull Ineffabilis Deus; and that convoking the Vatican Council, as the Æterni Patris.

Australian "Loyalty."

This is how they speak in Australia of the attempts made to establish closer relations with the Australian colonies by the Queen:

"If he likes her well enough, take her, sir."—"Pernapanth".

"Well, he's a fool like Joseph."—"Vulcan".

Australia really must draw the line somewhere," we decist at this point; merely adding that the "Second Incident" proposed by the writer of the letter was too disgusting as to what Australia should do, Lord Beaconsfield having declared that the Queen was to be invited to pay a visit to the colonies, there's a divorce suit, and marries Lady B. he will shoot A."

Such is the tone of English "society," it is high time for some one to speak out, though we are not sure that Sir James Hannen is the right man. The office he fills, the law he administers, have placed him under the ban of the fashionable world not see the matter from any other than a colonial standpoint, and so he has failed, and deservedly failed, to be revived in some other form when opportunity offers. Even if he were not confined to the narrow limits of the British Empire but a subject to absorb the colonies in the vortex of England's social life, troubles and difficulties, and the vast herself of our revenues and population to fight the battles of the British Empire it would be such a flourishing condition as to render indissoluble union desirable. On the contrary, the looser the political ties that bind us to England the better for these colonies, the more easy will it be to sever the connection should it be found expedient and either party desire it. If the consideration between us and the mother country of protection probable contingencies, large drafts might be made on our population to fight England's battles, or those of the Malayan peninsula, and I am decidedly of opinion that the balance of profit lies with the colonies. Our money employed here rather then being converted into "food for powder" in any of those salubrious countries.

Our Case.—A new Catholic paper has been commenced in the Island of Ceylon—half printed in Tamil and half in English. Right Rev. Bishop Bonjean, the Vicar Apostolic, has an excellent address in the first number on the duties and trials of a Catholic journalist. The following extract will apply with especial force to the hostility of the "Protestant editor," says Bishop Bonjean, "he is fight on the whole line; now with an assault, then with a sneer; now with an insult, then with a calumny. There were also breakfasts, dinners, and suppers, with speeches and toasts, and the people flood with God to save before it be too late.

Flood that our Father rules up God-fearing men in his place.

Who to their ways unacknowledge Him, and have no God, have no country.

When these salried prayers shall rise as from a single voice,

Our God will hear us in our need, will help us in our struggle.

Shepherds Find, Through a Shaft, an Ancient Palace in Pannonia, a Province Deserted by Romans Fifteen Hundred Years Ago.

Recent proceedings in the Hungarian Parliament disclosed a most remarkable discovery, one which, if not absolutely authenticated, would be almost impossible to believe. The story, as condensed from the official reports, is that two peasants, or rather shepherds, from the village of Tetenyi, in the district of Veszprim, in Veszprim and not far from Lake Balaton, came to Pesth, and to a jeweler offered for sale some broken fragments of what evidently was a very old golden ornament for female wear, consisting of bracelets and head large interstes. When South Adams, the leading mind of the corporation, was acquainted with the circumstance of the find upon Mr. Fisher, who took Mr. Mulligan into his confidence, and they decided to take care of the immense establishment, more particularly its finances, to his charge. He found the treasury in a very pitiful condition, and followed Mr. Fisher as his confidant. Mr. Mulligan retired from his position, and subtleness with him through all his cultured transactions, losing, with his integrity, considerable flesh, and gaining a little Josiah Caldwall. After the fire which consumed the Globe Theater, Arthur Cleveland Coxe, Bishop of Western New York, had occasion to visit Europe, and from his knowledge of men and things in this world left his entire business and bank accounts in his hands, and that his confidence was justified was proved, as he returned from his Mulligan's retention as Treasurer of the city was never questioned. The position of Mulligan's family is one of the most regular description. He has occupied one room in a single house for more than three years, and he is either at his place of business or at his domicile. He has no vices as he says in slang, "except the one of smoking." Every man of past or present moment can be decried to instantly for the worst. Mr. Mulligan's antecedents are such we have the testimony of those who know him that he is as good as his bond.

THEN AND NOW.

There was when men in Washington were honest and were true,
And the soul labored daily for the good that they could do;
They served their country's welfare, self on the altar laid,
And in her struggles, struggled too, and toiled and hoped and prayed.

And when they met in council no breast, a whisper'd word would stain the country's honor if by chance it were heard;
No stain of the Cabinet there soil blemish'd for good
Defending needy soldiers for the wealth in which he rolled.

No member of the Cabinet could then have robbed the poor,
And cringe! a bandit fellowship within the White House door;
For stern and staunch integrity was guardian of the place,
And no one dared to enter there who fashed an honest face.

No leader of a Whisky Ring could here found position,
For corn were here a premium in the Presidential chair;
The hero of the White House in those old fashioned times
Never let a guilty man escape—all suffered for their crimes.

But that was many years ago, so distant does it seem,
Now in the White House honest men are like a rare, blue diamond,
Self-seeking politicians, with greedy thirst for gain,
Have filled with many a pest of trust their purpose to attain.

And shielded by their station, these men who basely rob and Keep harness for their pockets while they rob and
They scorn the country's statutes, they are safe be-
And the law that's written on man's hearts they've only here.

They have no God to guide them, love not their no
They are so beauty in the right, so dignity in self;
Imbrued by their own baseness, what think you that they care
For the murmurs of the people who were led to place them there?

Oh! who will save our country? Oh! where shall help be found?
Have all the noble and good been laid beneath the cold, damp ground?
Is there no honest statesman to lead the people on
We are rushing fast to ruin now, more hopeless than the grave.

Oh! ye who love your nation land, and fain would
A heritage of glory for the children of the free,
Arise! arise! arise! and strike for truth, for God, and
And up be work at Washington and sweep that city

For years the work unfinished, but perpetual
Corruption there could flood and
From North to South, from East to West, then speed
You on your way!
And all hidden foulness in the enthroned light
Of day.

When this is done, if you can find a man to rule
Let him be honest, true and
And all hidden foulness in the enthroned light
Of day.

Then let a wash of fasting be held in every State;
And the people plead with God to save before it be Flood that our Father rules up God-fearing men in place.

Who to their ways unacknowledge Him, and have no God, have no country.

When these salried prayers shall rise as from a single
Our God will hear us in our need, will help us in our
And we'll prove to foreign nations who have won us through,

Mr. Mulligan retired from his position, and subtleness with him through all his cultured transactions, losing, with his integrity, considerable flesh, and gaining a little Josiah Caldwall. After the fire which consumed the Globe Theater, Arthur Cleveland Coxe, Bishop of Western New York, had occasion to visit Europe, and from his knowledge of men and things in this world left his entire business and bank accounts in his hands, and that his confidence was justified was proved, as he returned from his Mulligan's retention as Treasurer of the city was never questioned. The position of Mulligan's family is one of the most regular description. He has occupied one room in a single house for more than three years, and he is either at his place of business or at his domicile. He has no vices as he says in slang, "except the one of smoking." Every man of past or present moment can be decried to instantly for the worst. Mr. Mulligan's antecedents are such we have the testimony of those who know him that he is as good as his bond.

The Investigation in which He is Said to Have Been Engaged.

[From the Boston Transcript; Rep.; June 3d.]

James Mulligan is in Washington by no seeking of his own. His deposition is and has been always to be found on file in the tired list, so far as politics are concerned.

ANOTHER APPEAL.

Quite a large number—indeed, a majority—of our interior subscribers are in arrears for two years, some even longer. The amount each one owes is trifling, but aggregates a sum running up into the thousands. We want this money; it is honestly ours. The person who contracts a debt with a newspaper is as much bound to pay it as though he contracted it with a shoddier or grocer. The newspaper debtor, however, are singularly so small that it hardly pays to send an agent out collecting, costing, as it does, from twenty-five to fifty per cent., and in many instances going miles out of his way to collect a five dollars, only to be told when he reaches there, "you can't have it; I shouldn't have let him run so long, but it was so small. I haven't a cent in the house to-day; however, but will send it to you next week." Of course the collector has to hide his chagrin and say nothing, but "next week" never comes, and the money comes, and he has to take the same round next year, with probably the same result. This should not be. It is far easier and less expensive for the subscriber to forward his subscription by return than for the publisher to send out collectors. There are not a dozen subscribers on our books who would be inconvenienced by the payment of their subscription, while their non-payment cripples us. The dues of a single subscriber on a year will not pay how your account stands; then remit immediately the debt to this office, at our expense. If you desire.

IRISH AFFAIRS.

The national sentiment in Ireland, like the spirit of liberty, is immortal. Repressed by the most barbarous tyranny, subjected to a thousand persecutions, it still survives and is still active. One thing ought to be plain to all readers of current history by this time, and that is that England's rule will never be cordially accepted by the Irish people, in any manner whatever. Confirmation may be given to it. There will always be a discontented party, always a certain proportion of the population ambitious for political independence, and ready to depend on foreign aid to accomplish it by force of arms. Still, it must be acknowledged, whether with regret or otherwise it is not necessary to declare, there will be a strong party willing to accept the supremacy of England, especially measure of purely Irish interest be left to the discretion of an Irish Parliament or a domestic legislature of any name kind. And at present and for the latter party appear to be the more numerous, the more powerful and the more active. The most ardent revolutionist must confess that the Home Rule movement has the sedative effect of the ablest and most faithful representative of the Irish people, and is cordially supported by the masses. He may regret that this is so, and possibly would prefer to see the whole energy of the people directed to the development of an insurrection; nevertheless, the fact remains inconvertible. Every true Irishman, whether at home in the old land or wearing out his days in a foreign country, must deplore the unhappy circumstance that a bitter hostility seems springing up between these classes—the Home Rulers and the revolutionists, as we may call them, for want of a better name. We who are at a distance, and can on that account judge minutely, perhaps, can see no good or sufficient reason for such antagonism. Both parties are undoubtedly love their country and would risk even life in its service, and this one common feeling ought make them tolerant of each other. The best way to end the quarrel is for the Irish people, all keep irritated in slavery is to indulge in bickerings and dissensions. That is exactly what England wants Irishmen to do, and what they have been doing so far ever since 1829, to our own sorrow. Somebody, we do not know who, has said that the Irish are the most tolerant people on the face of the earth toward their enemies, and the most intolerant toward their friends. And it is sadly true so, for every day we see proof that the man who differs a little in his idea, of how Ireland can be benefited is more bitterly assailed by his countrymen than the most confirmed upholder of the British Government. It is quite enough to make any man despair of Ireland's regeneration to see this miserable tendency to dissension. Certainly, one would imagine, with all the fatal, ruined strength of the people to resist the smallest concession from the British Government, and if divisions are created, no matter by what party, the victory must ever remain with England.

The recent disturbance at Limerick, and the still more recent election in Cork, are examples of this spirit of faction which is working so much mischief in Ireland, and lowering our country's character in the estimation of the civilized world. The first was brought about by the pure wantonness of a few turbulent individuals who fancied they could force their peculiar notions upon twenty thousand people; the second was caused by the unyielding selfishness of two professing nationalists and their followers. Either Mr. Dwyer Lane or Mr. John Daly would have made an excellent member of the Catholic Church, and if the people are made infidels or atheists in the process it does not trouble them very much. Indeed, in most instances that is precisely what they want. They know very well that there is no such thing as conversion to Catholicity to Protestantism—it is an impossibility, and never can take place. But, unfortunately, there is such a thing as perversion from Christian faith to scepticism or atheism, and it is that they want to assist. So if these Protestant missionaries received their right title they would be called "propagators of infidelity;" but their labors even in that respect are so small, and so insignificant that they scarcely deserve notice. What intelligent and fair-minded Protestants should look into is the scandalous waste of money involved in the maintenance of these missions. In this country and in England there are hundreds of thousands of their own co-religionists living in poverty and distress, and to assist these would be a work of the greatest charity. If the millions of dollars which are squandered in ridiculous and fruitless "missions to Roman Catholic countries," were only turned in this direction what practical good would not be accomplished? But the pious fools who pay the cash for the missions are anything rather than practical.

PROTESTANT "MISSIONS" TO ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Nearly every one of the thousand "Churches" into which Protestantism is divided maintain some kind of an agency or "mission" among the people of Ireland, the Catholics. The funds for these come from the pockets of a few wealthy, but weak-minded, fanatics who fancy they are doing a good and holy work by contributing the paltry sum they can afford to the cause of conversion. But "next week" never comes to many of these, and he has to take the same untold next year, with probably the same result. This should not be. It is far easier and less expensive for the subscriber to forward his subscription by return than for the publisher to send out collectors. The recent disturbance at Limerick, and the still more recent election in Cork, are examples of this spirit of faction which is working so much mischief in Ireland, and lowering our country's character in the estimation of the civilized world. The first was brought about by the pure wantonness of a few turbulent individuals who fancied they could force their peculiar notions upon twenty thousand people; the second was caused by the unyielding selfishness of two professing nationalists and their followers. Either Mr. Dwyer Lane or Mr. John Daly would have made an excellent member of the Catholic Church, and if the people persist in going to Mass every Sunday after all, just as if the pious "missionaries" did not tell them it was idolatry! Occasionally a list of the converts is ventured upon, but that is a desperate undertaking, and rarely fails to get the compiling missionary into a great deal of trouble. Actions for libel are threatened at him by the score, and he is fortunate indeed if he does not get his head broken by some of his enraged converts. The apostate CHINIQUY in Canada recently got himself into this scrape by publishing a list of his "converts" into which bad somehow crept the names of honest people who had always been decent Catholics, and had as much idea of turning Protestants as they had of trying to jump to the moon. Some time previously, a "missionary" laboring in Rome had to make a very humble apology for turning a prominent Italian revolutionist into a Protestant. The man was not a Roman Catholic, hated the Pope and the priests as heartily as any missionary could desire, but as to becoming a Protestant—that was quite a different thing, and he would not stand the accusation!

And this incident brings us to notice a matter very much misunderstood by the Protestant communities, or at least a considerable portion of them. Revolutionary governments and secret society manipulators give every encouragement to the band who false "missionaries," but it is not because they admire Protestantism in any shape, or even are favorable to Christianity; it is because they want to break down the power of Parliament and truly representable Irish ideas; but, thanks to their mutual jealousy and stubbornness, the strength of the national votes was divided between them, and a rash Tory was returned. Mr. BENJAMIN DISRAELI, who so courtly and churchlily refused emissary for the Fenian prisoners only a few days ago, now rejoices in the idea that the votes of the people of Cork, as represented in the late by-elections, will be given in favor of him and his illiberal policy. So now if there is a Coercion Act to be passed, or a Land Bill to be defeated, Mr. WILLIAM H. O'SHEA, the newly-elected member for Cork, will be on hand to support the Government and keep down his own countrymen.

And there are Irishmen foolish enough to call this a matter of small importance. If not actually a matter of rejoicing, because it is a defeat of the Parliamentary or peace policy party. If these people could only understand how delighted the rulers of Poland would be if they could only secure representation of their opinions in the councils of the Czar, they would soon see the result of the late Cork election in its proper light. It does not require much intelligence to see that whatever is done in the English Parliament by the Irish members will secured. If not be of a nature to injure or weaken the country, and will only delay for a single hour the time for Ireland's liberation, if it is ever to come at all.

THE LYNCHING AT SANTA ROSA.

The lynching at Santa Rosa, on Saturday last, was undoubtedly a bad affair, and discreditable to all who took part in it. For any reasoning man to find an excuse for the proceeding is altogether an impossibility. Nor have we a desire to be guilty on every occasion and under every circumstance by good citizens; but the features which sometimes give it a shadow of justification—or rather appear to do so—were entirely wanting in this case. Santa Rosa is no half-wild settlement, almost out of the reach of civilization, but a well-established and flourishing town in a thickly populated county. It has its lawful officers and courts, with competent and active officers, and there is no charge that they sympathized with crime or neglected to punish it. So there was not the slightest necessity for irresponsible parties to assume functions that did not belong to them, and transgress the very first rules of orderly society. The unfortunate victim, HENLEY, was not a desperate character in any sense. He had shot with every man's hand, and could therefore be classed as an outlaw or common enemy. On the contrary, he was a steady farmer, long a resident of the vicinity. We believe, and there is no reason to presume to be otherwise, was ever guilty of any grave misdeed except the one affair which had brought him within the power of the law. Although that offense was the taking away of the life of a human being, there were circumstances connected with it which a conscientious jury might regard as lessening its heinousness, and deem it sufficiently punished by a period of imprisonment. There is no conceivable grounds for supposing that the properly established legal tribunals would not duly investigate the matter, and render full and condign punishment to the culprit; consequently there was no valid excuse for any person interfering with the course of justice. Viewing the thing in every light, trying to make all possible excuses for the lynchers, the hanging process itself to our mind, and we think it will to the mind of every law-abiding citizen, as a cruel and savage act. Indeed, it looks far more like the result of private vengeance, the doing of the friends of the men ROLAND, than the action of impartial but stern men, who had nothing but the repression of crime in their thoughts. Taken altogether the thing shows its ugly face to the locality in which it happened, and we hope the perpetrators will be discovered.

PEACE OR WAR?

The Turkish war scare appears to be quieting down somewhat. If RUSSIA has not actually withdrawn from her threatening position, she has at all events adopted a more moderate tone in stating her reproaches, and now she seems willing to keep the peace. This may be mere pretense, a device to deceive her enemies and throw them off their guard, but inasmuch as European securities have strengthened during the last few days, it follows that reputation as well as politicians place some confidence in it. Russian policy is traditionally slow and cautious, and yet on several occasions of great importance the want of a little prescience and calculation has been the cause of its ignominious defeat. Russia has one peculiarity, however, which does her good service in many an emergency—she has no objection to retreating when an object is greater than calculated upon bars her way. No matter what affronts may be put upon her, she can pocket them quietly and bide her time for revenge. Rebuffs or humiliations have no effect whatever upon her conduct, and she pursues the even tenor of her way undisturbed by matters which would provoke the warlike fury of any other nation in Europe. So in the present instance if she, as alleged, has changed her tone towards Turkey, and shows a desire to maintain friendly relations, it simply means that she has been disappointed in her expectation of securing allies, and deems it prudent to wait a while. Nevertheless, it would be foolish to place implicit reliance upon the telegraphic dispatches which are forwarded to this country. The game of diplomacy which the great European powers are now playing does not oscillate every twenty-four hours between peace and war, but continues on steadily, and will probably get checkmated effectually. If we were to place credence in these dispatches, we should imagine that one day RUSSIA and TURKEY were actually drawing up cartels to war, and the next day they change their minds and resolve to keep the peace. The bare statement of the thing shows its absurdity. The progress of events, so far as they can be seen and understood by outsiders, is now in the direction of peace, and that is the utmost which can be safely said.

It is noteworthy that TURKEY is gradually acquiring a more liberal and manly way of acting in her demands upon her rebellious subjects. She is behaving just like a person who has found out he has more friends than he thought, and who is, therefore, encouraged to assert his rights. Does it not look as though the powers previously overawing him, Austria and England are certainly supporting her, while RUSSIA is by no means assured of the friendship of Germany. If this be the case, it would not say much for the intention of aiding with RUSSIA, war would almost inevitably break out this year, and perhaps before the lapse of a month; but as no such disposition is evinced, prudence dictates a retreat from a position no longer tenable. But, alter all, in spite of AUSTRIA and ENGLAND, or any possible combination of powers, the days of the TURKISH Empire are numbered. It has outlived its usefulness, if ever it had any, which is not very demonstrable, and now decay and corruption have made such inroads upon it that a much more prolonged existence is entirely out of the question. The murder of the deposed SULTAN and HASSAN—for, most unfortunately, the latter is also dead—has created a universal belief now is that they were assassinated—will not help TURKEY or procure her more friends in her hour of need. A Government that makes murder part of its State policy is manifestly out of place in Europe, and must be got rid of at all hazards. The selfishness and avarice of the nations which would sustain it are too much a various with the intelligent assistment of the whole continent to be successful for any length of time.

Pedestrianism.

We are to have another exciting pedestrian contest in the city, which, by the by, no doubt will be witnessed by thousands of people. The indefatigable Daniel O'Leary has been somewhat baffled by the tone of the criticisms indulged in by some of the reporters in the matter of the concession of his contest with Henry Schmehl. A few gentlemen seemed to labor under the false impression that because O'Leary did not times cover the five hundred miles with six days he was practically defeated. The champion did not, however, start in to walk that or any particular distance, but simply to outwalk his antagonist, and that he did without the slightest trouble. Now he undertakes to traverse the five hundred miles in less than a hundred and forty hours and settle the question of his walking powers at once and for ever. The Mayor has appointed time-keepers, so that there can be no doubt about the genuineness of the record. Four amateurs are to compete for a beautiful watch and chain, and O'Leary seats itself to our mind, and we think it will to the mind of every law-abiding citizen, as a cruel and savage act. Indeed, it looks far more like the result of private vengeance, the doing of the friends of the men ROLAND, than the action of impartial but stern men, who had nothing but the repression of crime in their thoughts. Taken altogether the thing shows its ugly face to the locality in which it happened, and we hope the perpetrators will be discovered.

The Pomtdeal Gaz flame over the Pope's contribution on the Centennial grounds at Philadelphia. The Protestant League has sent in a formal protest against the action, and threaten the Commissioners with all manner of direful consequences unless the hated emblem is pulled down. From the latest accounts "our flag was still there."

Mrs. Alice Farmer Desmond will please call at the postoffice, San Francisco, for a letter of great importance.

THE YOUTHS' EMPLOYMENT OFFICE.

A short circular from his Grace the Archbishop, read in all the Catholic churches of the city on Sunday last, attracted attention to the present position and urgent wants of an institution which is truly deserving of support from all charitable citizens. On the 1st of November, 1874, there was established a Youths' Directory and Employment Office in this city which has been quietly at work ever since, and accomplished an amount of good which is positively astonishing, considering the limited means at its disposal. We only copy the words of the modest yet eloquent report of the Agent when we explain that it is a free intelligence office, open every day in the week, where, without fee or payment of any kind demanded either from the employer or the employé, young lads may be helped to obtain situations corresponding to their physical and educational capabilities, either in town or country. The applicants, as we are informed, represent every nationality creed and class to be found in our cosmopolitan population. Many of them were helpless and homeless street vagrants, without parents or friends to provide for them, and reduced to a state of absolute destitution. Since the establishment of this bureau—now nineteen months ago—upwards of a thousand such little waifs and strays of society have been assisted to get employment and put in the way of earning an honest living for themselves. Without the friendly aid of this humble and almost unknown institution they would, most probably, have become hardened criminals, and prove a trouble to the police as well as a pest to the community for the remainder of their days. Let any humane Christian or philanthropist try and measure the amount of misery, moral wealth and society—not to speak of Christian charity—implied in the finding employment for these young lads, and he will fail, for God alone knows, how many they have rescued.

We have a so-called Industrial School which is nothing better than a graduating college for vice and crime. It costs the city thousands of dollars per annum, and will never be a success as long as the Boss Directory? We may safely assert that it never can and never will. What are the revenue, of this beneficent and saving institution? Listen, ye millionaires, who spend money lavishly upon the gratification of your own whims and caprices. Listen, ye mammon worshippers, who dream of nothing but the amassing of wealth. The funds for the support of this office are paid in Jan. 1875, the moved a vote of most sincere thanks to the Rev. Father Dominic O'Daly was an Irish Dominican Friar, a native of Tralee, county Kerry, whose love for his bleeding country took practical form and shape in the foundation of two Irish houses in London, one for the education and training of Irish Dominicans for the home mission, Corpo Santo, the other a monastery nunnery for the same order. One of the former went forth an illustrious army of martyrs and holy confessors to Peoples, Bel and died for the faith. Throughout all the shocked history of the latter Bon Secours has been almost miraculously preserved, and though the hand of the prosecutor has swept away religious establishments from Portugal, the Irish Sisters of St. Dominic still hold possession of their beautiful home on the banks of the Tagus. At the present moment it possesses a large and affluent community, and is deserving of the highest esteem by the Portuguese on account of the noble work it does for the higher classes.

A SELF-MADE MAN.

An old and well known correspondent, who has just returned to this city from the gold mines of British Columbia, sends us the following sketch of "a self-made man." We publish it because we believe it is true, and because we take an interest in the career of all the descendants of the old Irish race:

The Hon. Thos. R. Humphreys, Finance Minister for British Columbia, was born in England in the year 1840. His parents, both Irish, emigrated in early life to the land of the Saxon. Young Humphreys arrived in California in July 1856, and was educated there. In June, 1858, he left with a crowd of adventurers to seek their fortune on the banks of the Fraser. As a miner he did not succeed, but he did raise himself in the estimation of the people, and in 1866 was elected to represent the important district of Lillooet in the local Parliament. At that time British Columbia was a Crown colony. The Crown nominated the majority of legislators and permitted the people to select a minority. Two years experience proved to the satisfied that Mr. Humphreys that this system of government was entirely unsuited to the wants and wishes of a free people, and on the 11th of April, 1870, at a mass meeting of the citizens of Victoria, he denounced Crown servile majority, the gentlemen beyond James Bay," in a gang of corrupt politicians, unscrupulous and unfit to direct the affairs of a free people."

The denunciation fell like a thunderbolt on the minions of the Crown, the masters of the people, and on the 17th of April Governor Musgrave declared the House dissolved, issued a proclamation and suspended the constitution, and then undertook to govern the province. A reply to the petition forwarded to her Majesty had arrived in the meantime, and the Queen, in the name of her "dearest colleagues, unconstitutional and unjust," and commanded him to restore Mr. Humphreys to his place in the House."

That day to this Humphreys, the Englishman, has really been the leading power in the land. In 1875 he made room for a friend by resigning his seat for Lillooet and was returned by acclamation. In January, 1876, he moved a vote of most sincere thanks to the Rev. Father Dominic O'Daly, who had been the leading spirit in the foundation of the Irish Dominican Priory, and who had been instrumental in procuring a grant of land for the purpose of fighting for the Royal cause in the Low Countries. Father Dominic O'Daly was an Irishman by birth, a native of Tralee, county Kerry, whose love for his bleeding country took practical form and shape in the foundation of two Irish houses in London, one for the education and training of Irish Dominicans for the home mission, Corpo Santo, the other a monastery nunnery for the same order. One of the former went forth an illustrious army of martyrs and holy confessors to Peoples, Bel and died for the faith. Throughout all the shocked history of the latter Bon Secours has been almost miraculously preserved, and though the hand of the prosecutor has swept away religious establishments from Portugal, the Irish Sisters of St. Dominic still hold possession of their beautiful home on the banks of the Tagus. At the present moment it possesses a large and affluent community, and is deserving of the highest esteem by the Portuguese on account of the noble work it does for the higher classes.

The managers of the Maryland University Hospital, Baltimore, having determined to increase the practice of dissection for the benefit of students, the Sisters of Charity who have been the nurses for fifty years have decided not to attend, their object being, as the Baltimore American says, solely of a religious character. They were to vote on the 1st of June on institution being so. St. Vincent's Hospital for the Sick. It is understood that another institution will soon be secured for the University Hospital.

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of May 27.

ANTRIM.

A few days since a domestic servant, named Mary Magee, was killed at the Sydenham station, on the Hollywood line, near Belfast. The deceased was crossing the line when an express train came up, and, the buffer striking her, knocked her down, and the engine going over her legs killed her almost instantaneously.

Mr. John Rea made an application last week to the resident magistrate, at the Belfast police court, for three summonses against the proprietor of the Belfast News Letter, for an alleged libel published in that journal, purporting to be a report of a meeting held in Mr. Rea's house in reference to the approaching visit of the Lord Lieutenant to the North. Mr. Rea, it appears, had been quietly exercising his Irish spaniels on the Ballyhill road when he was surrounded, and called upon to make a speech. Refusing to forego his pastime, he was escorted to his house by an increasing crowd, and when he made his appearance at the drawing-room window the gathering had already numbered several thousand of persons. In his speech, while he extolled the Orangemen, he did not omit to say a word for the Fenians, condemning only "the Ultramontane" party. Having referred to the visit of the Lord Lieutenant to Belfast, he concluded with the cry, "God save Ireland and Ireland's Queen," and the meeting, which had become intensely enthusiastic, grew, as his utterances, before unsurpassing, three ringing cheers for the Duke of Abercorn.

ARMAGH.

At last Markethill fair, John Parr and James Parr, two respectable farmers, quarreled. It is said one accused the other of ill-treating his wife. An altercation ensued, which was followed by a fight. In the course of the scuffle John Parr received a blow on the left temple, which pitched him violently against the side of a cart. His unfortunate man's head came in contact with the point of the axle, and he died immediately. James Parr was arrested by the police.

CARLOW.

At the presentment sessions for the barony of Carlow, held in the court house on Saturday, the principal business before the magistrates and ratepayers was the consideration of a claim, amounting to over £270, by Mr. Michael Kendall, of Prince Hill, for compensation for alleged malicious injury to cattle and premises at Quinnagh, on the 3rd January last. The chief evidence it would appear that the fire was discovered at about four o'clock in the morning, and damage to the amount claimed was sustained. Two magistrates and the foreman were appointed to inquire into the case, before which the jury decided that the claim was a just one, and the amount was ultimately fixed at £223 5s 6d.

CAVAN.

The annual hiring fair of Cavan was held on Tuesday week, and the town was thronged throughout the entire day with troops of well-dressed boys and girls, who bartered hard with their late employers for an advance of wages. Able-bodied men earned wages from £15 £18 with good board; females from £7 to £8; little boys and girls from £3 to £4 10s. All were engaged.

CLARE.

At the presentment sessions for the county of Clare at large, held at the court house, Ennis, on Wednesday week, the application from the Board of Superintendence of £1,000, on account of the public expense of the jail and four bridewells of the county for the half year ending Spring assizes, 1877, gave rise to a discussion with regard to the cost of the staff of that establishment. Mr. Francis Barry, J. P., D. L., referred to the returns laid before them by the clerk, which showed that the average number of prisoners was 30, while there was a staff of officers 14 in number, which would be adequate to take charge of 300 prisoners. In fact, the jail was a nursery for half-worked officials and the maintaining of needless sinecures.

CORK.

On Sunday, in St. Mary's Cathedral, Cork, a most solemn and devotional sermon was preached by Right Rev. Dr. Delaney, Bishop of Ardagh, in behalf of the Magdalen Asylum under the care of the nuns of the Good Shepherd, Sunday's Well. Right Rev. Dr. Delaney, Bishop of this diocese, presided at the throne. The Mayor, High-Sheriff, and other leading citizens were among the congregation. The right reverend preacher took for his text the words from St. John's Gospel, "Now there stood by the cross Mary, the mother of Jesus, and Mary Magdalen."

At the close of the Cork Young Men's Society rumors were abroad a thousand persons, and hundred being members of the society, approached Holy Communion.

DOWN.

The success of Professor Smyth's resolution in the House of Commons in favor of closing public houses in Ireland on Sunday is a great pleasure to the inhabitants of Rosebrook. In the evening of the day on which the news became known a number of people, headed by Mr. L. D. Lusk and Mr. J. Weir, preceded by the brass band, marched through the village, round Mount Caulfield and down to Millvale, cheers being given at intervals for Sunday closings. The crowd then proceeded to Derrymore, where thirteen tar barrels were burned about ten o'clock. The people were evidently in high spirits, and, after again making the welkin ring with their cheers, they quietly dispersed.

DUBLIN.

On Friday night week a fatal boat accident, involving the loss of two lives, occurred at Laytown. A pleasure boat put off for a sail and capsized, when Mr. Dunney a native of Kilkenny city, and his daughter were drowned. Two others, the boatman and Miss Lynam, were saved. Miss Lynam remains in a very exhausted state. The bodies of father and daughter were found locked to each other's arms.

GALWAY.

The foundation-stone of the new military barracks at Renmore will be laid the 1st August, and ceremonies that are necessary will be performed by his Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, who will be the guest of Sir Arthur Guinness on the occasion.

KERRY.

Mr. Donat O'Brien arrived in Killarney on Monday week, by invitation of several of the influential inhabitants, to form a committee for the Butt Testimonial. He held a meeting at the Innisfallen Hotel, at half-past 8 p.m., some of the most influential people and influential communicate was formed.

The landlords mustered in great force at the meeting of the Traise Board of Guardians last week, when Mr. Butt's Land Bill came up for discussion, and an amendment hostile to the measure was carried by thirty-three votes to fourteen. The majority was made up of twenty ex officio and thirteen elected guardians, so that if the ex officio had not interfered there would have been a majority for the bill.

KING'S COUNTY.

At the last meeting of the Tullamore Board of Guardians, Thomas Hackett, Esq., in the chair, Mr. A. W. Bermingham, in accordance with notice of motion, moved the adoption of a petition to Parliament in favor of Mr. Butt's Land Bill, and also asked Parliament to insert a clause protecting the interests of owners of lone parks, mercantile and industrial establishments. Mr. Andrew Connolly, J. P., a landlord and ex officio guardian, seconded the motion. He at one time held a small farm from an extensive landlord, was capitulously evicted, and obtained the small meed of compensation allowed by the present Land Act.

LEITRIM.

The office of County Treasurer for Leitrim, and that of Clerk of the Crown for Roscommon, have become vacant by the death of William Lawder, Esq., on the 18th inst.

LIMERICK.

The Provincial of the Redemptorist Order, Very Rev. Dr. Coffin, accompanied by the Very Rev. Father T. E. Bridgett, C.S.S.R., arrived from England on a visit, last week, to Mount St. Alphonsus, Limerick.

At the meeting of the Guardians of the Limerick Union, last week, a question was asked by Mr. McNamara in reference to the alleged suppression of the copy of Mr. Butt's Bill sent to the Board for consideration two or three weeks ago. The clerk not being present, no definite explanation could be obtained, but the Chairman, Hon. Mr. Fitzgibbon, stated that if the Guardians assembled upon the occasion of the bill he would leave the chair, as he considered the subject entirely political, and foreign to the duties of the Board. Notice of motion for a petition in favor of the bill was given by Mr. McNamara.

LONDONDERRY.

The first of the May hiring fairs was held in Derry on Wednesday week. The attendance of farmers and laborers was not good, and the wages demanded by the latter were somewhat higher than farmers were asked to pay for the term just ended. Men capable of doing all kinds of farm labor received, in some instances, an increase of from £1 to £1 10s. over the amount paid for the winter half-year. Females were readily obtained employment at wages averaging from £4—a sum for which the services of a similar class could have been obtained a few years ago.

At a late meeting of the Governors of the Foyle College party spirit was decided against the new building about three miles' distance from Derry, it is believed in the neighborhood of Grange; but a strong desire that the asylum should be built in the neighborhood of Coleraine, and it is believe Sir H. H. Bruce will hand a good site on very advantageous terms.

LOUTH.

On Wednesday week a splendid specimen of the royal fish was caught in the Boyne. Some of the salmon fishers, when out with their nets, below the Boyne Inn, knew they had got a heavy take, but had no idea of the nature of it, and that it was so rich a one, until the sturgeon was safely landed. It is the first instance we have heard, says the Drogheda Argus, of "sturian" being seized in the Boyne. The sturgeon, after being on view for a day, was sent to Dublin.

A special meeting of the Drogheda corporation was recently called to take into consideration the Jarlse (Ireland) Proceed. It will be remembered that a resolution was brought in by Sir Michael Beach, and carried upon the 19th session, which proposes to empower the Lord Lieutenant to abolish or distrunchise Drogheda as an assize town and transfer the assizes to Dundalk. The meeting appointed a committee to draw up a memorial on the subject to Sir Michael Beach, praying for the retention of the obnoxious clause.

MAYO.

In addition to the interesting relics already noticed, some French coins, which were evidently in the possession of the soldiers when they were buried in the Knock Hill, having been brought to light, in a state of perfect preservation. Some of these have been shown to us are silver, and are equivalent, one to a half crown, the other to about twenty shillings of English currency. The first bears the date 1736, which carries the mind back to the time of Louis XV., whose head is engraved on one side of the coin, with the words (in Latin), "Louis XV., by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre;" on the obverse is the inscription (also in Latin), "May the name of the Lord be blessed." The second piece belongs, not alone to a different era, but also to a new order of things. The figure engraved on it is no longer that of the tributary despot, but the glorious figure of the Goddess of Liberty, and the Republican motto (in French), "Union and Strength." The only date is "thirty year," which signifies the 30th year, dating from the 1st year of the first French Revolution—or 1792.

His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam arrived in Castlebar on Tuesday last on a visitation throughout his archdiocese. The venerable prelate appears in excellent health and spirits. It is truly delightful to see the wonderful physical and mental energies of the Archbishop so completely unimpaired.

The Catholic, says the Connaught Patriot, who would have said eighty years ago that Claremont House, the residence of the notorious Denis Browne, would one day be converted into a convent, would, most assuredly, have been laughed at as a wild visionary. And yet the wonderful change is likely to come to pass. The house and demesne of Claremont have, we are informed, been purchased from their present proprietor, T. D. Maguire, Esq., through the instrumentality of Rev. H. MacHale, the pious and patriotic parish priest of Claremorris, with the intention of founding a religious community.

QUEEN'S COUNTY

At the last meeting of the Mountmellick Board of Guardians an unusually large number of Guardians, including ex officio, were present. Colonel H. B. Carden, chairman of the Board, presided. After the transaction of the ordinary business, and before any discussion of Mr. Vaughan's motion or other political discussion. The chairman then declared the meeting at an end. A large number of Guardians proceeded to the workhouse, and before the meeting was made, which was not successful. Mr. W. H. Cobbe declared that the system as pursued this day was a most tyrannical one, where murders, ex officio and others, were packed for the purpose of carrying out everything they desired and wished, and that was for the good of the country.

ROSCOMMON.

At a meeting of the Board on Saturday a resolution in favor of Mr. Butt's bill was carried by a majority of 13 to 11, the former including the chairman, Mr. Mapother, J. P., vice-chairman.

SLIGO.

The house of a farmer in the county of Sligo, named McGoldrick, was set on fire on Tuesday night week by his son, a person of weak mind, who gave the alarm in time to save the lives of the inmates, but the house was burned down. The lunatic diary fled, and has not been captured.

WATERFORD.

Mr. J. O'Shea, son of M. O'Shea, P. L. G., has been awarded relieving officer for the city of Waterford, 18 Guardians out of 32 present voting for him.

WESTMEATH.

On Thursday week the constabulary of the Durrow district are said to have received information from a farmer named Thomas Sullivan, to the effect that on the previous evening, while absent at market, a man with blackened face entered his house, and after demanding from the servant girl a gun, asked which was the room where it was kept. After searching for the gun without success, the man decamped. About three weeks since Mr. Sullivan took a farm from which a former tenant had been evicted. The district where the outrage was perpetrated is one of the most peaceable in the whole county, and none are more zealous to see the offender punished than Mr. Sullivan's immediate neighbors.

The magistrates at Collinstown petty sessions, on Saturday, were engaged for a considerable length of time investigating a charge of shooting at with intent, etc., brought by a man named Kelly, of Rath, against two men named respectively Michael Carroll and James Fagan. The court was crowded. Patrick Reilly was sworn, and deposed that he was coming from Oldcastle on the evening of the 8th of May, when he met the two men Carroll and Flynn standing near the ditch. A shot came towards him from where they stood. He ran towards them. Flynn ran away and Carroll got into the field. A short time after Notice of the plaintiff ensued, and after the bench had consulted some time, the chairman (Colonel B. Smyth) said they were unanimously of opinion that the case should be dismissed, and that there was not the slightest imputation existing on the character of the two defendants; and, Reilly, take my advice, and let Carroll and Fagan alone. I do so when you are sober. And I may tell you I do not believe a word you swore." Captain Barry—Neither do I. The court then adjourned.

WEXFORD.

Rev. John L. Furlong, Adm., Enniscorthy, has been promoted to the pastoral charge of Ballygarret parish, vice Very Rev. J. Sinnott, deceased; Rev. Patrick Doyle, C. C., Screen, has been appointed to the curacy of Duncannon, vice Furlong, and Rev. Patrick Redmond, C. C., Screen, has been appointed to the curacy of Enniscorthy, vice Doyle.

Denis Morrogh, Esq., of Shelagh, has purchased Mr. William Lambert's interest in the lands of Morgiass, containing 132 acres for the sum of £1,050. The lands are held under lease dated January 19, 1850, for the life of the owner, now aged 65, and produce a net annual rent of £150 9s 6d.

A Remarkable Centenarian in Mayo.

A correspondent, writing from Swineford to the Connaught Telegraph, says: Michael O'Malley, a man of gigantic proportions, who was born in the year 1771, and is now within a mile or so of Westport, is now in his hundred and thirteenth year. His father, Patrick O'Malley, had a family of sixteen, all attaining the age of maturity—ten males and six females—and they were all remarkable for anything like an old age. He held the farm of land known as Collins, from the late Sir Neal O'Donel, considerably over a century, until through ills in good and respectable circumstances. The present Michael O'Malley, as a cattle-dealer, had recourse to various parts of the country, but finally settled down and got married to a lady also named Kate O'Brien, of the city of Limerick. His living there with his wife for nearly fifty-eight years and four daughters—till about eight years ago. His wife and-47 his children having died, he returned home to his native county, and is now a wanderer, thrown upon the world. He was thirteen years old when the Irish Army in the first year of the French Revolution. He joined the Rebellion, and took part in the battles under General Humbert, at Killala, together with his three brothers, Peter, Tom and John. He attached himself to the French under the immediate command of James Blake, of Carrowbeg, and served and fought for him at the battle of Carricksan and Ballinamuck. He escaped, and betook himself to the mountains for years, until all about the Rebellion had been forgotten, or at least attained down, but left his native county. He is now a beggar. Will the great and the good O'Malley's be unmindful of a portion of the blood which flowed in the generous, who contributed to raise a monument for the French dead at Prasch Hill, be unmindful of their companion in arms?

Protestant Propagandism in Spain.

The Rev. L. Tugwell, writing with reference to the recent changes in the Spanish Government, says: "Our mission has reason for thankfulness that the article has passed the Cortes. Our mission churches and schools in the large towns of Spain are not now likely to be molested, and an energetic Protestant work can be prosecuted in the work throughout Spain. We must of course work quietly and wisely, attracting as little public attention as possible in Spain. It was a great thing to have secured the article which gives us liberty. And yet the Romish Catholic churches at Seville or Protestant service before the present Government came into power. The Presbyterians have also purchased one of the closed Roman Catholic churches at Seville. But of our fifty missionary agents working in Spain and Portugal are converted Spanish and Portuguese priests. In our Monthly Record of May will be found an extract from an article which appeared in a Portuguese newspaper, the Commercio do Porto, of April 11, giving an account of the spread of our work. The article was written by a member of the Portuguese Cortes, who is no doubt a Roman Catholic. It is rather remarkable that no allusion is made to the important Wesleyan mission at Oporto, or to the smaller work of the Presbyterians at Lisbon. He only refers to the Episcopal Reformed Church; this may be from the fact that the missionary clergymen are reformed Portuguese priests."

'One for the Cabman."

A noble lord (Lord James Butler,) whose endeavors to reform the Reformation and protect Irish Protestantism against his bishops and clergy have made his name famous in the Synod debates, took an "outside" in Seville over the other day to drive him home. On the way he fell into a free-and-easy chat with the jarvey, whose opinion, although that of a benighted "Roman," his lordship wished to gather upon his own part in the great secession War. "Indeed, me lord," says Jehu, "it's what we does all be sayin' on our stand that you're the greatest man, God bless you, since Father Tom Maguire." His lordship, all wreathed in smiles, began to realise that "this was fame." "And pray, my good man, why do you all think that?" Is it because you think the Athanasian Creed is true to save the lives of the inmates, but the house was burned down. The lunatic diary fled, and has not been captured.

WATERFORD.

Mr. J. O'Shea, son of M. O'Shea, P. L. G., has been awarded relieving officer for the city of Waterford, 18 Guardians out of 32 present voting for him.

A HYMN OF FREEDOM.

Freedom's song 'mid the glorious angel throng
Resoundeth clear;
Let the slave by its notes learn the means he owns
Rose and bear;
For the triumph of the tocsin draweth near,
Strong in truth, brave and beautiful as youth,
Is the glorious Gospel of Liberty.

In its glowing depths we can gaze in the spirit of the ages
And the rushing upward to the star
Of the Revolutions of the temporal Sun begins.

Prophets' pale feet tire not the thitherside isle
Of the far
Or the sad by the everlasting saloft of God
Transplant how;
For the redeemers of Liberty, nerved the blow:
It is night, robed in passport of light,
Freedom, dawn!

With the keen Ithuriel sword of the everlasting word.
And with righteousness for breastplate, rounds now,
Bright helmet of salvation on thy brow.

Storms gleams flash across our ancient streams,
By such lake, where the emerald fringes wake
Fells red and grey
For the saintly course of Freedom's sunny sails,
Where all human fetters rend the winds,
And the strong,
Nothing down oppression lies with the might of patriot deed,
That valor all human fetters, rend the wrong,
At the lustrous rent Pallenia's color throng.

Rise to take your freedom's battle-plain
Nations dead
For the right's sake, the right is God's sight
Lead the dead.

Quench the crimson of the lances, crown the head.
They may seem to have lived not for a dream,
And the dead
Shake hearts, fettered hands, darker doom upon thy hands,
Power vengeance of the tyrants, heavier chains!
For the hour of the Lord's vengeance, for debt for still retained.

By that hope which our living type invokes
Manhood sound, calm, impassionate and grand,
When a great, heroic purpose dits the sky;
Kindling all the nations, and the nations cry
State of race—
For deadly, bitter, hot hours that tree of evil root;
In se how dowry scum and branches, that its place
Of the Revolutions of the temporal Sun begins.

But with strife comes the progress of true life,
Of the
While the round of an empty, babbling sound
And humanity in bondage wails and weeps.
But with liberty comes the reign of labor, liberty,
Injured stirrings of a mind heartbroken and blind
Have a sure and certain hope, that God is ours,
In the God-like soul within us lives to rule.

The divine, holy sacramental wine,
Untrodden,
Of old from pure chalices of gold
Shall the feast and the flower of the years
Be poured forth
Of the earth, of the night shall pass away;
Freedom's mission is to save, and not to slay.

Hark and wail, drawn by love and not by hate,
Ere cloud, storm or tempest, crown or shroud,
Ere the sky's radiant music of a song:
For a day of joy is coming, and
We are one,
Consecrated by the love of God's alter kneeling
Over all.
Thy all nations coming Christ beneath the sun—
In the freedom and the glory of the Sanctorum.

LADY WILDE (SPERANZA.)

Martyrdom of Three Missionary Priests in the Sahara.

The following letter from one of the priests of the Society of Missionaries of Africa, describing the martyrdom of three priests of the society, and addressed to the father of one of the missionaries, was published in the Univers of the 11th inst.:

ORA LAND OF ARABIA, May 1, 1876.

SIR: I have to confirm the sad news which the Abbe Richard has already announced to you in a doubtful manner. His Lordship wrote himself to the fathers and to the mothers of our dear martyrs. It is for them now to give you without delay, to the best of their knowledge, all the particulars. As for me I have just received.

Your excellent son was had the supreme honor of shedding his blood for the cause of God and for the love of his brethren. He was killed by the Arabs in company with two of his comrades of the mission, Father Menonal and Bourlaud, with the view of taking their gold, their property of the tribe of Ouled Sidi Cheikh, whose negroes, the intimate slave of their journey. Setting out at the beginning of December last, they accomplished the first part of their journey without hindrance. It was only in the country of the Touaregs, on the sixty thirty days' journey from the shore, that they appear to have been stopped.

We do not yet know all the details that accompanied their death. We know only, from witnesses worthy of credit, or present at a yard deep, in which he was placed in a sitting position, covered up to his chin and with his knees doubled up towards his chin, his feet turned inward toward his stomach, and his hands also pointed inward toward his chest. The coil or grave was filled with masonry and floored with large flat stones of wooden and clay, and the white ant and other insects might be kept off. Over this was built a cairn of boulders of stone, five or six feet long, several inches thick and broad enough to cover the whole of the grave, were also placed over him so that he could not escape; and finally a little earth was plastered over the hole so as to make the surface of the ground smooth and compact. The door of the house was then locked, the key was placed outside to mount guard during the whole month, so that no trick might be played or deception practiced.

"Lieut. Travelyan and I set off together to see what might remain to be seen. The outer wall of the house door had been broken up, the covering of the grave removed, and the remains of the poor Abbe Richard of Goshur Lal. The Mounsbee arrived in time to see the opening of the shroud as before mentioned, and stated that he was taken out in a perfectly senseless state, with his eyes closed, his hands crossed and powerless, his stomach very much shrunken, and his teeth locked so fast together that the bystanders were obliged to force open his mouth with an iron instrument in order to pour a little water down his throat. Under this treatment he gradually recovered his senses, and was restored to the use of his limbs, which he began with use by, keeping one of his voices, as if his animal functions were still in a very feeble state, but, no doubt, his recuperating strength in mind beyond and cured, had earnestly pressed to visit their country. They themselves had also solicited the permission of the Archbishop, our venerated Father, the Cardinal Lavigerie, and it was by his order we have accomplished this great work, we have gone and prayed in this holy spot, and form works of supererogation and heroic deeds of self-denial and evangelical mortification.—Catholic Journal.

The Story About the Buried Fakir.

The following case occurred under the eye of Lieutenant A. Bolton, an officer, and is recorded in his "Narrative of a Journey in Hayaan in 1835": "We were told soon after our coming (to Jesulmer) that a man had been buried alive of his own free will, at the bank of the river close to our tents, and that he was to remain underground for a whole month before the process of exhumation should take place. Curiosity induced several people to go and see the spot, and I, among the number, also superintended his interment. The place in which he was buried is a small square of about seven feet in depth, with a yard and eight feet broad, built on the west edge of the bank of the river, and open to the east. In the floor of the house was a hole about three feet long, two and a half feet broad, and five or six feet in depth, or perhaps a yard deep, in which he was placed in a sitting position, covered up to his knees aforesaid, with his knees doubled up towards his chin, his feet turned inward toward his stomach, and his hands also pointed inward toward his chest. The coil or grave was filled with masonry and floored with large flat stones of wooden and clay, and the white ant and other insects might be kept off. Over this was built a cairn of boulders of stone, five or six feet long, several inches thick and broad enough to cover the whole of the grave, were also placed over him so that he could not escape; and finally a little earth was plastered over the hole so as to make the surface of the ground smooth and compact. The door of the house was then locked, the key was placed outside to mount guard during the whole month, so that no trick might be played or deception practiced.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—A four-story convent is being built on Van Buren street, Chicago.

—The Catholic negroes in Hayti have collected and forwarded to Europe 4 000 francs for the persecuted priests in Switzerland.

—Monseigneur Delcusy, Bishop of Viviers, in Ardeche (France), has just aspired at the venerable age of eighty-two, having occupied the episcopal chair for twenty years.

—We deeply regret to announce the death of Rev. William Anthony, C.C., of Clontarf, who passed away on Friday, May 26th, in the 52d year of his age and the eighth of his sacred ministry.

—The Rev. Thomas Barron, for many years curate in the parish of Clogher Head, near Drogheda, and but recently curate in Upper Killeavy, died on Friday, May 12th, at the residence of his sister, Castleblaney, Isaac.

—Sister Mary Louis Tighe died on the 14th ult., at the Presentation Convent, Galway. The deceased lady was over half a century connected with the Order, and had endeared herself to the entire sisterhood, by whom she is deeply and deservedly regretted.

—In the Convent of the Sisters of St. Mary, St. Louis, on Monday, 29th ult., the following ladies received the white veil of the Order: Josephine Shlochterhamer, Mary Danner, Anne Fishrin, Annie McCloed, Theresa Dockman and Bridget Hickey.

—On the 13th May Kate Delany, daughter of Mr. Denis Delany, of Athy (in religion, Sister Mary Bernard), died at the Presentation Convent, Clondalkin. This lady, young, amiable and accomplished, had not long embraced a religious life, and her earthly demise is sincerely mourned by her family and friends.

—The Cardinals held a meeting May 23d, in presence of the Pope, at which it was resolved on principle that relations with Spain ought not to be interrupted. The Nuncio at Madrid will receive indefinite leave of absence, leaving a councilor of the Nunciature to represent him in the Spanish capital. The Nuncio will, however, remain in Madrid for some time yet.

—The Japan Gazette astonishes the world by the declaration of the discovery of an ancient Catholic church in that country, which is used for other purposes, though still in perfect preservation. It is but one of the traces of that great St. Francis Xavier, whose works have not yet died out, and is now being increased.

—Sister Mary Francis Kelly, of the Convent of Mercy, Castlebar, second daughter of Charles Kelly, Esq., of Ramelton, county Donegal, and sister to Mrs. Kelly, the present Superioress of the Loretto Convent, Letterkenny, county Donegal, died on the 16th May, aged 29 years. She entered the convent the 15th April, 1862, and made her profession on the 26th July, 1864.

—The Holy Father has sent a valuable chalice to the Cathedral of Wiesbaden, who have been deprived of the one church they possessed. The Government has handed the church over to the "Old Catholics." The Rev. Hermann Hoeber, who related the above fact to the Holy Father, and was the interpreter of the sentiments of fidelity which animates the Wiesbaden Catholics, was the bearer of the Archbishop's gift.

—On Tuesday, May 23d, at the Ursuline Convent, Thurles, three young ladies were received into religion, and one made vows. Miss Organ (in religion, Sister Margaret Mary), is from Limerick; Miss Treacy (Sister Agnes), from Mountrath; Miss L. Hogan (Sister De Sales), from Dublin. Miss Organ was professed. The other sisters received, and all three were children of the school. The third reception was Miss Devitt (in religion, Sister Adelph), a lay sister, it is from the neighborhood of Borrisoleigh. The Archbishop officiated.

—The corner-stone of the new church of the Pontiel Fathers, in New York, was laid and blessed on the 14th inst., by Bishop Corrigan, of Newark. Cardinal McCloskey sent a letter regretting his inability to attend owing to pulmonary affection. The procession of societies was very large and was more remarkable from the enforced absence of the Ancient Order of Hibernians. The priests present, regular and secular, were numerous. General Rousseau, the ex-Governor, General Hamilton, and many others, were present.

—A Catholic priest named Father W. S. Maddock, from St. Marysville, Mo., was drowned in the Mississippi, a short distance below Keokuk, Iowa, on the 7th May, in crossing the river. Father Maddock, of Columbus, he started for Warsaw in a buggy. When near that place they drove into the river, the water the horse, but was too far and got beyond their depth. The animal made a few lunges and then went to the bottom, taking the buggy and Father Maddock with him. Father Goffney succeeded, with difficulty, in reaching the shore.

"Catholic America."

A Centennial address to the Catholics of the United States was delivered by the Rev. F. X. Weninger, D.D. (a missionary of the Society of Jesus), at a meeting of the delegates of the Roman Catholic Central Society at Philadelphia, on Monday, June 5th. After a few introductory remarks, Dr. Weninger, who spoke in German, said that no sooner was the extreme northern portion of America discovered and inhabited than the Mother Church turned her eyes upon it. The proofs of this are in the churches, and the episcopal see of Greenland. And for a considerable time after Columbus raised the cross upon the shores of the New World, all the Europeans who stepped upon American ground were Catholics. The name of the country, is that of a Catholic. "True," he continued, "is not the case with the other portions of the world, and in it would seem to be an augury that America is the part of the world in which a grand and most important future is destined for the Catholic Church, and this also the people whose Time in declining to its end. It is from America that the sun daily goes down toward the night of Time." Arguing that the course of the human race, civilization and religion has always been toward the West, he said:

"It was in the West that the Church first took permanent root, blossomed and brought forth fruit, until the cross beamed in triumph from the throne of the Roman empire. After this the history of Christianity becomes the history of Europe as well. And finally, the country which has most westerly, Ireland, is the land most deeply penetrated by the light and life of the holy faith. It forms, as it were, the last strong link of the chain, carrying the Gospel to the United States. Were the Church to succeed and the United States to become a Catholic country in the true sense of the term, then would this become a land in which, as in a mirror, the nations of Europe and the whole earth might see how happy, even in regard to temporal affairs, the Church can make a people when they, as children of one God and of one mother Church, live in brotherly love and harmony, regarding the events of human life in the light of faith, and always following the voice of their conscience and of the Church, as their teacher, to guard them and to lead them in the way of virtue. The American esteems the Catholic Church in his heart; he acknowledges her for one of her active elements and is curious to become acquainted with her doctrines. He esteems especially the clergy of the Catholic Church, and if he becomes a Catholic, he is generally a Catholic of sterling worth. I have had, as missionary, opportunities of becoming acquainted with this fact. If I am asked the reason why this is so, I answer: Because the qualities which make the American a loyal citizen of the United States will, when united with the religious element, be just those which characterize the Catholic as a true son of the Holy Church. Let the millions who call themselves Catholics in America really live a Catholic life, and the people of this country will soon open their eyes to the Catholic faith."

THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

We read in the latest accounts from Europe that an association is formed there under the name of "Apostolate of the Press," which the Holy Father has approved and heartily recommended. This is saying much in its favor, but not too much, when we consider the influence which, according to experience, the press exercises over the minds and notions of men, particularly in this century. Besides this Apostolate of the Press by means of books, there is also another, not less important, through the daily newspapers. How energetically in this regard do Protestants and enemies of the holy Church make use of the press in order to poison public opinion by their journals and libelous printed papers against the Catholic Church and her servants. Catholics ought to like manner to be provided with Catholic daily papers to further the welfare of the Church. This is the case here in Philadelphia, in New York and in St. Louis; but how little is all this compared with the efforts and labors of Protestants, of secret societies, and where are those only where there are so many Freemasons living together as there are Catholics in Philadelphia, and you will find that they have not one daily paper, but five or six, or even ten.

Were we, twenty, forty thousand Catholics reside in one city there should certainly be at least one leading Catholic daily paper, but unfortunately even in Cincinnati, with its one hundred thousand German Catholics, there is not one daily newspaper of a decidedly Catholic character! And even the papers of New York, Philadelphia and St. Louis, excellent papers as they are, find it difficult to keep up their publication. The front part of the Catholic population, throughout the whole extent of the United States, has no Catholic daily paper, none of the New Yorks! How can this be accounted for? Only by the words of Christ, when He said: "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." We Catholics do not like to see, should, for we support the publications of our enemies. This ought and must be changed.

Dr. Weninger thought the great obstacle to the efforts of the different kinds of lay-associates was the wide-spread belief that the Catholic Church is by nature opposed to the liberal institutions of America. On the contrary, he said, the Pope had declared, by giving his blessing to the country, that our institutions do not conflict with the principles and aims of the Catholic Church. The address was filled with suggestions to the best means of uniting the United States with the Catholic Church, and closed with the paragraph: "Catholic America! the short remark embraces the last century and the present, and the future. To the world shall not stay until that of the world itself shall come to an end, and Christ will maintain thy last memorial with the forever victorious Church, on the eve of Time, in the morning light of approaching eternity."

OBITUARIES READY.

G. W. Childs, A. M., the obituary proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, has stowed away in the pigeon holes of his desk the following singing ditties:

We prayed last week either's hand;
They won a deal and obliged us well
It is strange and foreign land;
But when the head of Britain wrath
This pair now overcame.
"Let's change the scene," Schenck called to Grant,
And straightway left the game.

The next of the singles verses, headed "Orville E. Babcock," reads like this:

By crooked whisky now confined,
By crooked wages bound,
He clasped well earned imprisonment
Only to lose his bond.
Gone where the liquor revels.

Then come a solemn variation upon the popular poem which appears four times a day in the columns of the Ledger, beginning, "Fold away those letters, mother." It bore over it the name "Belknap!"

Fold away those gorgeous dresses
That his wife was wont to wear!
Surrender up his tortured trade-pass,
Unbighten his accounting gear!
"What great regret" poor Belknap's gone
To ponder the war time years!
Gone to meet Schuyler Colfax.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The New York Sun—an independent newspaper with Democratic proclivities—wisely counsels the Democratic party not to beg the sweet delusion to its soul that the Republican Presidential nominees are easy men to beat. In its issue of the 18th inst. it says:

"Hayes is an honest man; he is a statesman; he is a man of high character and of ability. He is respectable in every relation of life, public and private; he is useless as a tool for party work, with a large following sufficient for practical purposes, and the qualities and training of the man are reasonably up to the level of safe presidentry. There is no occasion to deny him a fair character, and he belongs to the party through and through. We suppose he has never declined to vote for a Republican ticket since he was a split infant. There is nothing about him to repel the party voter. He is not a man to be left out in the cold by the party, or to be forced through it by party and probably something more. Whether he will be the same respectable man if elected is another question. In either more independent and more capable of rebelling against the party, or less so. We shall not undertake to say. We shall simply say that the Democrats cannot afford to fool with their opportunity. They must nominate their best man, or they are liable to be beaten."

Winslow, the clerical Boston forger, who was demanded by the United States under the extradition treaty, has been released by Great Britain, because this Government would not give assurance that he would be tried only for the offense for which he was demanded.

Secretary Bristow, finding that all his efforts for a proper administration of his office were thwarted by Grant and his ring, resigned his position in the Cabinet on Monday. Thus the Administration has lost the only officer which the public regarded as honest, but no doubt the Administration brothers fear therefor. The mere presence of an honest man is a rebuke to thieves.

Schreiber, who was appointed cashier of the Methodist Book Concern in New York in 1869, to succeed a defaulter, now turns out to be a defaulter himself. The amount missing is about $15,000. Schreiber has been locked up in Ludlow street jail.

The course being pursued by a few hot-headed anti-coolieites is calculated to do material injury to the cause they profess to advance. A few more outrages such as the following telegram from Truckee records will arouse a feeling of [illegible] and agents, $3 each; [illegible] statements we each make of their deleterious moral influence, etc., cannot successfully combat. If our people were to indulge in a single outrage even the slightest ruffianly assault on the Chinese who are here, and trust to reason and time to have the evil removed, or at least prevent its spreading:

TRUCKEE, June 15.—Last night a number of men, supposed to belong to the Truckee League, set fire to a Chinese boarding-house, and to three Chinamen, about as many others who were sleeping in the house. Two of them were fired upon by the mob, one being killed instantly and another severely wounded, but will probably recover. About forty shots are reported to have been fired.

A dispatch from Calcutta reports an alarming outbreak of cholera in Gulwood village, on the Bombay and Baroda Railway. Of 2200 inhabitants, 100 died in three days.

Anarchy seems to prevail in Louisiana. A New Orleans dispatch of Monday states that the latest from Port Hudson is to the effect that the whites were reinforced on Sunday by citizens and a militia company from Baton Rouge and other towns to the number of 200. There was a fight Sunday in which the negroes were routed, leaving eleven prisoners in the hands of the whites. Several were wounded on both sides. Subsequently the negroes rallied with fresh reinforcements, and when the courier left there it was thought certain there would be another sharp battle. In the first melee the whites captured the records of the proceedings of a negro Radical Club meeting held Saturday, wherein it was written that by a general resolution in all the negro clubs, Friday, June 23d, was fixed on as the day when the blacks should rise against the whites in the parish and open a general slaughter.

Among the twenty-four new Italian Senators recently created are two Jews—Isaac Artom and Julio Massarani—the first who have ever been raised to that honor in Italy, notwithstanding that Jews have sat in nearly all the Italian Parliaments, and eleven were returned at the last election.

The President has sent an extraordinary message to Congress urging it to hurry up its appropriation bills for the coming fiscal year. In this connection it is proper to state that the Senate has refused to concur in the reduced appropriations for the different departments fixed upon by the House, and in some instances has increased them two hundred per cent. The House wants the Indian Bureau transfered to the War Department, but the Senate still wants it to be under the control of the swindling Indian ring.

Notwithstanding the professions of peace which come to us through the semi-official press, the crowned heads of Europe are far from being at rest. They are all arming and concentrating their troops where they can do the most harm. A Berlin special reports that Austria has ordered the concentration of 150,000 regular troops, and 160,000 of the Landwehr in the eastern and southeastern provinces, for autumn drill. It is a little remarkable that this concentration "for the autumn drill" should be in the eastern and southeastern portions of the Empire. The Prince of Montenegro, too, has resigned as a representative of the insurgents in their negotiations with the Porte, and insists on the absolute independence of his principality. The atmosphere smells of gunpowder.

There are 8,129 newspapers of over, description printed in the United States, of which 238 are printed in California. This exceeds the combined issues of all the other nations of the earth.

New York Jews in—How. Philip A. Roach visited Hartford, Conn., last week. He addressed members of the Connecticut Legislature, and also a number of citizens that evening. Roach said he decided the last body recommending a modification of the Burlingame treaty, with a good prospect of their passage.

Mr. Roach has also been interviewed by several leading newspapers, and has actively enlisted some of them in the cause; among others The Union, the principal journal of Connecticut. In its issue of the 9th of June, now before us, contains an excellent article on the dangers of Chinese immigration, and advises the people of New England to unite with their brethren of the Pacific Coast in having a stop put to this rapidly-growing evil. This is the kind of appeal that produces results. Show the workingmen of the manufacturing districts of New England and the Middle States that they will have to submit to competition with servile labor to-morrow, as the artisans and laborers of the Pacific Coast do to-day, and the all-powerful impulse of self-preservation will cause them to make the abrogation of the Burlingame treaty the principal plank in their political platforms.

The Cardinal-Archbishop of Paris receives $12 000 per annum; the four Cardinal-Archbishops of Bordeaux, Rouen, Cambrai and Rennes, and the Archbishop of Algiers $6 000 each; the remaining Archbishops and Bishops $4 800 each; the Vicars-General $1 200 each; the Canons $1 000 each; the Curates $800 each; the Vicars $600 each; the Seminarists $400 each.

St. John's (Quebec) was visited by a severe conflagration on Sunday last. The entire business portion of the town, embracing a stretch of territory six hundred feet wide and a mile in length, was destroyed. Several banks, nine churches, the Custom House, Court House, Post Office, United States Consulate, two banks, docks, vessels in the river, portion of a bridge over Richelieu river, the St. Johns woolen mills, employing sixty hands, stone chinaware rooms, and two hundred and fifty stores and houses were reduced to ashes. Miss Lay, a milliner, in endeavoring to save her goods, was burned to death. Mrs. Lynch, a young man named Boulden, Joseph W. Thomas and Charles Arpant, were badly burned. Mayor Rossetter, whose house and tannery were destroyed, was severely burned. The total loss is variously estimated as high as $1,500,000. About two hundred families have been rendered homeless, most of them losing everything.

The Czar has cordially accepted the invitation for an interview with the Emperor of Austria, at the Castle of Reichstadt. The Czar will arrive at Reichstadt on the 24th and depart on the 26th. Count Andrassy is appointed to accompany the Emperor Francis Joseph on the occasion.

M. Buffet has been elected a member of the French Senate for life, which fact has greatly annoyed the Radicals, and has caused a dissension in the Ministry. President MacMahon backs the Conservative candidate, while a majority of his Ministers opposed him. The Senators belonging to the Right have published a statement declaring that they voted for Buffet as Catholics and Conservatives, not as Royalists. At the meeting of the Cabinet on Saturday the resignation of the Ministry was proposed, and immediately negatived. The Ministry, however, have resolved to reply to Buffet's election by exercising increased severity towards reactionary officials. The Ministry will, if necessary, make adoption of the University bill in the Senate, a Cabinet question. Further Prefectoral changes are announced affected seven Prefects, of whom four are dismissed. The deputies of the Left have held a meeting at which great dissatisfaction was expressed at these changes. It was agreed, in view of Buffet's election, to postpone consideration of the Municipal Organization bill, so as to set aside all cause of division between Government and the Republican majority, and give Government the absolute support of the party.

Pere Gerster, a monk, died recently at the monastery of Grande Chartreuse at Grenoble, France, in his seventy second year. It was he who discovered the celebrated liquor called Chartreuse, which is distilled by the monks from aromatic plants grown in the grounds of the monastery, and is said to produces a revenue of £85,000 a year. After the discovery many similar monastic concoctions were invented. The Benedictine, made by the Benedicts of Fecamp, and the Trappistine, fabricated by the Trappist Brothers; but none of these discoveries is in the shape of liqueurs injured the sale or the fame of the renowned Chartreuse—a decoction the secret of which was kept by Pere Garnier.

The New York Herald has a dispatch from Sydney, Nebraska, which says: "The Indians killed forty men on Thursday; fifteen at a point sixty miles south of this place. They belonged to Colorado. In round numbers, over 100 white men have been killed in this section within one week. The Indians belong to Cheyenne Agency, Indian Territory."

"Let us have (+) peace" is the cry of the anti-Piper Democrats in San Francisco. A convention of thirty-two "well known citizens," headed by Owen Thorn, will soon meet to nominate an opposition candidate.

BE CAREFUL WHAT YOU SAY.

In speaking of a person's faults
Pray don't forget your own!
Remember those with beams of glass
Should seldom throw a stone
If we have nothing one to do
But tell of those who sin,
The better we ourselves shall be,
And fresh that point begin.

We have no right to judge a man
Until we fairly view!
Should we not like to compass,
We know the world is wise,
Some may have faults—and who has not?—
The old as well as young!
Perhaps we may, for aught we know,
Have fifty to their one.

I'll tell you of a better plan,
And I like it works full well—
To try my own if I've to cure
Before of others tell!
And though I sometimes hope to be
Wiser than some I know,
My own shortcomings bid me let
The faults of others go.

Then let us all, when we commence
To slander friend or foe,
Think if the item we would say
To them we little know,
Remember curses sometimes, like
Our chickens, "come at home;"
Don't speak of others' faults until
You have none of your own.

Denny's face flushed. "He wouldn't go to confession unless I'd promise to keep the olle. Now, I knowed there was only one way I could keep 'em' without doin' wrong, as 'twas me to pay the man they was to make free. I hadn't the money, an'—an' I pawned the prayer-book my mother gave me on my first Communion day! It had a gold clasp with my father's name on it, an' it was give to him long ago by that there very gentleman," pointing to grandpa.

"Ooh! ooh!" said the widow.

"Now," said Denny, his voice quivering, and his lips twitching in spite of himself, "that there is the reason—one an' 'an' at least—of the book, an' I knowed she'd think it was gone for good. Besides, I didn't want Charley to be found out. But even if the book was gone, I thinks it saved the thing. He went to confession, an' 'cause that there question what I told him, an' the priest said it wasn't what he was in the sight av man that was to be looked to, but what he was in the sight of God!" The boy spoke with unconscious dignity of manner; "an' if he was condemned when he wasn't guilty, that only made him like our Lord when He was here, an' so, if he was to become guilty on account av that there, he throwed away the honor o' bein' like Him. He told him to keep right before God an' he'd be richer than all the gold av the world could make him, even if he had to sell papers all his life. Then he told him to come to see him, an' bring me; so I went, an' I let him know the whole story, so he's goin' to git the little feller in the Parish Orphan Asylum, where he'll be out of harm's way till he gits older. I paid the man for the sole, an' that there's the story av them! Now, why I wasn't on the cranin' route that there little brick," pointing to Eugene, "was all. But stop! the ring, I don't know a thing. I haven't a grane how it got in the old chest, but I didn't put it there." He paused upwards and then suddenly turned to the widow: "Was my mother ever engaged by it. Before Him I am innocent."

There were many moistening eyes in the crowded court-room, and the mon ner-broken silence followed this earnest plea. A few moments and a few seconds passed, called Eugene, and with a few questions drew from him the story of how the newsboy had defended him and condemned him privately home the very evening he was absent from his route, all of which is not necessary to be repeated here, as the reader already know it. I would like, however, to call attention to the significant fact that Denny's act of gratitude and bravery on that occasion saved him on this, for, as it was proved by Eugene's story, he was at the very hour of the robbery he was away from where it took place, there could remain no doubt as to his innocence of it; and Eugene's pride and joy that his testimony had brought about this result is impossible to be described here. As for quiet little Bridget, she sat with soft tears dropping down upon her dress—tears that had joy and pra er alike in their silent procession.

But now arose the question from the court. "Had Denny received the stolen money, if not, how had the ring come into his possession?"

He—the ignorant newsboy—simply stood there in his confidence, even grandpa, by asking in a loud and assured voice:

"If I was such a cute one as to stay away from his prayers, just to resolve 'em easier, do you think I'd be such a reg'lar fool as to pay av' 'em in that there old shop, an' then give it to the here little feller, where it 'ud be sure to be found out sometime? An' what 'ud be the use o' talkin' the ring at all if I was to get convicted for it?"

"Ably said, good grandpa."

"Decidedly so," said the judge; "the boy has a logical mind."

"Can you have he argues from conclusions. Will you accept the plea?" asked grandpa.

"Certainly," was the answer, "so far as it goes, but the presence of the ring must be accounted for."

Eugene stood up: "I was there," said the little fellow boldly, "when he found the olle, and I know he didn't put anything in till he put in the mouse and a few rags for its bed."

"How do you know, Eugene?" asked grandpa.

"Because, sir," said the eager boy, "he found it away in a corner, under some rags and rubbish, and he'd climbed over a big pile of things to get at it. As he drew it out, and he didn't keep it in his hand a minute, but threw it right to me, because he needed his hands to get down. I picked it up, and carried it, and held it while he put the mouse and the rags in, so I know he hadn't a chance to put the ring in."

"Arrah! God bless the crechure! His own father all out this minit!" cried the delighted voice of Denny's mother.

"And the making of another fine lawyer, sir," said one of the gentlemen, now listening with unconcealed interest, in grandpa's behalf. Him all up with pride, but he said, "I'll agree with you, sir, if he answers the following questions satisfactorily." He turned to Eugene. "How do you know," he asked, "that Dennis did not put the ring into the olive before he brought it out from under the pile of rubbish; did not hide it there in fact, and then take it out, as if he knew nothing of it, just because he grew afraid to keep it any longer, and thought that would be a good way of getting rid of it?"

Eugene thought a moment—Dennis fixed his eyes upon him eagerly; the mother leaned forward in an agony of suspense; little Bridget held her breath and grew pale as death itself; every one in deep silence awaited the answer which was to tell so much, and which it was so hard for a little boy of that age to know how to give. Suddenly his face lit.

"I know he didn't," said he in low decided tones, speaking more to himself than any one else.

"But how?" asked the judge.

"Because, sir, when we went into the kit where the pile of rubbish was, we were looking for a box; and it was I that told Denny there might be one there, and if he had slid the old shoe there, he'd have known there was no box under it, and needn't have gone to look. But he went to look with great trouble of climbing, and found the old shoe, and do you think he'd have run the risk of throwing it to me, and letting it fall out, if he knew the ring was there?"

"Pretty well argued," said the judge. But no one heard him, for a shout of applause rose up for the little pleader, and he stood blushing and frightened, not knowing what it meant. So grandpa whispered to him that they were praising him for his ready argument, and his face grew radiant in a moment. He turned it in the people smiling, and bowed it like a little prince. Whereupon everybody was so delighted, that the judge had to call the court to order."

"Well said grandpa—"I happen to have proof of all these boys have said. I went into the pawnbroker's to ascertain the truth about the prayer-book, and also overheard a conversation between two of the real thieves, one of whom had hidden the ring, supposing no one would ever think of going for it, and afraid to keep it in any house. He turned it in the people smiling, and bowed it like a little prince. Whereupon everybody was so delighted, that the judge had to call the court to order."

"Release the prisoner," said the judge.

"Release the prisoner," said the judge. Dennis' hand warmly, kept it in his own, and led him to that mother. But she had fainted, and the strong arms that caught her up and carried her to the air. Then others cried, "Let us carry those two little heroes!"

So they raised Denny and Eugene on their shoulders, and shouting and hurrahing, bore them out of the room.

A Workman Sixty Years Old Suddenly Cured.

The Abbé Coux, curate of St. Alain, at Lavaur (diocese of Albi), sent to the Father Superior of the missionaries of Lourdes the following account, which he specially recommends to free-thinkers:

LAVAUR, September 20, 1871.

REVEREND FATHER—The supernatural abounds on all sides in our deluded age; here we have a manifest proof of it. Francois Mesery is a joiner at Lavaur, and for the larger half of his sixty years, he has been addicted to dogskin gaiters. Francois, often obliged to give up work, deceived, as he himself tells us, on account of his frequent and long cessation of labor, and also because he had a large family, called Eugene, and with a few questions drew from him the story of how the newsboy had defended him and condemned him privately home the very evening he was absent from his route, all of which is not necessary to be repeated here, as the reader already know it. CATHOLIC UNITY.

The religious question—that is, the relations of the Catholic Church to civil society—is the foremost question of the day. It sets into almost every political question, and it underlies all the controversies that agitate the human mind and divide political society.

Europe is gradually being divided into two distinct and antagonistic parties—into those who are obedient in thought and action to the Catholic Church, together with such as, though unhappily separated from Catholic unity, hold to the principle of Christian faith; and those who reject altogether dogmatic truth and revealed religion.

The two opposing hosts are very nearly matched, though their weapons of offense and defense are very dissimilar to character.

The Church puts its trust in God and relies on moral power, on the convictions of the heart, on the intelligence of the mind divinely illumined by faith. The enemies of the Church, the anti-Christian state and civil society, so far as it has rejected divine truth, appeal to physical force, to compulsory laws, to proscription to persecution. The day has gone by when the infidel and the rationalist, with arrogant boast or flippant sneer, claimed to rely for victory over the Church on intellectual superiority, and on the effect of keen judgment and diffusive among the masses. The Church, far from shunning such a trial of strength, took the lead in setting aside as arm over arm, and encouraged tightly grasping the mane of the other, as he has long between them while they galloped neck to neck wildly than ever. I expected to see a dozen frog men spring to his rescue, but none stirred—only the man with the long whip as amid the breathless silence of the crowd the little boy vainly tried to regain his own hand, he turned his face to me with a warning whip snap, and his shrill, childish voice was transformed with terror. At last one foot slipped, and he fell partly down between the ponies, but saved himself by throwing his arm over the neck of one and tightly grasping the mane of the other, as he hung between them while they galloped more

ANOTHER APPEAL.

Quite a large number—indeed, a majority—of our interior subscribers are in arrears for two years, some even longer. The amount each one owes is trifling, but aggregates a sum running up into the thousands. We feel as a matter of justice to ourselves. The person who contracts a debt with a newspaper in as much bound to pay it as though he contracted it with a stickler or grocer. The newspaper deals, however, on a cash basis, and we assert that it hardly pays to send an agent out collecting, costing, as it does, from twenty-five to fifty per cent, and in many instances going miles out of his way to collect a few dollars, only to be told when he reaches there, "I'm so sorry; I should've have let the run on my book, but it was so small. I haven't a cent in the house to-day, however, but will send it to you next week." Of course the collector has to ride his chagrin and no "next week" ever arrives. We tend it as a necessity now, the person who contracts a debt with a newspaper is

SILENCE.

Silence! That's the word for most
Words in concert wrong or wor[se];
Silently grow fast words and deeds,
Utter God loves in marks or measure,
Speak no more to hinder hate,
Life as more the voice if Scripture
Whom the man who knows best is hating
Silence! You've no brains and hand;
Hands were vain to play the slayer,
Who are hurled and herding the hate
Spoils the nation's plenous prayer,
Yet do God not uttered eye of blind,
Though your prayer ascended passages!
Keep your lips and ears and grim,
And we pray to him no longer.

All that sinful speech that God
Instituted on with about the nations,
Hung Rome on city of Babylon!
Laughed on Sodom and Gomorrah!
Pours the Nineveh and Jerusalem!
Pray for mercy to our musicians—
Who in eye cannot look mercy,
Will in slaves descended faster.

Silence! For the holy Awe!
Think and those are words are lying!
Yet them not with noisy tread,
Yet them not with hollow saying!
Rather, silent why is of God,
Think about what Pharisees them—
Starved and spurned from day to day,
Not even their manifold words to be found.

Silence! For the land we love,
Who, our leader, fair and lonely—
Feels they were, her sons that prove
Signs for signal home in need here!
For dead who live, upon her face
Stones of woe, like stones the number,
Hence, some of all her race,
Hearts that to her sacred slumber.

God will come in God's good day
To fill us from our sins and pollution—
To breathing and to dust our country's clay
The immortal breath of resurrection.
Hope is not dead, but sleeps,
His body one, who will not abandon!
His wounds bender her soul to weeps,
Her tears for soon upon His wounds!

Silence! Let the Lord alone!
We can wait as He is waiting.
Eye of mercy and calm of eternity!
While still His heart is beating,
While still His hand is held down the deep,
Shut silence! Let us wait and watch and keep
When the judgment-hour strikes asunder!

Let earth's clamour in its place,
While war's fierce tongue angry war it;
The best has redeemed our race to bless,
The tongue that lead is dumb before it.
Peace will of those we unseen the land
Were quiet to see what these betokens,
Not—for's life is of infinity's hand—
We wait to see the silence broken.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE "COURSES OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT."

(From the Dublin Freeman's Journal, May 26.)

We have been supplied by Messrs. Strahan with an early copy of the Contemporary Review for June, which will contain Mr. Gladstone's article on "The Courses of Religious Thought." The distinguished writer begins:

"I have been told in my title, and in order to avoid all confusion, that I speak only of what I cannot do more than most humanly perform. My paper is to propose for the day, or for a time when the interest in religious thought, or in thought commonly so called, is diffused over an area unusually wide, but also when the aspect of each thought is singularly multiform and complicated. It is due to this condition to a reality, and recalls the Grecian sentence of Cleobulus, 'Of all things measure is best,' to indicate in a rude manner what seems to be the leading principles of each of the categories, as well as in a matter of this kind the effort can hardly be well considered without some attempt to look into the future paper briefly to touch the question, how and why the burning questions of human thought and life—those persons are provided with the Roman Church by no means worse than they would be under other Christian systems. They swell the mass of the misery, obey the world of sentiment when it reaches them, and they help to supply the resources by which a vast machinery is kept in motion.

"(2) Next in order to the Ultramontane school comes a school which may properly be designated as Liberal, because without holding that all which has been has been right, it regards the general assent of Christendom honestly examined and sufficiently ascertained as a leading auxiliary to the individual reason in the search for religious truth. To this belong those 'liberal Catholics,' who, while they remain external to the Latin communion, bravely and generously hoping against hope for the reunion which must ensure to them a highly uncomfortable existence. Their position appears to be economically identical with that of a portion of the Protestants of the sixteenth century, who in perfectly good faith believed that they were maintaining the true system of Christianity as attested by Scripture and sacred history, but who had to uphold this at their own convictions in the teeth of the constituted tribunals of the Latin Church. The appeal now made, indeed, is from the Council of the Vatican to the Council infinitely good and true, but the right of appeal is denied by the living authority, and appears therefore, as in the case of Luther, to give a final utterance on the dogma of infallibility, to rest on the ultimate grounds of private judgment.

"(3) Next, then, rejecting the Papal monarchy, believe in the visibility of the Church or the Historical school.

"(4) Those who, rejecting the Papal monarchy and the visibility of the Church, believe in the great general dogmas of the Christian system, the Trinity and the Incarnation. These will be here termed the Protestant Evangelical school.

"(4 Those who, professedly rejecting all known expressions of dogma, are, nevertheless, believers in a moral Governor of the Universe, and in a state of probation for mankind, whether consciously or not adhering to the belief any of the particulars of the Christian system, either doctrinal or moral. This is the school of Gamaliel, and of Socrates.

"(5 The Negative school. Negative—that is to say, as to thought which can be called religious in the most natural sense. Under this term I am obliged to place a number of schemes of which the adherents may resent the collocation. They are so placed on the ground that they agree in denying categorically, or else in declining to recognise or affirm the reality of a moral Governor or Providence, and the existence of a state of discipline or probation. To this aggregate have to belong: 1—Shamanism. 2—Atheism. 3—Agnosticism. 4—Secularism. 5—(Revived) Paganism. 6—Materialism. 7—Naturalism. 8—Positivism.

"(1. Of these five main divisions, the first is more below any of the others in moral extension. Its ostensible numbers may nearly equal those of the second and the third taken together. The fourth and fifth are made up of votaries who are untutored (as nature), or else cured in seclusion, or who, if they exist in communities at all, exist only in such minute associations as to be hook-specks in the geological prospect.

"The Ultramontane system has also the greatest advantage for working purposes of by far the most cosmic, the most closely knit and the most highly centralised organisation.

"Again, it derives its origin by an unbroken succession from Christ and His Apostles. No more imposing title can well be conceived, yet it naturally has no occurrence. Though with one foot we cannot believe that a Theotic system given by the Almighty to our first progenitors, and in the closest times, and in like manner, throughout her more fundamental truths formed, yet

"It was by a series of inexorable decisions, and to meet the shock of any one revolutionary change, that after a long interval of ages, after a pure beginning, there were built up many forms of religion, which at periods of their advance had come to be in the main both real and false.

"To the enemy of an unbroken continuity, to the enemy of an immense mass, to the sorcery of a closely worked organism, the system now called Papalism or Ultramontanism can offer a more ingenious source of strength. It undeniably commands within itself a large portion of the individual religious life of Christendom. The faith, the hope, the charity, which it sets in the office of the Gospel to engender, flourished within their province in the American Continent in millions who feel little and know less of its extreme claims and of their constantly progressive development. Many beautiful and many noble characters grow up within it. Moreover, the before and meetings of the Gospel, the poor, the weak, the uninstructed, the simple souls who in tranquil spheres give the heart and will to God, and whom should pass be not searched by the

A Great and Wicked Nation.

There can be little doubt that the secondary of evil and immortality in communal life is periodical. Modern nations have had their epochs of prevailing wickedness. It was too much to expect that our nation should escape this danger. The evil has been in the authority and consent of the earlier Christian writers, and in her the advantages of her visible unity, maintained incorporated in the authentic documents and historical traditions of large communities, among great limbs of Christendom, the marks of weakness are that its adherents are accustomed to look upon it as one of the from the largest portion of the Christian world, and that it acknowledges no limitation to its authority, so to speak, lay its finger on any manner whereby that authority can at any given moment be fully and finally exercised."

The third of the great powers on the map of religious thought he sets down as "considerably all who, rejecting the Papal supremacy, the doctrine of a visible Church and the authority of Scripture, and in a less and lesser one," and in these terms he contained the very heart of the great Christian tradition, even if that heart be not accustomed to the wall and manner of a dogmatic and ecclesiastical system such as has maintained in popular Catholic and Anglo-Churches. It has recently suffered very severely from the assaults on the corpus of Scripture, which have been made by a spirit of a self-attested volume, and on its verbal inspiration, which has been offered in connection with the theory of development, and of the Christian system, either doctrinal or moral, by Coleridge and Gamaliel, and the school.

"5 The Negative school. Negative—that is to say, as to thought which can be called religious in the most natural sense. Under this term I am obliged to place a number of schemes of which the adherents may resent the collocation. Diplomatic Wrestling.

Mr. Disraeli overreached the Duke Decazes in Egypt; he has now tripped up General Ignatieff in Turkey. The French Minister, in turn, threw the crafty "descendant of the important chief." It remains to be seen whether he will receive another fall from the Russian Minister. The Grosvenor Square Machiavelli is evidently playing for more; the days of Metternich's ascendancy are not forgotten by the Russian Chancellor, and to a great extent conflicting forces, sensible that it may wear to a close, are playing for power in the classic times, and in like manner, throughout far more fundamental transformations.

"(2 Next in order to the Ultramontane school comes a school which may properly be designated as Liberal, because without holding that all which has been has been right, it regards the general assent of Christendom honestly examined and sufficiently ascertained as a leading auxiliary to the individual reason in the search for religious truth. Remarking that in its essential outline this is the system which constituted the Catholic base of the Greek and Orthodox Churches, Mr. Gladstone says that "in strength it is to be found in upon dependency on the authority and consent of the earlier Christian writers, and in her the advantages of her visible unity, maintained incorporated in the authentic documents and historical traditions of large communities, among great limbs of Christendom, the marks of weakness are that its adherents are accustomed to look upon it as one of the from the largest portion of the Christian world, and that it acknowledges no limitation to its authority, so to speak, lay its finger on any manner whereby that authority can at any given moment be fully and finally exercised."

Helias Ministers Under Police Surveillance.

Government by espionage is especially abhorred. It would certainly be impossible to imagine Mr. Disraeli employing police agents to find out the secret peculiarities of his political opponents. But what cannot even be supposed practicable in England has been actually put in practice in Italy by the Government in which for Augustus Pagat and the English Minister gave their support and admiration. The administration of Signor Lanza, when that gentleman was Minister of the Interior, employed the police to ascertain the antecedents of certain members of the Chamber of Deputies who belonged to the Democratic section, and accordingly the police furnished biographical notices of the suspected individuals. These biographical notices were not altogether of a compliment ary description. On the contrary, they were such as to reflect gravely upon the characters of the honorable members, and would if published have caused immense scandal. They were not published, but were retained in the archives of the Home Office, and at last the turn of events has brought the power hands of the very men whose private and public conduct was once submitted to the scrutiny of the police. The discovery of these documents has created a sensation. Some persons demand the publication of these scandalous state papers. The Democratic Review journals, the present Home Minister, who himself was one of the persons affected by the police reports, objects to the production of documents which he and his friends term religious and private inference (false).

On Saturday, the 15 h of May, the Deputies assembled in their Chamber, and in the Home Minister, "concerning the discovery of documents appertaining to his department of the police upon members of Parliament." Baron Nocera requested Signor Cantelli to answer his question, in the ground that the documents were not, properly speaking, State papers, but should be considered as private, evidenced by resolutions of State Legislatures and petitions numerously signed and addressed to the Congress, in favor of a large and respectable portion of the people of the United States. He should be specially heard: Therefore, the President of the United States is requested to take such steps as to his judgment may seem advisable for the cession or release of the said Edward O'Meagher Condon from imprisonment."

Now we are in a position to publish in this section the President will put the case to the British Government for this man's release. There is a stronger ground—a much stronger ground—than that the Irish people are solely one of five persons found guilty and sentenced to death on a joint verdict. Of the five, four were Irish and one was an Englishman, Allen, Larkin and O'Brien, Condon's counsel addressed the jury in mitigation of his life, and in one case the joint verdict was so vitiated that public opinion in England and in Ireland declared that the case of the condemned altogether without pardon would be a judicial murder.

We might fairly ask, if justice were not deaf as well as blind in England in these days of political passion, why Condon was not released on the same principle that Executive in England dare to face the comments of the world and hang three men on a joint verdict, when they know one to be wrong, so hideously unjust, that it set a whole nation in a blaze? Why was Condon condemned to an equal fate with those men, Allen, Larkin and O'Brien, who were hung and who died like heroes, while he keeps in jail for life? Was there ever anything so monstrous? The verdict good to hang three men and to keep a fourth in jail for life, we had to do with a jury packed and terrified with them on the same evidence, condemned with them on the same testimony, and to be hanged by the neck until he was dead. How could that verdict be good at all in three cases and bad at all in the fourth, and is living to-day? Can this be reconciled in any way with justice, or even, to reason, to right? A vitiated verdict in one case where the trial was joint and not separate, is a vitiated and bad verdict in all. Five men cannot be found guilty of a conspiracy by a joint conviction and on joint evidence and one men declared innocent, and in his case the verdict declared to be bad. It is terrible to think of it unsound.

Looking at it from a juridical point of view, the hanging of three men on such a verdict impugned by the act of the Crown of England itself, was a judicial murder, and the continued imprisonment of Condon is a judicial injustice. If we are not mistaken the late Archbishop of Cashel, Cincinnati and the unmarried sod departed Archbishop Spalding first drew up this case in favor of Edward O'M. Condon, this was the light in which it was represented over their names in a memorial to President Grant, in the true light in which to but it, for it is the most forcible, and we trust it is the light in which it will be put by the President when he runs for the English Government.—Central Catholic.

One of these very unusual circumstances was witnessed in this town, reports the Virginia Chronicle, one day during the week, and has caused no little amount of conversation and surprise. A lady who had been suffering for some days in bed, and was supposed to breathe her last every moment, was being watched by a number of kind friends and some members of her family. On Tuesday morning she seemed to grow very feeble, and between seven and eight o'clock breathed her last. She was to her full extent, and gave a sigh. It was generally thought she was dead, and the woman who was to lay her out was sent for. In the meantime an attempt was made to raise the rings off her fingers, which was done at a request made by herself on a previous occasion. Some trouble was experienced in removing one of the rings, and the second one could not be got over the knuckle joint. During all this time there was not the slightest sign of breathing nor pulsation; in fact one of the nurses present, who has had many years' experience, had no doubt about her being dead. After a further lapse of time the poor woman opened her eyes, her limbs still remaining motionless. She gave a scream and fainted in a strong distinctive tone of voice. She then said that she had been to heaven, and had seen many departed friends, for which Germany is celebrated, who had told her that earth was ordained for people to remain on for a short time only. She had seen the Lord, who was arrayed in splendor, and had also seen a number of persons whom she had met on earth. The description given by her was certainly a most extraordinary one, and she seemed in wish her time would come, so that she might return to the place where she thought she Passed the Senate.

By an unanimous vote of the United States Senate the joint resolution for the release of Edward O'Meagher Condon has passed. The bill recites the following statement

Whereas, Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States, has been for some years past a prisoner in Clonmel under the sentence of a British Court; and, whereas, by express and unanimous desire, evidenced by resolutions of State Legislatures and petitions numerously signed and addressed to the Congress, in favor of a large and respectable portion of the people of the United States, he has already been released: Therefore, the President of the United States is requested to take such steps as to his judgment may seem advisable for the cession or release of the said Edward O'Meagher Condon from imprisonment."

CARLOW.

From the returns laid before the Board of Guardians of Carlow Union it appears that there are at present 326 inmates in the house, or 14 less than at the same period last year, there being six patients in the Carlow, one in the Rosenaskeen, and three in the Tullow fever hospitals.

CLARE.

The Clare "Journal" records a very noble act of landlord generosity. The district of Bally vaughan being very badly off for pure water, the late Lord Annaly, on the recommendation of Mr. W. Lane Joyce, at a cost of £3,000, brought a plentiful supply of pure spring water to the town.

On Sunday evening the spectacle presented in the parochial church of Ennis was never before witnessed by the inhabitants of the capital of the famous historic county of Clare. The Fathers of the Order of Oblates from Inchicore had been giving a mission for the previous three weeks. On Sunday evening the sacred exercises of the mission were brought to a termination in a brilliant and impressive manner, such as cannot fade from the memory of those who had the privilege and good fortune of being among the congregation on the auspicious occasion. At least four thousand persons participated in the feast of the mission, and had now come to take part in the final scene of the retreat.

CORK.

At the Cork Police Court on Saturday the Mayor and Mr. MacLeod, R. M., exchanged congratulations over the peaceful manner in which the election has passed off. The chief magistrate complimented the R. M. upon the tact and discretion with which the arrangements for the preservation of the peace were carried out, and Mr. MacLeod bore testimony to the good and orderly disposition exhibited by the people throughout the contest, expressing that he believed Cork during the excited period through which it had passed would bear a favorable contrast with any city in the United Kingdom.

The Caswell inquiry at Queenstown concluded with the inquest on the fireman Christian Jacobsen, being committed for trial at the assizes on the charge of murder.

DONEGAL.

The Londonderry "Sentinel" says that on Monday sixty-four fishing smacks anchored between Torry Island and Horn Head on the Donegal coast. A company has been formed in Scotland for the purpose of finding herrings of the same description as those found on Monday sixty-four fishing smacks arrived from Scotland, and these vessels had been sent for that purpose as an experiment. The fleet was accompanied by two steamers, which will take the fish direct to Liverpool.

DOWN.

The death is announced of the Very Rev. Peter Mackey, P. P., of Longstone-land, and V. F. of the diocese of Dromore. For twenty-six years he presided over the parish of Loughbrickland, where his zealous and useful ministrations will be long remembered.

Rosrevor is to have an abundant water supply, a splendid promenade along the shore of Carlingford Lough, and a tramway connecting it with the railway at Warrenpoint. The bill authorizing these works has just been read a third time, and passed.

On Friday week the sad intelligence reached Downpatrick that the Misses Parsons, Ivy, agent for Colonel Forde, ex-M. P. for the county Down, had committed suicide at his residence in Seaforde by shooting himself through the head with a revolver. It is a curious fact, says the Belfast Examiner, that within the last ten years or so the village of Seaforde has been the scene of several sudden deaths and shocking tragedies. Mr. King, the predecessor of the deceased as agent of the estate, was found dead in his bed. The rector, the Rev. Mr. Cummins, died very suddenly. About three years ago, in the planting belt that the deceased's house, Gallagher, the bailiff, of the estate was murdered by Mc-Gregory, to whom he was afterwards hanged in Downpatrick jail for the crime; and now the unfortunate Mr. Parsons adds another to the suicidal list. The deceased was married some years ago to the widow of the late Rev. Mr. Medlicott, Presbyterian clergyman, having been a widower himself at the time having been a widower himself at the time of his second marriage. It is a curious fact that Rev. Mr. Medlicott was also found dead in his bed.

GALWAY.

The meeting of the Glennamaddy Board of Guardians was adjourned on Tuesday week as a tribute of respect to the memory of Michael Reilly, Esq., J. P., who for years was a constant attendant at the deliberations of that body. No petty sessions were held in Castletown on Wednesday week for the same reason.

A meeting was held in Shadoonbridge a few days since to consider the land question, at which there were at least 2,000 persons present. Father O'Reilly, P. P., took the chair on the motion of Michael Reddy, Esq. The present land laws were condemned, and the farmers were urged to join the Ballinasloe Tenants' Defence Association.

KILKENNY.

The ceremony of investing four postulants with the habits of the Capuchin Order took place a few days since in the chapel of the convent and novitiate, Walkstar street, Kilkenny. The postulants were Mr. W. Neary, Mr. W. Flanagan, Mr. W. McEvoy and Mr. Daniel Reardon, who will be known for the future in religion as Brothers Antoine, Rosaventure, John and Leo. At the appointed period of the Mass Very Father Gerardin addressed the congregation and the postulants, and in doing so alluded with pathetic effect to the death of Father Dillon, the example of whose virtues he held up for emulation to the other.

Whilst several prisoners were at exercise on Thursday week in one of the yards of Kilkenny jail a regular emeute took place. The prisoners were in charge of warders named Butler and Tobin, who were superintending their drill, when they suddenly, and as if preconcerted, attacked the officers, whom they knocked down and kicked with great violence. The alarm having reached the other officers, they rescued with difficulty the two assaulted men, but not until Butler had sustained such injuries that he now lies in a very precarious state.

Died, at his residence, Kilkyran county Kilkenny on Tuesday, 23d May, fortified by the rites of Holy Church, Mr. Kyran Marum, aged 57 years. The deceased was sincerely and deservedly regretted, as he was a good neighbor, as well as as a kind father and friend. His remains were interred on Thursday, and the large concourse of people who swelled the ranks to the grave testified to the estimation in which he was held by all.—R. I. P.

LIMERICK.

At a large meeting of the Guardians of the Limerick Union last week a motion for a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill was carried by a great majority. The Chairman, Mr. Fitzgibbon, whilst entering into the merits of the bill, objected to the subject being entertained at all, on the ground that it was one of a political character and foreign to the duties of the Board. In this view he was supported by Lord Clarina, who further intimated that he considered the bill a measure of confiscation. Twenty-one guardians were for discussing the question and nine against.

The Most Rev. Dr. Butler, Bishop of Limerick, held his usual visitation in Kilmallock last week. A vast concourse of people assembled from that as well as from some of the adjoining parishes. A sermon was preached in the parish church by the Rev. W. Dowses, C. C., Ballingarry. A new church is shortly to be erected on a site kindly granted by Mr. R. Brooke Bresier, landlord of Kilmallock. It is intended to build a church worthy of such a venerable seat of sanctity as Kilmallock.

The corner-stone of the church about to be erected by the Franciscan Fathers in Limerick was laid on Sunday. The ceremony was conducted with befitting pomp. The Right Rev. Dr. Butler, Bishop of the diocese, presided at the High Mass, and the sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Dr. Conroy, Bishop of Ardagh. The Mayor and the Catholic members of the Town Council and other officials attended by the civic officials with the mace and insignia of the corporation, were present during the ceremonies.

LOUTH

At a council meeting of the Dundalk Catholic Young Men's Society, held on the 23d ult., a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Matthew White, of Dundalk, for his kindness in presenting for the ornamentation of the rooms a beautiful portrait of Robert Emmet in a handsome frame.

MAYO.

At the Castlebar presentment sessions last week the Chairman said they would adopt the following resolution: "That they were unanimous in saying that it would be highly desirable to construct a line of railway in Ballinrobe, and that they were in favor of granting a guarantee."

Mr. Thomas Tighe, J. P., has made a present to Canon Geoffrey Bourke of a handsomely ornamented outfit of gates for the Ballindine church grounds.

QUEEN'S COUNTY.

At the weekly meeting of the Board of Guardians of Mountmellick Union, on Saturday, there was an unusually large number of members present. At the commencement of the meeting, Mr. W. H. Cobbe occupied the chair, and nothing unusual occurred until after the arrival of Col. Carden, the elected chairman of the Board. On his entry he asked Mr. Cobbe to vacate the seat, but he (Mr. Cobbe) positively refused to do, stating that as on the last day of meeting Colonel Carden had refused to receive a deputation from a member of that Board in reference to Mr. Butt's Land bill, he would now occupy the chair, in order that every member should have a full opportunity to discuss matters which they considered of importance. Some heated and recriminative following, which for fierceness of excitement and recrimination following this declaration. Mr. Cobbe, however, at the solicitation of Mr. Warburton, at last consented to vacate the chair, and Colonel Carden having taken it, the business proceeded.

ROSCOMMON.

At a meeting of the Roscommon Board of Guardians on Saturday, the chairman, Mr. Smyth, refused, contrary to custom, to sign the petition adopted at the previous meeting in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill, whereupon Mr. Keelan moved the adjournment of the Board which was seconded by Mr. F. McDonnell, and which the chairman refused to put to the meeting. Upon this the greater number of the elected Guardians left the room. A lengthened and highly characteristic letter from Colonel Chichester was read.

SLIGO.

A mill hand, named Charles Delaney, went to clear a corn spout that got choked in one of the rooms of Messrs. Middleton & Pollexfen's flour mills, Ballisdare, when his jacket got caught in one of the pins attached to the spout, and when it was put in motion at a rapid rate. He was drawn with terrific velocity round and round the revolving shaft, and being smashed against the obstacles all around.

TIPPERARY.

In Thurles, on Sunday evening, was formed a society known as the Confraternity of the Holy Family. The association has for its spiritual director and head its zealous promoter, Rev. James Cantwell, The Archbishop, Most Rev. Dr. Croke, took occasion to recommend the good association to his parishioners. More than 200 persons were taken down as members of the chorush, and it was hoped 1,000 would be enrolled during the week.

His numerous friends in Nenagh will rejoice to hear that a once general favorite among them has just paid the debt of nature in the person of Dr. Denis Treacy. He was highly intelligent, had read and remembered much, was witty, eccentric, full of anecdote, and for nearly fifty years ago he balled on "The Brunswickers of the Commodes" was the most popular public official of the period, and one of the most successful in the dalliance of the men who were at that period engaged in the work of opposing Catholic Emancipation.

The English Agent, Sir Patten Smith Bryde, over the Tipperary, Cork, and Waterford estates of an English proprietor named Buckley, who (the agent) was shot at and wounded on the same road near his residence, Gaiten Castle, has commenced criminal proceedings in the Queen's Bench against a person named John Sarsfield Casey, for alleged libels published in newspapers in Dublin and Cork, making charges of injustice and tyranny against Bryde in his management of the estate. Casey, who resides in Mitchelstown, county Cork, has undergone imprisonment for Fenianism, and is a newspaper correspondent. He admits that he is the author of the letter in question, and its purpose, when the time comes, his answer will be that the statements in them are true.

TYRONE.

The death is announced of Mr. Denis Bannigan, a resident of Strabane, county Tyrone. Deceased was well known as one of the oldest cross-Channel traders in the neighborhood, having been trading to and from Greenock, Glasgow and Liverpool for the last sixty years.

WATERFORD.

A tailor of the bark Otway, of Whitehaven, was committed for trial last week by the magistrates at Waterford, on a charge of violently assaulting the captain for refusing to pay him his wages on his return, in a drunken state, after a temporary desertion of the vessel. The captain makes the extraordinary statement that the rest of the crew declined to render him any assistance when called upon.

At the meeting of the Dungarvin Board of Guardians, on Thursday week, on the motion of Mr. Pat Curren, seconded by Mr. M. A. Anthony, a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill was carried unanimously.

WESTMEATH.

Mr. Henry McCann Judge, charged with having fired at and wounded his tenant, Mr. Samuel Belton, has been committed for trial, being admitted to bail.

WEXFORD.

At the last meeting of the Enniscorthy Board of Guardians the following order was unanimously made: "We have heard with great regret of the resignation of the Roman Catholic chaplain of this house, the Rev. J. L. Furlong; and gladly avail ourselves of this opportunity of recording our high opinion of his careful attention to the inmates of the house and gentlemanly bearing during the ten years he was Roman Catholic chaplain."

Saturday last, says the Wexford People, the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of Very Rev. Canon Hooker, P. P., V. F., Wexford, was appropriately celebrated in St. Peter's College and in the Convent Schools, all rejoicing at having an opportunity of celebrating the jubilee of their beloved pastor's admission to membership of the sacred ministry. Father Hooker, who was deeply affected by these expressions of affection, replied to them extemporaneously in such a manner as to show how fully he reciprocated the kind feelings which prompted them. Incidentally he mentioned that he had the great happiness of having celebrated over nineteen thousand Masses since his ordination, and the thought whilch evoked from all who heard it the heartiest hope that he might long enjoy the great blessings of the Divine Will, good health and strength which have up to the present moment been granted him.

VOL. XIX. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1876. NO. 41.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

President Grant enforces his epigrammatic expression, "let no guilty man escape," by performing the revenue thieves and removing from office those who were chiefly instrumental in securing their conviction—as witness Bristow, Clarke, Yard and Conkling.

Our anti Chinese Commission to the East has already begun to bear fruit. The popular mind has been interested, the newspapers are elaborately treating the subject, Congress has already passed a resolution requesting the Executive to have the Burlingame Treaty either modified or abrogated, and in compliance with the following resolution, which passed the Senate by a large majority, we are to have a committee of that body to pay us a visit of inquiry:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to investigate the character, extent and effect of Chinese immigration in this country, with power to visit the Pacific Coast for that purpose, and send for persons and papers, and report at the next session of Congress.

Army officers who are familiar with the American practice of cheating the Indian and then whipping him into submission, attribute our principal hostilities to the treachery and frauds of Indian agents. The plain remedy is to relieve the Interior Department from any responsibility in this respect, and to turn the Indian over to the War Department. This policy has been urged so long and earnestly that the lower house of Congress inserted a clause in the Indian Appropriation bill to that effect; but the Indian ring was powerful enough to defeat the clause in the Senate.

A special from Washington to the New York Herald says: "It is an open secret that subpœnas have been issued for the appearance of Bristow, Bluford Wilson and perhaps others in the investigation of the Whisky Committee that it will be able to find the necessary links in the whisky ring to tie every one of the conspirators to the President. Bristow and Bluford Wilson will be followed by Yaryan that Bristow and Bluford Wilson would corroborate him in his statement connecting the President with whisky ring transactions."

Governor Conner of Maine has appointed Hon. James G. Blaine to the position in the United States Senate made vacant by the elevation of Senator Morrill to the Secretaryship of the Treasury. The outstanding health remains quite precarious. Mr. Blaine has accepted, and tendered his resignation as a member of the lower House of Congress. This step may put a stop to further investigation of the reported "crookedness."

The famous old circular building on the Battery, New York, known as Castle Garden, was completely destroyed by fire last Sunday evening. Nothing but a mass of charred ruins remains. Of late years it has been the first landing place for thousands of hopeful immigrants. At 5:30 P. M. some of the employés in the building observed smoke issuing from the balcony on the second tier. They gave the alarm and it was found that a fire was raging between the flooring and the ceiling of the entire upper darkness. Most strenuous efforts were made to subdue the fire, without avail. Two hundred Garnsen immigrants were in the building, and among them the greatest excitement prevailed during the fire, several escaping from the burning building. About an hour after the fire began the roof fell in, and shortly after the Castle was wrecked. Unguished, and the walls are all that remain. It is supposed to have been originated by sparks from the pipe of some smoker. The loss is estimated at $50,000, and is covered by insurance. The property was owned by the city, which will doubtless erect a more sightly structure in place of that destroyed.

It is related that while Don Pedro was at Newport, R. I., he made a request to have Oliver Caswell—an educated deaf and dumb man, of whom he had heard—visit blind mute, of whom he had heard—visit him. The request was complied with; and when Mr. Caswell was brought before the Emperor he exhibited a small wooden box, worked by his own hands, in proof that he was not a drone, but could do something towards gaining a support for himself. The Emperor was so touched by the incident that he ordered the basket to be filled with gold pieces. A ruler like that is sure to win respect wherever he travels. In the United States his memory will always be fondly cherished for the many excellent traits of character he exhibited during his sojourn.

A correspondent of the New York Sun writes to inquire whether it is true that the Catholic Convention was opened with prayer by two Catholic priests. We can't say, says the Sun, that it makes any difference, so that a proper prayer was said, of what denomination the clergyman was who said it; but the official record informs us that the Convention was opened by Bishop Merrin, a Methodist, and that Rev. Father Brady was called upon and made a suitable prayer the second day.

Santa Anna Antonio de Lopez, ex-President, Dictator, Minister of War, Commander-in-Chief, insurrectionary leader and disorganizer general of Mexico, was born in Jalapa on the 21st of February, 1798, and died on his native soil on the 20th June, 1876, aged 78 years and four months. His career was a remarkable one. He attained public life in 1821, and was entrusted with the command of Vera Cruz, from which he raised the standard of the Republic against the Emperor Iturbide, whom he overthrew. He next turned his arms against Iturbide, whom he expelled from the Presidency and elevated Pedrazza. Santa Anna was chosen President at the next election, but, while supported by the army, he did not possess the confidence of the people. A revolution was the consequence, when he proclaimed himself Dictator. The malcontents went to Texas and proclaimed a government; he pursued, levied war and was made prisoner. Released from captivity, he took part in the defence of Vera Cruz, when Prince Joinville and the French attacked it in 1838, in which action he lost a leg. Again President in 1841, he governed absolutely until 1845, when his authority was overturned by a revolution. Regulating power in February, 1846, he commanded the Mexican forces in the battle of Buena Vista, against the United States troops under General Zachary Taylor. He fell back before the victorious arms of the American generals, leaving Mexico to the enemy. During his absence Congress deposed him from his command, but as first magistrate he refused to obey, and withdrew to Tehuacan. Next campaign he was reinstated in his command, and fought and lost the decisive battle of Cerro Gordo. Another revolution made him abscond, first to Mexico to save his life, which was in danger from his oppressions. He lived at St. Thomas till 1853-4, when he went to Vera Cruz, but the French commander, Marshal Bazaine, would not let him take part in politics. He espoused the cause of the Emperor Maximilian, but soon after left Mexico for St. Thomas. Ever active and intriguing, he again ventured among his countrymen, and was made prisoner by the Juarists. In 1868 Santa Anna settled on Staten Island, New York, having pleaded a conspiracy to overthrow President Juarez, but the commander of Vera Cruz, on whom he relied, sent a boat off to the steamer and the plot failed. In his secretary pleaded guilty to a court-martial and sentenced to death, but was reprieved by Juarez on condition of leaving Mexico, which he did, but returned after the death of the latter, and resided there until death put an end to his career.

Our Eastern brethren are being terribly scorched. On New York the intense heat of Saturday and Sunday caused some fifty cases of sunstroke, nineteen of which proved fatal. Monday was the hottest day of the year, but there was no diminution in the number reported, been thirty cases of sunstroke reported, of which were fatal. The thermometer marked 102° in the shade. In other words the heat was quite as oppressive. In Philadelphia on the same day there were a number of deaths from sunstroke. Several Senators and Representatives were prostrated. The thermometer registered there 102° in the shade, while in the sun the thermometer stood at 127°. In the shade, and fifteen deaths resulted from sunstroke. Three wagons were regularly employed in removing to hospitals those overcome on the streets. Sunstroke in California was very rare occurrence and the few cases that do occur from time to time are confined to persons employed in the grain fields and those who do outdoor work, exposed to the rays of the sun.

The riot at Hamburg, Georgia, has terminated disastrously. On the morning of the 9th July, between two and three o'clock six negroes were killed and three others one white man was killed and another wounded. After the whites had fired four rounds from a piece of artillery, the negroes retreated from the brick building into the cellars and out-houses of the adjoining building. Fifteen were captured, and the whites, including Captain "Bob" Adams, escaped into the country. It is reported that some of the prisoners were shot after being captured. The excitement affair is deplored by all good citizens of both races. There were no threats, but deep regret that blood had been shed and lives lost. No further trouble is anticipated.

In his letter accepting the Cincinnati nomination, Governor Hayes says he is unalterably opposed to a second term for himself.

President Grant has snubbed, dismissed and forced to resign every officer of admitted integrity, or who took any part in protecting the revenue from the rapacity of thieves who hang to his coat tails; while, on the other hand, he has in nearly every instance either rewarded those tainted with corruption or condoned their guilt. He made the Cabinet unbearable for Bristow, because he insisted on prosecuting the whisky ring. He removed District Attorney Dyer of St. Louis because he admitted evidence that nearly convicted his private Secretary Babcock, and appointed a particular friend of Babcock's to the place, without even consulting the Attorney-General. He dismissed Yaryan and Clarke because they would unearth frauds on the revenue, and has obliged Commissioner of Internal Revenue Pratt to resign because he would not permit his office to be run in the interest of rogues. And now he has literally kicked out of the Cabinet the only man left in with a reputation for honesty—Postmaster General Jewell—because he would not use the Postoffice Department as an election bureau for the Radical party. Not that we believe General Grant cares particularly for the Republican party in the abstract, but because he knows that if the Democracy come into power they will expose the inner rottenness of the Administration and strike it a by-word for future ages. Andrew Johnson was not accused of a fraction of the offences that Grant has committed, and yet a Republican House preferred articles of impeachment against him, and a servile Senate came very near convicting him.

The late meeting between the Emperors of Russia and Austria resulted in an understanding that these two powers will hereafter act in concert. Russia has encouraged those to look for desperate aid, as it is hardly honorable to let them be strangled without an effort to save. Russia is afraid of the other great European powers!

The massacre of General Custer and his brave band of soldiers has aroused a strong feeling throughout the country than has been known since the war fever of 1861. The feeling is universal that his death must be avenged, even if it requires the extermination of the Sioux nation. Offers of volunteers have been made to the War Department from different portions of the country, more particularly from the Territories east of the Rocky Mountains, and an act will doubtless by Congress authorizing the acceptance of such aid. It is now too late to discuss the equities of the Sioux; the simple fact is that Little Big Horn must be avenged.

The loss of property in central Iowa by the recent floods is estimated at over one million dollars, over three hundred thousand of which is in Warren county.

John F. Whyte, a city goods merchant of Sacramento, has been appointed agent for the Pacific Coast to receive funds to erect a monument over the grave at Philadelphia of Commodore John Barry, "the father of the American navy." The grave of the man who rendered such valuable services to the country and achieved such undying fame as "Jack Barry," and should be a national treasure, and it is a reflection on our gratitude and patriotism to permit it to fall into decay.

J. Moran, State Delegate of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Pennsylvania, officially declares that the order does not countenance Molly Maguireism, as we have often declared in these columns it not not.

Gulwood, a village of two hundred people on the Bombay and Baroda Railway, in India, has been the scene of one of the most terrible outbreaks of cholera ever known. Over half of the population died in three days. The disease appeared at noon on the 4th June, and before daybreak next morning there had been fifty-seven deaths. On the 5th all the survivors fled, but were refused admittance by the adjacent villages. The disease displayed extreme virulence. Some cases proving fatal in twenty minutes. There is no resident doctor in the village, and medical help was some time in arriving. Gross neglect of sanitary measures is the apparent cause. Cholera appears to be unusually prevalent this year, outbreaks being reported from various parts of India, none, however, approaching that of Gulwood in severity.

ANTRIM.

During a drunken squabble n Belfast, on Saturday night, a man named Boyd stabbed another named Stewart. The latter lingered till Monday evening, when he died, Boyd has been arrested.

ARMAGH.

A man named Robert McCann, who had been confined in the Lurgan bridewell on the charge of having absconded from the Lurgan workhouse with a suit of clothes Lurgan workhouse with a suit of clothes upon him belonging to the house, made his escape from the house. He was reaptured.

CARLOW.

From the returns laid before the Board of Guardians of Carlow Union it appears that there are at present 325 inmates in the house, or 14 less than at the same period last year, there being six patients in the Carlow, one in the Bagenalstown, and three in the Tullow fever hospitals.

CLARE.

The Clare "Journal" records a very noble act of landlord generosity. The district of Ballyvaughan being very badly off for pure water, the late Lord Annaly, on the recommendation of Mr. W. Lane Joyat, at a cost of £5 000, brought a plentiful supply of pure spring water to the town.

On Sunday evening the spectacle presented in the parochial church of Ennis was never before witnessed by the inhabitants of the capital of the lamous historic county of Clare. The Fathers of the Order of Oblates from Inchicore had been giving a mission for the previous three weeks, and on Sunday evening the sacred exercises of the mission were brought to a termination in a brilliant and impressive ceremony, such as cannot fade from the memory of those who had the privilege and good fortune of being among the congregation on the auspicious occasion. At least four thousand persons participated in the fruits of the mission, and had now come to take part in the final scene of the retreat.

CORK.

At the Cork Police Court on Saturday the Mayor and Mr. MacLeod, R. M., exchanged congratulations over the peaceable manner in which the election has passed off. The chief magistrate complimented the R. M. upon the tact and discretion with which the arrangements for the preservation of the peace were carried out, and Mr. MacLeod bore testimony to good and orderly disposition exhibited by the people throughout the contest, observing that he believed Cork during the excited period through which it had passed would bear favorable contrast with any city in the United Kingdom.

The Caswell inquiry at Queenstown concluded with the accused Greek sailor, Christian Demetrius, being committed for trial at the assizes on the charge of murder.

DONEGAL.

The Londonderry "Sentinel" says that Monday sixty-four fishing smacks anchored between Tory Island and Horn Head on the Donegal coast. A company has been formed in Scotland for the purpose of fishing herring off the north coast of Ireland, and on Monday sixty-four fishing smacks arrived from Scotland, and these vessels had been sent for that purpose as an experiment. The fleet was accompanied by two steamers, which will take the fish direct to Liverpool.

DOWN.

The death is announced of the Very Rev. Peter McKey, P. P. of Loughbrickland, and V. F. of the Diocese of Dromore. For twenty-six years he presided over the large parish of Aghaderg, where his memory will long remain fondly cherished.

Rostrevor is to have an abundant water supply, a splendid promenade along the shore of Carlingford Lough, and a thorough way opening it with the railway at Warrenpoint. The bill authorizing these works has just been read a third time, and passed.

On Friday week the sad intelligence reached Downpatrick that Mr. Cassidy, R. M., agent for Colonel Forde, ex-M. P. for the county Down, had committed suicide at his residence in Seaforde by shooting himself through the head with a revolver. It is a curious fact, says the Belfast "Morning News," that within the last ten years or so the village of Seaforde has been the scene of several sudden deaths and bloody tragedies. Mr. King, the predecessor of the deceased as agent of the estate, was found dead in his bed. The rector, the Rev. Mr. Cummins, died very suddenly. About three years ago, in the planting behind the demesne wall, Gallagher, the bailiff, of the estate was murdered by John Gregory, who was afterwards hanged in Downpatrick jail for the crime; and now the unfortunate Mr. Parsons adds another to the sad list. The deceased was married some years ago to the widow of the late Rev. Mr. Medal, Protestant clergyman, having been a widower himself at the time of his second marriage. It is a curious fact that Rev. Mr. Medal was also found dead in his bed.

GALWAY.

The meeting of the Glennamaddy Board of Guardians was adjourned on Tuesday week as a tribute of respect to the memory of Michael Reilly, Esq., P. L., who for years was a constant attendant at the deliberations of that body. No party business was held at Castlerea on Wednesday week for the same reason.

A meeting was held in Shannonbridge a few days since to consider the land question, at which there were at least 2,000 persons present. Father O'Reilly, P. P., took the chair on the motion of Michael Reddy, Esq. The present land laws were condemned, and the farmers were urged to join the Ballinasloe Tenants' Defence Association.

KILKENNY.

The ceremony of investing four postulants with the habits of the Capuchin Order took place a few days since in the chapel of the convent and novitiate, Walker street, Kilkenny. The postulants were Mr. W. Neary, Mr. W. Flanagan, Mr. W. McEvoy and Mr. Donnie Reardon, who will be known for the future in religion as Brothers Aubiehn, Bonaventure, John and Leo. At the appointed period of the Most Rev. Father Guardian of the Capuchin monastery and the postulants, and in doing so alluded with pathetic effect to the death of Father Dillon, the example of whose virtues he held up for emulation to the order.

Whilst several prisoners were at exercise on Tuesday week in one of the yards of Kilkenny jail a regular emeute took place. The prisoners were in charge of warders named Butler and Tobin, who were superintending their drill, when they suddenly, and as if preconcerted, attacked the officers, whom they knocked down and kicked with great violence. The alarm having reached the other officers, they succeed with difficulty the two assaulted men, but no exit Butler had sustained such injuries that he now lies in a very precarious state.

Died, at his residence, Kilkryan county Kilkenny on Tuesday, 23d May, fortified by the rites of Holy Church, Mr. Kyran Marum, aged 57 years. The deceased was sincerely and deservedly regretted, as he was a good neighbor, as well as as a kind father and friend. His remains were interred on Thursday, and the large concourse of people who swelled the cortege to the grave testified to the estimation in which he was held by all.—R. I. P.

LIMERICK.

At a large meeting of the Guardians of the Limerick Union last week a motion for a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill was carried by a great majority. The Chairman, Mr. Fitzgibbon, without entering into the merits of the bill, objected to the subject being entertained at all, on the ground that it was one of a political character and foreign to the duties of the Board. In this view he was supported by Lord Clarina, who further intimated that he considered the bill a measure of confiscation. Twenty-one guardians were for discussing the question and nine against.

The Most Rev. Dr. Butler, Bishop of Limerick, held his usual visitation in Kilmallock last week. A vast concourse of people assembled from that as well as from some of the adjoining parishes. A sermon was preached in the parish church by the Rev. W. Dowsee, C. C., Ballingarry. A new church is about being erected on a site kindly granted by Mr. R. Brooke Dresser, landlord of Kilmallock. It is intended to build a church worthy of such a venerable seat of sanctity as Kilmallock.

The corner-stone of the church about to be erected by the Franciscan Fathers in Limerick was laid on Sunday. The ceremony was conducted with befitting pomp. The Right Rev. Dr. Butler, Bishop of the diocese, presided at the High Mass, and the sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Dr. Conroy, Bishop of Ardagh. The Mayor and the Catholic members of the Town Council in their official robes, and the leading civic officials in the mace and insignia of the corporation, were present during the ceremonies.

LOUTH.

At a council meeting of the Dundalk Catholic Young Men's Society, held on the 23d ult., a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Matthew White, of Dundalk, for his liberality and readiness for the ornamentation of the rooms a beautiful portrait of Robert Emmet in a handsome frame.

MAYO.

At the Castlebar presentment sessions last week the Chairman said they would indulge the following resolution: "That they were unanimous in saying that it would be highly desirable to construct a line of rail way to Ballinrobe, and that they were in favor of granting a guarantee."

Mr. Thomas Tighe, J. P., has made a present to the Canon Geoffrey Bourke of a handsomely ornamented pair of gates for the Ballindine church grounds.

QUEEN'S COUNTY.

At the weekly meeting of the Board of Guardians of Mountmellick Union, on Saturday, there was an unusually large number of members present. At the commencement of the meeting, Mr. Butt's Home Government Bill, and making unusual occurred until after the arrival of Col. Carden, the elected chairman of the Board. On his arrival he asked Mr. Cobbe to vacate the chair, but this Mr. Cobbe positively refused to do, stating that he was not aware that having Colonel Carden had refused to receive a motion made by a member of that Board in his capacity as Chairman, and it is supposed, when the time comes, his answer will be that the statements in them are true.

ROSCOMMON.

The death is announced of Mr. Denis Bannigan, a resident of Strabane, county Tyrone. Deceased was well known as one of the oldest cross-Channel traders in the neighborhood, having been trading to and fro from Greenock, Glasgow and Liverpool for the last sixty years.

WATERFORD.

A sailor of the bark Otway, of Whitehaven, was committed for trial last week by the magistrates at Waterford, on a charge of violently assaulting the captain for refusing to pay him his wages on his return, in a drunken state, after a temporary desertion of the vessel. The captain makes the extraordinary statement that the rest of the crew declined to render him any assistance when called upon.

At the meeting of the Dungarvin Board of Guardians, on Thursday week, on the motion of Mr. Pat Curran, seconded by Mr. M. A. Anthony, a petition in favor of Mr. Butt's Land bill was carried unanimously.

WESTMEATH.

Mr. Henry McCann Judge, charged with having fired at and wounded his tenant, Mr. Samuel Belton, has been committed for trial, being admitted to bail.

WEXFORD.

At the last meeting of the Enniscorthy Board of Guardians the following order was unanimously made:—"We have heard with great regret of the resignation of the Roman Catholic chaplain of this house, the Rev. J. L. Furlong; and gladly avail ourselves of this opportunity of recording our high opinion of his careful attention to the inmates of the house and gentlemanly bearing during the ten years he was Roman Catholic chaplain."

Saturday last, says the Wexford People, the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of Very Rev. Canon Rossiter, P. P., V. F., Wexford, was appropriately celebrated in St. Peter's College and in the Convent Schools, all rejoicing at having an opportunity of celebrating the jubilee of their beloved pastor's admission to membership of the sacred ministry. Father Roche, who was deeply affected by these expressions of affection, replied to them extemporaneously in such a manner as to show that he fully reciprocated the kind feelings which prompted them. Incidentally he mentioned that he had the great happiness of having celebrated the thousandth Sacrificial Masses since his ordination, a statement which evoked from all who heard it the heartiest hope that he might long enjoy the great blessings of mental and physical health and strength which have up to the present moment been granted him.

It is related that while Dom Pedro was at Newport, R. I., he made a present to Oliver Caswell—an educated deaf and dumb mule, of whom he had heard—visit him. The request was complied with and then Mr. Caswell was brought before the emperor he exhibited a small basket made by his own hands, in proof that he was not drone, but could do something towards his support for himself. The Emperor was so touched by the incident that he ordered the basket to be filled with gold pieces. A ruler like that is sure to win respect wherever he travels. In the United States his memory will always be fondly cherished for the many excellent traits of character he exhibited during his sojourn.

A correspondent of the New York Sun writes to inquire whether it is true that the St. Louis Convention was opened with prayer by a Catholic priests. We can't say, says the Sun, that it makes any difference, so that a proper prayer was said, of that denomination the clergyman was called upon but the official record informs us that the Convention was opened by Bishop Marvin, a Methodist, and that Rev. Father Brady was called upon and made a suitable prayer the second day.

THE ISLE OF SAINTS.

"Primus ordo sacerdotium: secundus ordo martyr: tertius doctores. Primus abest sed adhuc ad eundem sicut hinc: tertius sicut postea." —See the ancient catalogue of the three classes of Irish saints, as published by Usher & Lanigan.

"Every island is fondly believed boredom,
In days of rage, of rapine or bully Orders.
And true, the island must: they shed the stone's flickering ray.
The normal—Britain—proved a light
Monsoon, smoked and grimly bright.
The island, we learned of old,
Shape like the sea—or like St. Paul.

But oh! the state of man's moved
In panel—the Lord were Revised best.
The kitchen but a term between
The parlor and the lesser center
Less than the gentleman's estate
Of the wife's widowed mother in the star.
Wanting they ran a downward room,
With kinder faith and lessening grace,
Till, reaching to the stage most lowly,
The least and latest were the best.

Oh, that they there had abided!—that sin
Had, in that verger not punished her
Betrayal; found the entrance barred,
And Faith still keeping watch and ward.
Alast they slept in Zion's bower;
They were their self-ruin's bitter lesson.
The wars their lot—trial light
Enough for such as fell by night
Lanigan and else the thickening
Served here among the better grain.
His flourished: poverty and strife
Enjoyed all the harms of life:
His passion, a tenderness cast away,
Deep into a of moon and sarcasm;

And yet not ever such, sweet Isle,
Shall be thy fate. The grave shall smile
Again upon thy valleys green—
Again the morning shall beam serene
Upon thy mountains; and the bright
Unbridled sun shall laugh with light
With plenty blest, and warm and clear
The long delayed millennial Year.

Even now the sacred morning dawns—
The cloud-rack rises from thy waters!
And, as light likeness in thy sky,
Lo! Mist and Intemperance fly!
And chaste Sobriety imprints
Her cup, and Industry her hints!
Peace, Love and Holiness once more
Hover o'er sweet ark amidst thy waters;
And Heaven renews the blessing that
That made them erst the Isle of Saints!

What Frederick the Great Thought of the Jesuits.

A German contemporary gives a summary of the Society of Jesus, and enumerates its principal fathercurs. It also adds a long list of those who have spoken in its praise. In the catalogue the names of Frederick II., King of Prussia, stands out prominently, and our readers will perceive that the state of affairs on the Continent in the present day gives a special significance to his testimony. The following extracts from his correspondence afford proof of his opinion:

In a letter dated May 8, 1767, the king wrote to D'Alembert: "Do the Jesuits are driven out of Portugal? What a happy day for the philosophers! The throne of superstition is undermined, the following century will witness its downfall. Take care, however, that it does not crush you beneath its ruins! I am certain that the overthrow of the Jesuits in the world would not introduce the Utopian state of things of which some persons dream."

The astute politician and far-sighted rebel discerned, in the banishment of the Jesuits, and the destruction of religion, mere heralds of anarchy and revolution.

April 25, 1770.—"My lifestyle in Sans Souci will not approach the misfortunes of the Order; on the contrary, I esteem it an honor to offer it a refuge in the dispersion of its members. For the future the sons of Loyola will be sought for in Silesia; in that province alone will be found the remnants of an order which a short time before was so fashionable in all the courts of Europe. France will, however, ere long have cause to regret the expulsion of the Order; the education of the young youth will be less fine; suffer from this measure."

July 2, 1769.—"Those princes who out greedy on the property of religious houses, and study how they can appropriate to themselves, imagine that they are acting the part of wise politicians, whereas they are only carrying out the principles of their philosophy." It must be confessed that Voltaire did a great deal to prepare and bring them on this road. He was the precursor of the revolution; he prepared men's minds for it, by pouring a flood of ridicule on the religious habit, and not on the religious habit alone. He first quarried the block on which these ministers of revolution are hard at work, and which, unconscious to themselves, they are shaping into a monument of "Great Ursus." (The far-seeing monarch could not have displayed more forcibly the approaching social revolutions, to produce which the sects combine, in combination with the philosophers of Darmstadt and Munich, were laboring.)

April 6, 1770.—"In the present century philosophy has grown loud and spoken out with so much energy and force as hitherto unpermeated; but where do we see any tangible progress which she has made? You will tell me that Jesuits have been expelled. This is undoubtedly true, but I am prepared to prove that measure to have been solely the work of vanity, mere swings and selfinterest."

The well-qualified condemnation of the statesman of that day who showed themselves so misguided as to cause the dissolution of the Order by the Pope, and the universal regret of Frederick adopt, will be readily indorsed by an impartial posterity.

March 11, 1774.—"You may set your mind at rest with regard to the Jesuits, who are nowhere less of a terrible in my dominions. In a country where good treasures are rare, there indeed (as it the case is at especially in the Western Provinces) it is almost impossible to find them among the laity, these men are more necessary in the sense of extension than even in France have any idea of."

May 15, 1775.—"Can such bitter feelings find a place in the calm breast of a philosopher? Such would doubtless be the estimation of the saintly Jesuits, were they to read the expressions you make use of about them in your letters. While they were in power I made no demonstration in their favor now that misfortune has overtaken them, I look on them only in the light of learned men, whose place foreigners to education it would be no easy matter to fill. This natural consideration makes them independents to me, for they alone of all the Catholic clergy occupy themselves with the sciences. None, however, is my to say, shall rob me of a single Jesuit, since I feel how thoroughly it is my interest to keep them."

November 16, 1774.—"Let me beg you, as a philosopher and skeptic, not to believe the calumnies now spread abroad with regard to our good Fathers, without due examination. Nothing can be more unfounded than the report now current that the Pope was poisoned (Clement XIV. whose death was attributed to the agency of the Jesuits); he died from natural causes, and a postmortem examination revealed not the slightest trace of poison. But he was known to have often reproached himself bitterly for his weakness in according such an order as that of Loyola to the self-willed obstinacy of his rebellious children."

January 6, 1775.—"Strange to say you persist in asserting that the Pope was poisoned. Nevertheless I know for certain that all the letters we receive from Italy deny the fact, and declare Ganganelli's death to have had nothing mysterious about it. It appears that Italians carry on a system of double-dealing, writing to France the view of things which they think will prove most acceptable in that country, and telling us what they imagine will best please here; I do not understand this mode of procedure. But one thing I do know, namely, that the high-minded, honorable Fathers in Silesia and Prussia never sullied their hands with any such abominable business."

August 6, 1775.—"I do not contest the right of your Lord Bishops to play what tricks they please." (Frederick II. could never forgive these bishops for the ecclesiastical measures eliminated against open infidels such as Voltaire, &c., like measures being tolerated in the present day against hardened reprobates. "They are, however, but pursuing their calling; nothing but folly can be expected from them; for my part I consign them and their assiduous to the powers of hell, if my such exist. Very different are the good Jesuit Fathers; for them I confess I have a soft place in my heart. Not as being members of a religious order, but as educators of youth, as learned men, as an institution eminently beneficial in every way to society at large."

This assertion, couched in terms so unequivocal, and coming from the lips of one so competent to speak on the subject, forms the best refutation of the charge now brought against the Jesuits—that they are dangerous to the State.

In conclusion, a brief extract may be given from Frederick II's letter to Voltaire:

October 11, 1773.—"I have done my best to compensate to my poor Jesuits in Silesia by giving them my pensions and allowances; there in which the Fathers of the earth grow up, as to "garden of the Lord," for the assistance of a brave and manly contented people. The excuse upon which who removes his neighbor's landmarks has no terrors for the monopolizing soul of the Irish landowner. He does not want the people, he wants the land, and the real which will come to him whether it is occupied by beasts or men. Were we addressing a Government which did not concur with him in the political expediency of lessening, as far as possible, the number of Irishmen on Irish soil, we might, with some hope of success, take our stand on the right against a policy which, though it pleases the landlord, will be, unless arrested in its course, the ruin of the thousands in whom a just mind would find his surest and best support.—Dublin Irishman.

PROPHECY.

Startling Predictions—France and Germany To Unite War—Fate of the German Empire—A Fearful Picture.

About the end of last April a well-known and learned divine of Paris accidentally made a remarkable discovery. Searching in the grand old library of the religious community of which he is a member, Hev. A. Constantin was attracted by the title of an old volume printed at Cologne in the year 1577. It is styled, "A Divine interpretation of the prophet Jeremiah, full of prophecies, some of which having been verified by faithful event make the others worthy of belief." In the words of the good Father: "I was curious to know what was the nature of the prophecies, and having anxiously opened the book I read:"

On chapter 46—"All that the prophet (Jeremiah) says in this chapter must be understood ironically of the French. The French and the Germans shall arise against each other; but the army of the French shall be defeated. Division and discord shall take place among the French. French-men will fight against Frenchmen, and France shall fall beneath the power of the Empire."

These are the exact words of the prophecy. Without quoting the 46th chapter in its entirety and the comments which accompany it in the work, the writer of seven hundred yearsago, we can form a correct judgment of the veracity of the prediction. In the five verses I annulled by Nechao, King of Egypt, appealing to his people—"Harness your chariots, prepare the shield and buckler and go forth to battle. Harness the horses and get up, ye horsemen; stand forth with helmets, furnish the spears, put on coats of mail." And, "Egypt riseth up like a flood, and like waters tossed shall he moved as rivers, and he shall say I will go up and cover the earth; I will destroy the city and its inhabitants." What more vivid picture could be given of France in July, 1870, and the cries, a Berlin! a Berlin! with which Paris rang, and the cries of Napoleon as they marched to the frontier!

But, cries out the prophet, I see these valiant warriors tremble, terror surrounds them on every side. The bravest one cannot take places. The natives, astonished, learn of their shame, and their cries of grief have succeeded all over the earth.

How, then, are these valiant ones fallen? They are fallen because the Lord hath overturned them, because the time has come for God to visit them in His wrath. They had been covered with riches, and she has been delivered up into the hands of the people of the North.

Let us change the names and we shall have Worth, Reichsdeller, Metz and Sedan.

There are minds which pretend to be surprised at nothing. A glance at the preceding documents might convince the most skeptical. Read that on page 35 Jer.

"The army of Egypt was thrown into the succour of the Church when she shall be besieged and devastated by the Empire, but this event great benefit, for God has decreed that all shall be trampled under foot and given up to the flames by a very small number of dominion."

On chapter 37 Jer.—When all the temples of the Roman pagans shall be destroyed and all the treasures of the Church squandered by the priests and by the public and by the other impious spoilers, the Church of Rome will necessarily at such time call to the French to come to her other nations.

On chapter [illegible] kings of the Lord's people shall fall into the power of his enemies; that is to say, of the kings of the earth, of the empire or of the princes of Germany, and the same shall happen to the Roman Pontiff and his adherents.

We must not forget that the writer of these commentaries wrote in 1585, that he died in the odor of sanctity, 1593, and that the volume from which we quote was printed at Cologne in 1577.

Now, what shall we think of all this? Is it truly a prophecy concerning our times, or merely a curious coincidence? We are free to think for himself; we give the text without changing a single word.

This much is certain, that seven hundred years ago a holy man wrote an accurate record of the leading events of the Franco-German war. His prophecy is a true history of yesterday and to-day. But let us see what shall be the history of to-morrow. The commentary on the six last chapters of Jeremiah contains it.

"Babylon, that is to say, Germany, will be conquered in her turn. She has dared to provoke the Lord and to wage war against Him. God, in His wrath, will excite the nations of the North, brave peoples and mighty kings, who assemble from the extremities of the earth against her. That proud nation, enriched with the spoils of all the nations, will be, like the writer of the conquered nations with so much insolence, and whose whole power of resistance will be reduced of bulls, shall become in her turn the prey of the conquerors, who will plunder her and carry away her treasures. She shall become the last of the nations, and the peoples whom she has oppressed will rejoice at her fall. Such shall be the destiny of Germany." In the interpretation of the 49th chapter we read: "A multitude of distant nations shall be excited, and shall rise against the empire of the Germans. And at that time many cities shall be ruined and devastated other kingdoms, and especially the Church, in the same way, in the last days shall it be devastated by the people which it shall have ruined."

The same writer concludes by drawing a gloomy picture of the future. He expresses that Germany will support a fatal hope, and that war, famine and the plague which the prophet Jeremiah foretells for the Jews, will surely still or Christendom.

The good priest who discovered this important prophecy says:

"We cannot add one word of explanation to the text. We shall content ourselves by saying that the writer of these commentaries was a religious of the monastery of Citeaux, and that he penned his commentaries with the formal approbation of the Holy See."

CHARGES AGAINST A JUDGE.—Washington, June 30.—Hon. H. B. Massey, member of the Supreme Court, has placed a memorial in the hands of Mr. Knott, Chairman of the Investigating Committee, charging D. O. Humphreys, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, with being totally unfit, mentally, for judicial duty, that by ignorance of law, by neglect of logical reasoning, and given to feeble, rapid, disconnected utterances upon the bench, devoid of common sense; that he is frequently intoxicated upon the bench; that he has sat in at least one case wherein he had a direct pecuniary interest in the result, that generally, by his conduct as Judge, he has rendered himself a public laughing-stock and brought discredit upon the Court of which he is a member.

The Kidnapping Societies.

Suits are now being brought in the State Courts against one of the child-stealing institutions which disgrace this city and vicinity, by two parents whose children have been spirited away by the "Mawworms" who run those concerns, and whose promises of taking care of the stolen little ones, drive a nefarious trade in the sale of poor little waifs whom chance or the poverty of misconduct of their parents throws into their clutches. The words spirited is the same, or nearly the same, in most cases. The parent or guardian is induced to place the child under the "protection" of the "society," or "school," or "asylum," as the case may be—for reasons of economy—or these kidnapping concerns know. The child, according to the representations made, is to be taken to, fed, clothed, educated, brought up virtuously and put in the way of doing well in the world. The parent is to have free access to the child at regular times; and everything is to be "moving" for, does not the Rev. Oily Whitteye take special interest in the dear little one, and is he not a heavenly man? But the day inevitably comes when the deluded parents call at the "institution," and the child is not forthcoming. It also inquires the stereotyped reply is that the missing youngster is "gone out West;" but that it will throw everything in the way of its return. Inquiry only serves to prove that the child has been sent to the Empire."

These are the exact words of the prophecy. Without quoting the 46th chapter in its entirety and the comments which accompany it in the work, the writer of seven hundred yearsago, we can form a correct judgment of the veracity of the prediction. In the five verses I annulled by Nechao, King of Egypt, appealing to his people—"Harness your chariots, prepare the shield and buckler and go forth to battle. Harness the horses and get up, ye horsemen; stand forth with helmets, furnish the spears, put on coats of mail." And, "Egypt riseth up like a flood, and like waters tossed shall he moved as rivers, and he shall say I will go up and cover the earth; I will destroy the city and its inhabitants." What more vivid picture could be given of France in July, 1870, and the cries, a Berlin! a Berlin! with which Paris rang, and the cries of Napoleon as they marched to the frontier!

But, cries out the prophet, I see these valiant warriors tremble, terror surrounds them on every side. The bravest one cannot take places. The natives, astonished, learn of their shame, and their cries of grief have succeeded all over the earth.

Catholicity in Philadelphia.

The following item has been going the round of the Catholic papers:

"The first Catholic chapel in Philadelphia was built in 1729, when Miss Mossaquin, a Catholic lady, brought with her a colony as tenants, and settled on the road leading from Frankford to Newtown. Penn confirmed to her the title to a lot of ground against him in England that he suffered from the Catholics of his province, but he made no effort to stop it."

"Newtown" in this item should be Nazareth, now in Bucks county. The erroneous impression left on the mind of the reader is that it was of the Mossaquin family that the first Catholic in Philadelphia, the founder of Pennsylvania, was complained of as "murdering." But as Penn died in 1718 the name of Mossaquin has erred. In a previous issue of the Journal we referred to the objections against having Mass said in Philadelphia. Our notes show that to have been done in 1734 and 1738, and the latter to William Penn's son.

The Rev. Michael Brown, who entered the lunacy of Miss McCloskey at Nazareth, and whose remains were a few years ago reinterred to the graveyard of St. Magdalen's church, Kensington, was ordained previous to becoming a priest. He had been a soldier in the War of Independence, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis. He was a native of Ireland, and died at the age of 83.—Philadelphia Catholic Journal.

A terrific storm visited Fort Madison, Iowa, Monday evening, June 26, lasting about fifteen minutes. The St. Joseph's Catholic church was completely demolished by the falling of the steeple, which was 226 feet high. All the other churches are more or less damaged. The Park House is a total wreck. Almost every house in the city sustained serious damage, and about forty dwellings are wholly unroofed. Nearly all the shade trees are either broken off or uprooted, and the damage is estimated at $50,000. No loss of life.

THE BLACK HILLS SLEIGHTER.

261 Soldiers Killed and 52 Wounded.

One Crow Scout Remains to Tell the Tale—Intense Suffering of the Wounded.

NEW YORK, July 7.—Special dispatches to nearly all the papers confirm the dreadful defeat and massacre of Custer's forces. It appears his command and Reno's attacked the camp at different times, losing the effect of a simultaneous attack. Reno lost 95 killed and wounded. Custer's command was annihilated. The details show that the command reached the Indian camp on the Little Big Horn, June 25th. Major Reno, with three companies, attacked on the south, and was repulsed with loss, including Lieutenants McIntosh and Hodgson. Dr. De Wolf, and fifty men killed and five wounded. Benton's command made for a bluff across the river, and were saved from instant destruction by the timely arrival of a battalion. Custer, with five companies, attacked the lower part of the camp.

Further Particulars of the Slaughter.

CHICAGO, July 7.—The Times' Bismarck special gives the following particulars of the Custer massacre:

In a recent dispatch I informed you that Custer surprised the Indians, and proposed to give them battle on the 24th. He left the mouth of the Rosebud on the 22d with twelve companies of the Seventh Cavalry, striking the trail where Reno left it, leading in the direction of the Little Horn, a branch of the Big Horn. In the evening of the 24th the scouts discovered a fresh trail, and on the morning of the 25th discovered an Indian village about twenty miles from the mouth of the Little Horn, about three miles long and half a mile wide. Custer pushed his command rapidly, though they had made a long march in the twenty four hours preceding the battle, and when over the village they struck an abandoned lodge, while the Indians were moving in boats as if in retreat. Reno, with seven companies of the Seventh Cavalry, was ordered to the left to attack the village at its head, while

CUSTER, WITH FIVE COMPANIES,

Went to the right and commenced a vigorous attack. Reno left of them with three companies of cavalry, and was almost instantly surrounded by Indians, who were in more of desperate fighting, during which he lost Lieutenants, Hodgson and McIntosh, Dr. De Wolf, and twelve men with several Indian scouts killed, and many wounded, he cut his way through and, undismayed, crossed the river, and gained a bluff three hundred feet high, where he was entrenched, and was soon joined by Colonel Benton with four companies. In the meantime, the Indians commenced to attack which had abated in vigor for an hour or so, making repeated desperate charges, which were repulsed with great slaughter on the Indians. They seized higher bluffs, however, from one to which they poured a galling fire into the troops, and as their arms were of longer range and better than the cavalry's they kept up a galling fire until nightfall. During the night Reno strengthened his position, and also prepared for the attack which was to new at daybreak.

CUSTER WAS SURROUNDED ON EVERY SIDE

By the Indians, and the men and horses were killed in the first charge. Custer was one of the first to fall.

Reno's command had been reinforced, and was on hand to be heard the Indians massacre Custer and the remainder. The bodies of all were found by the Indians, and stripped, and the Indians, in ignorance of law, decided that Custer's command had been annihilated, and that Reno's command would be the next victims. He was shot through the body and through the head. Kellogg lay on the field as he was abandoned. Reno was recovered for the wounded, and buried the dead, and commenced a retreat with his command and the wounded, thirty-five in number, aside from thirteen who died on the way on the 27th. He reached the south of the Big Horn at twelve o'clock on the 28th, having transited ninety miles by steamer in less than thirty-six hours. The Indians pursued Reno's men to the river, but reached their village the camp was strewn with robes quickly packed, and started in flight. Gen. Terry is concentrating at suitable Indian intrenches. In a battle last they left dead of their number than they have shown as by the happy hunting ground, strewed most gorgeously. In the ravines the Indians were said to have left their dead. Evidently in their solicitude for the wounded. There was found the Crow scout, who escaped to tell the tale of the fight. He believes their loss to have been greater than that of the whites, for in the battle they were massed and fought desperately. They were the assaulting party after the first day. Colonel Reno and Adjutant Hodgson, of 1825, were previous to becoming a priest. He had his settlement in the West Indies, and at his will, which we have recently examined, describe himself as "a physician, late of the West Indies," and directed that the bones of my child, if they may be found shall be interred with my body" in a grave in the cemetery of St. Augustine.

He appears to have had four sisters, Mary Brown, Bridget Hughes, Ellen Kelly, Eleanor Kelly and Anastatia Dillon. To Eleanor and Anastatia he gave all his real and personal property, and to Eleanor he especially directed should be given "all my plate except what belongs to the church and my gold watch," to her husband, Thomas, he gives all his "books and drugs." To Anastatia he gives his new "ring" and his vestments and my two negroes, Hanna and Tamm," and to his grandson, Samuel Kelly, he gives "my flute, Dido." He directed $10, Irish money, to be given to Robert Kirwan, of Rosscahbir, "for Masses," and $10 were given to George Meade, the grandfather of the late General Meade. The will was made December 5th, 1750, and the executors were Rev. Theobore Schneider, Robert Meade and Edward Dillon.

Such is a brief record of the first "priest" that appears to have been in Philadelphia, a picturesque stepping place. We are of the belief that as he came in 1726 he ceased to officiating" for the Jesuits attached St. Joseph's church in 1730-32. After that he become "a physician" to the neighborhood of Neshaminy. In his will directions were given as to the size of the grave lot, of the wall that should be built around it, and of what material it should be constructed.—Pittsburgh Catholic Journal.

Cardinal Cullen.

Cardinal Cullen is a native of Kildare county, and was born on the 27th of April, 1803. He received his early training in the classical studient in Carlow College, where his talent and industry soon attracted the attention of Dr. Doyle. In 1820 he set out for Rome, entered the college of the Propaganda, and prosecuted his studies with brilliant success. He was not the first son of Erin who asserted the supremacy of Irish genius in the College of the Propaganda. Years in fact before the United States of the United States, was just setting out for the New World, after having for seven years delighted the professors and his fellowstudents by his unwearied application and great intellectual power in the Propaganda. Cardinal Cullen maintained a student the honor and emulated the fame of young Kenrick. His public display in Rome was in 1823, when, in the presence of Leo XII. and the assembled College of Cardinals, he was raised to the first chair in the celebrated College with which his name will be always associated, and which he was ordained priest in the year 1829, and became successively President of the Irish College at Rome, Professor of Apologetics, and corrector of the press for political, ecclesiastical and theological publications. Absorbed in the duties of his arduous and onerous duties, he found time to act as agent to the Irish bishops in their relations with the Holy See. He thus became practically acquainted with the progress of religion in Ireland, and thoroughly conversant with the peculiar duties and responsibilities of an Irish Prelate. He was high in the esteem of Gregory XVI., and was selected upon Ireland the Church and Convent of St. Agatha as the future secular clergy in Rome. It is unnecessary to inform Catholics at home or abroad that he has been faithful to the duties of our present saintly and venerable Pontiff, who appointed his late Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of Ireland, and Apostolic Delegate in 1850.

The Supreme Court in New York has just given its final decision on an important case. A tedious litigation had long been pending between the Commissioners of Fares and the owners of the Female Academy of the Sacred Heart, as to the liability of any part of the property of that institution to be taxed. Judge Lawrence of the Supreme Court has decided that the cases in question are invalid and without the authority of law, and that the institution is entitled to a perpetual injunction restraining the sale of its property for the payment of taxes. The taxes in suit, covering a period of five years, amounted to $42,000. This decision practically settles the question.

WILLIAM SMITH O'BRIEN.

Anniversary Demonstration at Rathronan

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN'S ODE.

[Correspondence of the Cork Examiner.]

On the 18th of June, 1866, the spirit of William Smith O'Brien passed to its eternal reward, and a few days after all that was mortal of his honored remains were, amid the tears of a sorrowing nation, returned to the bosom of mother earth in the handsome and sequestered little churchyard of Rathronan, his grave being strewn with garlands of flowers and other tokens of the grief, respect and veneration of a grateful and, it may be said, a bereaved people. That such a melancholy event should have depressed and saddened the hearts of the Irish people was not only natural and right, but easily comprehended by any one who was acquainted, even to a limited extent, with the life and character of the departed patriot. It was not necessary that our should harbour his convictions and his deeds to be estimated with that feeling, for by many of those who differed most widely with him he was held in high esteem.

The story of his career is too well known and sufficiently alluded to in the proceedings of to-day to need any notice here. It will suffice to say that the demonstration, of which the following is a brief record, indicated in the most unmistakable manner the deep reverence and love in which the memory of Smith O'Brien is held by the great of the people of his country—a love and reverence which no one would have had many manifestations but for his acknowledged, while from time to time prevailed that the expression of such sentiments would not be suffered with strong and potent, or that the organization of the anniversary demonstration ought not be perfect as the occasion required.

Whether the timidity which previously existed was replaced by a firm resolution not to allow the opportunity pass without giving effect to the long-cherished hope of the people of paying a visit to the grave of their friend's truest and noblest sons, Mr. Daniel C. O'Brien took the initiative in things in those regions. It directs an article in the Irish papers calling attention to the necessity for the development of that country, to do the best we can with our native soil, but we are not prepared to do the work required of us." General Sheridan, in answer to a question by a reporter of the Times, said: "I am unavoidably engaged." We are doing this at the special request of the United States Government. It does not originate with the War Department at all. You will see on my map where the Indians have been living. Our agencies are three these Indians, who are of the very lowest and most restless type, are on the Reservation, Montana (said the General enthusiastically) is the most promising of our Territories. It is settled by an intelligent people, among whom are many old soldiers, and it is the richest and most promising of our settlements. These Indians have been annoying the settlers, and we had to drive them from their reservations. You can say that we will do it now, or determinate them."

ANOTHER APPEAL.

Quite a large number—indeed, a majority—of our interior subscribers are in arrears for two years' subscription. The amount each one owes is trifling; but aggregates a sum running up into the thousands. We want this money; it is honestly ours. The proprietor of a newspaper is as much entitled to pay for it as though he contracted it with a dealer in groceries or a grocer. The newspaper does, however, not appear daily or semi-daily that it may be used as agent out collecting, coaxing, as it does, from twenty-five to fifty per cent., and in many instances going miles out of his way to collect a few dollars, only to be told when he reaches there, "I'm no better; I don't know that I'll live the year out, but I owe so much. I have an eye to the hereafter, and I'll see that I'm square with God before I die, and I'll pay you next week." Of course the collector has to bide his time and appear satisfied. But "next week" doesn't see the money any more than it does the same remark sent you, with probably the same result. The paper should not be run in this way. It is far easier and less expensive for the subscriber to forward his subscription, or a person than for the publisher to send out collectors. There are not a dozen subscribers on our books who would be inconvenienced by the payment of their subscriptions, while their non-payment cripples us. The date on the margin of wrapper will tell you how your account stands; then remit immediately the debt to the office, at our expense, if you desire.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

The Presidential campaign has been fully inaugurated, and the Republican and Democratic parties are face to face before the country. The newspapers of both sides are discussing the merits or demerits of the opposing candidates, and championing the respective platforms upon which their favorites stand. They do so with a disinguenuousness and a partisan bias which considerably impair public confidence in their utterances. There is just this difference, however, in the methods of discussion—the Democratic organs have a goodly array of facts on their side, while the Republican sheets contain little beyond vague declamation. Reform is admittedly the one great issue before the nation at present, everything else is of secondary importance. The reckless expenditure of the Government during the last eight years, the millions stolen from the people by thieving officials, the stagnation of trade brought about by over speculation, have all combined to increase taxation, and to place intolerable burdens upon the shoulders of the industrious classes.

It is agreed that the sad state of things must be ended somehow, or national bankruptcy will ensue. Now let men examine in a calm, practical business way how the two parties, Democratic and Republican, have understood and met this grave issue. There is no necessity for party war cries, for sectional appeals, for political harangues, because the thing can be done as coolly and exactly as a merchant examines his books. The Democratic party have nominated a man thoroughly identified with the cause of reform: a man whose combats with its thugs and dodgers have won for him a national renown. They have adopted a platform devoid of useless verbiage, here of vague phraseology, which deals frankly and clearly with the principles upon which reform is to be worked out in every department. There is no room for ambiguity—no full con fidence should not be placed in the man, or implicit reliance upon the platform. There is no reason why any American citizen should cast vote for TILDEN, unless the fact that he is a Democrat should be one, and they will hardly be admitted by sensible people.

The Republican party have nominated a man with no record in the reform movement, who has been almost unknown outside his own State, where, no doubt, he is personally very popular. They have put forward a platform remarkable for nothing but indefiniteness and the dexterous avoidance of any broad assertion of principle. Now, putting mere party preferences aside, taking into consideration only the welfare of the country, for which of these two men should the honest man and loyal citizen vote? Why, it is as clear as a mathematical demonstration that he ought to vote for TILDEN. Everything that we learn about HAYES proves him to be simply a well-meaning man, altogether devoid of strength of character—so "amiable," indeed, as to hardly have a will of his own. The natural inference is that he would be as plastic as wax in the hands of the astute Radical politicians. He is very far from being the man to perform the herculean task of cleansing the national Government from dishonesty, corruption and incompetency. It require firm will and iron nerves for that, and TILDEN possesses them in an eminent degree. We have not framed these few arguments in political fashion, nor spoken as a party advocate, but have stated facts that must force themselves upon the attention of any impartial investigator.

Grant has sacrificed his only Jewell.

THEN AND NOW.

We publish to-day a very important document, prepared by that earnest and patriotic Irishman, Mr. John F. Leonard of Paris. It is a complete list of the campaigns performed by the Irish Brigade in the service of France. We are sure it will be read with absorbing interest by all our countrymen, and that not a particle of the proud record will be left unnoticed. But there is just one portion of it which seems to call for some comment from us at this particular time, and therefore we venture to trespass a little upon our readers' patience. It will be seen that among the regiments sent by France to aid into the country in establishing its independence and throwing off the yoke of England, were those composing the Irish Brigade. This is a historical fact, well known, well authenticated, but too often forgotten by those who are most bound to keep it in grateful remembrance. Better than for the work could not possibly have been chosen. They were all veteran soldiers, they entertained a bitter and undying hostility to England, and they were ardent friends of American freedom. It gratified the fiercest longing of their hearts to be opposed to the British troops, and to have again a chance of bringing the "ignominious flag" down to the dust, as they had done before on many a hard-won field of battle. Nobly and well did they perform their duty, as did also their fellow countrymen who had the happiness of seeing the young standard of the Republic over their heads.

That is how Irishmen behaved a hundred years ago. Their compatriots of to-day do not dim the luster of that brilliant record. Read the list of men who fought and fell in the wild death charge of the lamented and only too gallant CUSTER, and count how many Celtic names are on that sad roll! Does it not indicate the fidelity of the Irish in America to their adopted country? Does it not show that now, as a hundred years ago, as in every crisis of our national history, the children of Erin have displayed a readiness to sacrifice their lives in defence of the honor or safety of the United States? And yet there are men calling themselves Americans who hesitate not to sneer at the Irish race, and who constantly speak disparagingly of Irishmen, and, if they had the power, would prevent them from participating in the liberty and prosperity of the foundation and maintenance of which they contributed so generously with their life blood. If there was a spark of generosity in such Americans they would tell Irishmen all over the world as friends and brothers.

GRANT'S TACTICS.

President GRANT has dismissed Post-Master-General MARSH in a way that showed he wanted to insult him as well as get rid of him. We confess to having very little sympathy for the deposed official; at the same time we cannot help condemning the action of the President as hasty and tyrannical. If the Queen of England were to attempt to dispose of her Cabinet advisers in such a summary fashion she would arouse a tempest of resentment that might threaten the stability of her throne; but our Chief Executive has more extended powers, and can change the Ministry at will, like Cabinet at will as the Sultan of Turkey. We do not know that the country has ever had a President who made such frequent and arbitrary use of prerogative in this respect as General GRANT has done. The dismissal of Postmaster JEWELL makes the twenty-sixth change he has effected in his Administration, and by some unfortunate fatality the alterations has always been from bad to worse. How it happens that the President always selects men of inferior intellectual ability or of blemished reputation for his appointees, is a riddle which we cannot solve, unless upon the assumption that he cannot get individuals of any other stamp to take office under him. Certain it is he never has had any Cabinet officer of whose character and standing the country could reasonably be proud; and if he has heard a man with some remnant of respectability around him got a position, GRANT managed to get rid of him with very little delay.

Harney had the reputation of being a tolerably honest man and of having a sincere desire for reform, and everybody knows how he was treated. The President has always professed not alone him, but all who are suspected of sympathizing with his ideas. He will have nobody talking about such unpleasant things as reform in his Cabinet if he can possibly help it. Reform is the question that rises up at his luncheon table, and he must banish it or lose his peace of mind. The sin of Post-master JEWELL has been entertaining friendship for BRISTOW, and sympathizing with his efforts to extirpate corruption; and of course GRANT cannot be expected to forgive that. Moreover, it seems that JEWELL has more than once taken the liberty of speaking disparagingly of the Chief Executive, in what terms we have been told, but we may presume they were such as to create deep resentment in the mind of President GRANT, who is morbidly sensitive to criticism, and pre-eminently small effort to deserve favorable report. The Republican papers are inventing the best excuses they can for him, but they are making a poor show of logic and can only distort facts. One after the other the acts of General GRANT show that he has no regard for honor, integrity or capacity, and that personal matter suited to the atmosphere of a penitentiary than to the air of the White House are those with whom he has most in common. As his term of office draws to its close he appears to grow more desperate and more reckless of public opinion, as if he knew his fate is to fall into oblivion and contempt.

There are 4,200,600 Catholics in the United States who are natives of the country. Of Catholics born in Ireland there are 1,600,000.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE GLORIES OF THE SACRED HEART. By Henry Edward, Cardinal-Archbishop. New York: Catholic Publication Society; San Francisco: M. Flood, Market street. Cardinal Manning's mind is cast in an eminently ascetic mould, and is at the same time deeply philosophical. Whatever he writes is therefore sure to be both scholarly and thoughtful. In the treatment of religious topics, particularly those of a supernatural order, he has a style and manner especially his own and easily recognizable. The book now before us, divided into ten chapters or discourses, is an excellent example of the Cardinal's method of writing. The subject is dealt with in a way perhaps somewhat above the comprehension of the ordinary class of readers, but it is replete with wisdom and illumined by the spirit of devotion.

THE WIDE 'ON OF EASTOMBRE, AND OTHER TALES. By Miss Taylor. Baltimore: Kelly, Piet & Co.; San Francisco: M. Flood, Market street. We confess to having a mild dislike to stories which are put in the shape of a series of extracts from a diary. A diary ought to be the easiest and most natural writing, and, when genuine, it is but in rare instances that we have seen a pretended or imaginary diary that ever amounted to much. "Real Life" is no exception to the general rule. A great many readers will, no doubt, pronounce it "nice," but we think it is rather weak. The translator knows what good idiomatic English is, and we are sorry she did not turn her attention to a book more worthy of her abilities.

MEDITATIONS AND CONSIDERATIONS FOR A RETREAT OF ONE DAY IN EACH MONTH. Baltimore: Kelly, Piet & Co.; San Francisco: M. Flood, Market street. This is the second American edition of a work compiled from the writings of Fathers of the Society of Jesus, made by a religious. It is published with the approbation of the Most Rev. Archbishop of Baltimore, and its name sufficiently explains its purpose. It will be found useful not only in religious communities, but to pious Christians in every line of life, because it is capable of stimulating the spirit of devotion and fortifying the earnest attention of even the indifferent to the all-important concerns of the eternal hereafter.

SAINT ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF HUNGARY. THE LIFE OF PORTIUNCULA. THE MATRON OF ISRAEL. Baltimore: Kelly, Piet & Co.; San Francisco: M. Flood, Market street. These three pretty little volumes contain histories of the eventful and edifying lives of Queen Elizabeth of Hungary, Queen Elizabeth of Portugal, and the mother of Saint John the Baptist. Of course they are very instructive for young people, teaching them lessons of humility, patience and charity, which are not often found in the juvenile literature of the present day. Books like these should be encouraged, as they are the best antidotes to the evil effects of pernicious reading.

THE YOUNG LADY'S PROGRESSIVE READER. Designed for the Higher Classes in Schools and Academies. New York: P. O'Shea, 37 Barclay street. It is by no means as easy as one would imagine to compile a really good reading book. The range of literature is wide enough and selections are easy made, but tastes differ very much, and it is hard to suit all classes. Our decided opinion is that this Progressive Reader is one of the best school manuals that has come under our notice. The extracts have been taken from the works of the most celebrated writers, and sound Catholic taste has presided over their selection.

THE MAGAZINES. We cannot call to mind seeing a better number of the Catholic World than that for the month of June. All the articles are good—there is not a single exception among them. It was well conceived to devote so much space to subjects appropriate to our Centennial year, and to open up chapters of our national history that are often forgotten. The Catholic Record, too, gives us a palatable book now before us, divided into ten chapters or discourses, is an excellent example of the Cardinal's method of writing. The subject is dealt with in a way perhaps somewhat above the comprehension of the ordinary class of readers, but it is replete with wisdom and illumined by the spirit of devotion.

NOTES FROM SAN LUIS OBISPO.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE MONITOR.]

SAN LUIS OBISPO, July 6, 1876.

After penning my last from Santa Barbara your correspondent started upon a trip across the Santa Ynez mountains to San Luis Obispo, and as the trip is full of interesting scenes, and many objects of interest to the religious community, I deem it proper to say a few words. The first place of interest after leaving Santa Barbara is Lompoc. On this is situated the small village of Goleta—one of the garden spots contiguous to the city. This is quite a settlement, from the fact that it is divided up into small farms of from twenty to forty acres, thus giving the country quite a suburban appearance. Here the nucleus of a thriving town has been established.

Passing La Patera you soon reach the foot of the Santa Ynez mountains, whose height reaches 8,000 feet above the sea. Situated at the foot of the mountains is the old San José vineyard, started over one hundred years ago by the Franciscan Fathers. The old adobe is still standing, and is now owned by Mr. McCaffrey. A genial and hospitable gentleman. Through his courtesy I was shown over the vineyard, and also up through the San José cañon. Owing to the heavy and romantic appearance, it is justly considered the best cañon in California. Here are covered with lupine, wild posies and numerous other varieties, and delicately tinted with flowers, all completing a picture that can not soon imitate and no pen accurately describe.

When the stage ascends the top of the Santa Ynez mountains a sight meets the eye of the traveler worth a journey to the place. At his feet is what appears a ribbon of scattering pines, running up and down the coast as far as the eye can reach. Upon the top upon the one side by the rugged chain of mountains and upon the slope, and layed by the briny billow. On the other side the ocean meets our descent, and in a very short time are rolling through the

SANTA YNEZ VALLEY,

And here see the celebrated College Rancho, containing over forty thousand acres. This rancho belongs to the Church, and there is a college situated on it. Here also is one of the many old missions.

Reaching this place on Sunday, my attention was attracted by the chimes of the old bell, and I proceeded to the group of Mexicans and Indians, who were on their way to the old adobe, I soon found myself before the latter built by the good Franciscan Fathers nearly one hundred years ago. I was agreeably surprised to see such a large congregation of worshippers in this fanciful place, where you can scarcely find a house for miles, and still more surprised to see a chorus of Indians singing the Gregorian chant. Rev. Father Bazan, who is styled the "Abbot of Santa Ynez," officiated at the Mass. This gentleman is the highest dignitary of Catholicism in this section. His Grace added to the grand display of premiums which were awarded, by donating a handsome copy of the Holy Bible. D. C. Medynn, who has proved himself one of the best and truest friends of the institution, donated a splendid gold medal. Miss Louise Heffernan merited both prizes—the first for Christian Doctrine and the second for good conduct. On Sunday Confirmation was administered to about fifty persons, and twenty-five persons made their first Communion. His Grace was very much pleased to see so many approach the Sacrament for the first time in Salt Lake.

SACRED HEART COLLEGE DECORATIONS AND ILLUMINATION.—The Christian Brothers did not allow the centennial celebration to pass without a public acknowledgment of the glorious event on the occasion. Their splendid college on Eddy street was profusely decorated with flags, streamers and evergreens, wreathed into many fanciful and pleasing designs. But the crowning glory was the display at the illumination on the night of the 3d and 4th. The entire front of the college was festooned with Chinese lanterns and every window in the building was filled with a lighted lamp of light. The sides fronting on Eddy and Larkin streets respectively presented an especially brilliant appearance, with thousands of lights gleaming through the wreaths and garlands which encircled them. Few of the displays in the city were as effective and tasteful as that made in honor of the natal year of liberty by the Sacred Heart College.

VERY REV. FATHER PRENDERGAST.—The friends of the Very Rev. Father Prendergast will be pleased to learn that, according to last accounts, he had excellent health and was enjoying his trip very much. He has taken a flying visit to the most interesting places in the States and in Canada, and is now on his way to Europe having quitted New York on the 24 July. He also visited the Centennial Exhibition, and was much pleased thereat. We wish him a happy continuation of his travels, and a safe return to his many friends in San Francisco.

"THEN YOU'LL REMEMBER ME."—The following, from the Celtic Sun, will apply to our subscribers with redoubled force: "We would like for our friends in the country to remember the printer when they sell their wheat. We have about a thousand dollars due on our subscription books, and a little of it would prove very acceptable at this time. We don't like to press any one, but printers must be paid every Saturday night, and our credit with the dealers in paper must be kept up to A No. 1, or else we buy at a disadvantage, and besides this our little sons have got to be fed, and all that sort of thing. So we hope each one will just lay aside four dollars for us. It would not be too much to expect $1,000 in this way in the next ninety days. But this will not all be profit. We run an expensive paper, and when dull times come we try to bridge over, without calling on our subscribers. Let each one pay us, and it will make a big aggregate."

A. WALDTEUFEL, of San José is unquestionably the most enterprising publisher, book and music seller on the Coast, and his rapidly-increasing business proves that his efforts are appreciated by the public. His stock of books, pianos, stationery and musical instruments is the largest and best in California. He is the sole agent for some of the best pianofortes and organ makers and he imports his other goods direct from the publishers and manufacturers in the Eastern States and Europe, thus enabling him to supply nearly all other dealers in the same articles. Colleges and convents in want of anything in the line will consult their own interests by patronizing him, as he offers them special advantages.

President GRANT's failure to be present at the Centennial celebration in Philadelphia on the Fourth has elicited considerable comment. Some attribute his absence to dislike to come face to face in the presence of a large crowd with the orator of the day, Hon. William M. Evarts, President Johnson's principal advocate in the impeachment trial. The Emperor of Brazil, however, was there.

The Centennial Sermon at Notre Dame.

The Centennial was duly celebrated last Sunday at the church of Notre Dame des Victoires, Bush street.

Owing to the pending departure of the French iron-clad now in our waters, the services partook of more solemnity than usual, and were applauded by Admiral Pothuau and his staff. Too musical part of the ceremonies was grand. Mons. l'Abbé Michel, chaplain of the French flagship, delivered the sermon, which was with feelings of pleasure," said he, "that we witnessed the unanimous expressions of rejoicing to which the citizens of San Francisco gave vent in their grand celebration of the Centennial. The Catholics are proud of the part they have taken in it, and glad to see that, with but one voice, united to add all the cries they possibly could to the patriotic festivities of the day. You must remember that France was also a daughter of America, in its days of trouble and disaster, as well as in its days of triumphs, and nobly has America repaid the gratitude of our ancestors. But a few years ago, on another battle-field, side by side with our own soldiers, we have seen the American nurses of both sexes attending the wounded and relieving our exiles, administering angels sent from abroad. Later still, when the fortunes of our country were overclouded, and great suffering succeeded to conspiracy, American generosity opened its purse and sent millions of francs to succor the victims of this terrible war. In the name of France, and with all my feeble voice, I venture to thank you, Americans, we thank you!"

At the conclusion of the sermon, the choir sang the Credo of Lejeal. The "Ave Maris" was then rendered in a superb manner by Mrs. Zoë Dolie, accompanied by the organist, the talented violinist, Miss Jenny Claus, whose artistic execution of the piece elicited the highest commendation. The "Sanctus" of Lejeal, the "Agnus" of Mercadante, with an "O Salutaris," by Mrs. Zoë Dolie, concluded the musical portion of the ceremonies.

The Fourth at San Rafael Orphanage.

Independence Day was generally commemorated at Saint Vincent's Orphan Asylum, San Rafael. Quite a company of friends assembled, and exercises appropriate to the day compiled some hours, and were heartily enjoyed. After a Mass of thanksgiving celebrated by Rev. Father Caredda, at which the whole community assisted, the orphans and some few friends repaired to the spacious dining hall, which was neatly fitted up and beautifully decorated with American flags. The children being seated, Father Croke, taking the chair, addressed them, telling them in the most patriotic terms the day is celebrated with so much enthusiasm by all Americans, by every lover of liberty. Paying a high tribute to the heroes of the Revolution, he retraced the rise and progress of the United States, telling them that, being born American citizens, they inherited a title more proud than that of kings, and that the rights and privileges of which they did not fail to avail themselves by all Americans, by every lover of liberty. Paying a high tribute to the fathers

RELICS OF THE IRISH BRIGADE AND OF THE IRISH LEGION.

Irishmen and Descendants of Irishmen Living in France from 1701 to 1870.

BY J. F. LEONARD.

It has been said, and with great truth, that the services rendered to France by the Irish Brigade and the Irish Legion were never fully appreciated in that country. Little mention is made of them by historians, even when they speak of battles in which they have played a prominent part. Lately, however, Michaud, Guizot and other writers have done more justice to the heroism of those "exiles of Erin" who fought and fell for France. Authentic and interesting documents, containing information touching some of the heroes of Fontenoy, Lawfeld, India and the American war, have indeced me to go back, to the time when the brigade was dissolved—1791. The privilege granted to me of looking over the registers of the Hotel des Invalides, the last retreat of the brave, enabled me to trace some of these soldiers through the varied changes they witnessed in the stirring times in which they lived.

From the last officer of the Irish Legion, Commandant O'Brien, now living, I got the document, which I translated and which contains the full account of the reorganization of the regiment and their services, presented, a short time before the brigade were dissolved, to the National Assembly and printed in Paris. It has a character of impartiality and truth about it that makes it interesting. The statement drawn up, too, by a member of the Assembly, and not by an interested party or by an Irishman, enhances its value, and I believe it will interest my countrymen, as it did myself when I read it only a few days ago.

Historical observations on the origin, services and positions of the Irish officers in the service of France, addressed to the National Assembly. Refuges par M. A. D., Depute a l'Assemblee Nationale.

INTRODUCTION.

The time has come when the National Assembly is to carry out the great work by which will give a new organization to the army, and place on a solid base the fate of those soldiers of the country, who for long years have been tormented by continual changes, becoming every day more irritating, and which did not do good and only served to discourage the army.

The National Assembly will, no doubt, seriously examine what advantages the Empire obtains from the foreign troops, in sacrificing themselves for her defence, can never be injurious to a nation of twenty-one millions; and if any objection can be made to the expression, foreign troops, we hope at least to prove that the Irish could never be considered as such, and that they are in reality French.

Few people know the details which concern these regiments, and we have thought it would be useful to show the services rendered by some of the heroes of Fontenoy, Lawfeld, India and the American war, have indeced me to go back, to the time when the brigade was dissolved—1791. Abridged details of the service of the Irish Regiments in France from 1689 to the Revolution.

We have seen how the regiments arrived in France, and the religious and patriotic motives which induced them to emigrate. We have now to speak of their gratitude to the nation that received them, and proving it than by sacrificing themselves, on every occasion for its interests, and by the valor they took to show the efforts they made to deserve favor, and we shall commence with Colonel O'Brien's regiment in May, 1690, and were sent at once to Savoy and Piedmont, under the orders of Marshal de Catinat. They were present at the battle of Staffarda, won by this general on the 20th August.

1691.—They made the splendid campaign of M. de Catinat, which ended by the siege of Montmehan, taken on the 21st December.

1693.—Battle of Norwinde, won by Marshal de Luxemburg, 29th July. The Irish regiments in France since 1791 were present, with the exception of three regiments, sent to the army in Piedmont.

1693.—Battle of Marsaille, won by M. de Catinat, 4th October. The Irish greatly distinguished themselves, which was attested by M. de Catinat.

1695.—The six Irish regiments of the army of M. de Catinat were at the only military operation of that year, the siege of Valenza, and the

INTRODUCTION.

The time has come when the National Assembly is to carry out the great work which will give a new organization to the army, and place on a solid basis the fate of those soldiers of the country, who for long years have been tormented by continual changes, becoming every day more irritating, and which did no good and only served to discourage the army.

The National Assembly will, no doubt, seriously examine what advantage the Empire obtains from the foreign troops, who, in according themselves for her defence, can never be injurious to a nation of twenty-one millions; and if any objection can be made to the expression, foreign troops, we hope at least to prove that the Irish could never be considered as such, and that they are in reality French.

Few people know the details which concern these regiments, and we have thought it would be useful to show the representatives of the nation the right the Irish have to their confidence.

They are the most unhappy portion of a brave and faithful people who deserved favor from the greatest and most generous nation in the world, and who claim to-day from its justice the confirmation of the honorable title of French citizens, which they obtained more than a century ago from Louis XIV., and which they have merited since by the most unswerving fidelity and by the torrents of blood (as fine as satin), which they have shed for their adopted country.

Of the Origin and Arrival of the Irish Regiments in France.

FIRST PERIOD—1689.

The Irish regiments were created, as stated, in Ireland on the 17th of March.

On the 6th of May following Count D. Chateau Renaud brought the first general officers, soldiers, etc., and returned to France with his squadron of 22 ships. On his way back he took from Kinsale Mr. Lambert and took seven richly laden Dutch vessels.

M. d'Auverfreville left Brest on the 13th of March, 1690, with 36 ships of the line, having on board six French regiments, 6,300 men, and he landed them in Kinsale bay on the 23d of the same month. As Louis XIV had expected, it was settled that James II. should give him Irish regiments in exchange. They were, consequently, embarked in Cork in the French vessels, and arrived in Brest on the 1st of May, 1690. Those regiments were the following: Monticashel, O'Brien and Dillon, in which were received the remains of the regiments of Burke and Fielding, and they formed a corps of 8 371 men, officers included; they were armed and equipped at the expense of the families who raised them.

MONTCASHEL.

This regiment was formed in 1683 of the companies that Charles II. took from the town of Tangier, in Africa, when he demolished it. The Duke of Montcashel was its first colonel, and had for successor Lord Montcashel, who died in France in 1694. M. de Lee succeeded him, and left the regiment in 1704 to his son, Francis de Lee—the latter dying in 1721, it came back to his father, the Lieutenant-General, Knight and Cross of the Order of St. Louis. He kept it until 1732, when he gave it to M. de Boisfleury—the latter dying Lieutenant-General and Knight of the King's Orders, the regiment was given to his son, Count de Boisfleury, at present Lieutenant-General. He kept it until 1775, when, by a new formation of the army, made by the minister Marshal de Muy, it was incorporated into Dillon's and took the name of O'BRIEN.

This regiment was raised in Ireland in the beginning of 1689 by Lord Clare, who, dying in 1691, gave his regiment to his eldest son, Daniel O'Brien, who brought it to France, where, having succeeded to the title of his father, the regiment took the name of

CLARE.

The latter dying in 1693, the regiment was given to M. de Lee, who was Lieutenant-Colonel in it, and who left it in 1694 to the Montcashel's.

He was replaced by M. Talbot, who, having fallen into disgrace with the Government for having made use of indiscreet language, was sent to the Bastille and deprived of his regiment in 1696, and Lord Clare, second son of the officer who raised the regiment and brother of the one who brought it to France, got it.

Having been killed at the battle of Ramillies, on the 23d May, 1706, the regiment was kept for his son, then a child, and the command given to O'Brien, Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment, until 1740, when young Lord Clare, Count of Thomond, took the command, and became Marshal of France, Knight of the King's Order, Commander of Langedoc, when he died in 1761.

The regiment was reserved for his son, a child at the time, but the latter dying in 1776, the regiment of Clare was incorporated in Berwick's.

DILLON.

This regiment never changed its name. Lord Theobald Dillon raised it on his estate in Ireland in 1688, and having armed and equipped it at his expense, he gave it to his second son, Arthur Dillon, who brought it to France, where he became, at the age of thirty-three, Lieutenant-General, having received that rank and that of Marshal de Camp, for deeds of valor.

He was commander in Dauphiné, and beat on the 28th August, 1709, near Bi-ançon, General Rebender, commander of the troops of Savoy, who attempted to enter France.

He ended his glorious career in 1733, leaving five sons. In 1726 he had given his regiment to his eldest son, Charles Dillon, the latter was, in 1731, was the eldest of the family, kept the regiment however, but gave it later to his brother, Henry Dillon. Lord Charles having died, Henry Dillon succeeded to the title and to the family estates, but still kept the regiment until 1742. After the battle of Dettingen, the English, from auxiliaries, became a principal party in the war, and he was obliged, for the preservation of his title of peer of Ireland, and to prevent the confiscation of his estates, to leave the service of France, which he did with the consent and advice of Louis XV. His third brother, Chevalier Dillon, got the command of the regiment, at the head of which he was killed at the battle of Fontenoy in 1745.

Louis XV. appointed on the field of battle the fourth brother, Edward Dillon, as colonel of the regiment, and he was, like his brother, killed leading it on at the battle of Lawfeld in 1747.

The fifth brother alone remained, but he had taken orders, and at present, and has been for the last twenty-eight years, Archbishop of Narbonne.

The sixth, Edward Dillon, followed still at the battle of Lawfeld, Louis XV. was asked to give the regiment away, under the pretext that the Dillon family was exiled, but the King answered that Lord Dillon was dead, but that he would not consent to allow a property cemented by so much blood to be sold, and entrusted it to the last family while he had any hope left to give it to them.

Dillon's regiment, in consequence, remained from 1747 under the command of a Lieutenant-Colonel. Edward Arthur Dillon, Lieutenant-Colonel of Lord Henry Dillon, received the command of it on the 25th of August, 1767, and the brevet proved equally his rights.

He is at present "Marechal de Camp," proprietor of the regiment, at the head of which he served during the war in America.

The regiment's history of the battles, sieges, etc., who, when they were made of indiscreet language, was sent to the Bastille and deprived of his regiment in 1696, and Lord Clare, second son of the officer who raised the regiment and brother of the one who brought it to France, got it.

Having been killed at the battle of Ramillies, on the 23d May, 1706, the regiment was kept for his son, then a child, and the command given to O'Brien, Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment, until 1740, when young Lord Clare, Count of Thomond, took the command, and became Marshal of France, Knight of the King's Order, Commander of Langedoc, when he died in 1761.

The regiment was reserved for his son, a child at the time, but the latter dying in 1776, the regiment of Clare was incorporated in Berwick's

ANTRIM.

Mr. Stephen McCampbell, leather merchant, has been elected a Town Commissioner for Ballymena in the room of Alexander Caruth, Esq., resigned; and Mr. Robert Chesney, linen merchant, in the place of Mr. William Anderson, Esq., deceased. Both were elected unanimously.

CARLOW.

The death is announced of Mr. Hugh Doyle of Carlow. At the last meeting of the Town Commissioners of Carlow Mr. Hammond paid a well deserved tribute to the memory of the deceased.

The third death in a family from the neighborhood of Segannieown, within less than so many weeks, says the Carlow Post, is causing a sad surprise just now, as much from the nature as the suddenness of the attacks. The symptoms (cramp and utter prostration) have been in the same almost the same, and the attacks are fatal, though the senses of the victims have been perfect in the last moments. Dr. O'Meara was called in to the third patient, and pronounced it a specise of pneumonia. They are the first cases of the kind known here.

CAVAN.

A petition to Parliament in favor of empowering guardians to extend the age at which children may be placed out at nurse from 10 to 12 years, was adopted at the last meeting of the Cavan Board of Guardians.

CLARE.

On Thursday week a turret clock and tower, erected by the Rev. Thomas Keogh in this town in respect to the memory of the late Rev. Robert O'Brien, of Corbunch, agent of the Inchiquin and Cahirmoyle property, was unveiled at Corofin, in presence of a large assembly. The proceedings were of a very interesting character, and several members of the O'Brien family, including Mr. Edward William O'Brien, Cahirmoyle, Mr. de Vere O'Brien and Miss O'Brien attended the ceremony

CORK.

At a meeting of the Cork Liberal Franchise Association, held for the purpose of making arrangements for contesting the next vacancy, all the sections of the party were regularly represented in the struggle, and the proceedings, which were conducted in private, were of a satisfactory nature.

Rev. Thomas Walsh, P.P., Castlemartyr, has paid to the Cork Examiner a check for £20 15s. in aid of the Bath testimonial.

We regret to announce, says the Cork Examiner, the death of Dr. Curtin, probably the oldest physician in the city. Dr. Curtin has had a long and honorable career in the medical profession. At an early stage of the existence of the water cure he adopted hydropathy, and was subsequently appointed physician at an establishment he had become decaying, as well as that of Mrs. Curtin. It was a sad circumstance that the death of the wife left his house exactly on the morning when he himself closed his long and well-spent life.

A person named Power, belonging to Taurlee, arrived at Queenstown on Saturday night, in a little canoe, named the Queen of the Road. The voyage occupied nearly three weeks. The adventurous Yankee's mother-in-law and brother-in-law accompanied him. His canoe is about 16 feet long and 2 feet 8 beam, and is fitted with a small mast in the shape of a rocker. The sails are in shape of a jigger and log. Mr. Power used the paddle as an auxiliary.

While two men from the village of Lisarroll were employed digging in the sour-yard of the estate of Mr. Hungerford, they found what at first considered to be a bar of iron, but what afterwards proved to be a mass of English gold, weighing 12 pounds, 2 ounces. And on by a spirit of enterprise at so valuable a discovery they got three men to help them in making a search, in the hope of finding some object of still greater pecuniary worth. They had not dug more than five feet beneath the surface when they came to a breast-high wall, constructed with some broad flag. This they removed with some difficulty, and, behold! what must have been their astonishment on finding thirty-five immense pieces of gold, each weighing five pounds, and together with a number of helmets and breast-plates. The news soon spread in the last moments. Dr. O'Meara was called in to the third patient, and pronounced it a specise of pneumonia. They are the first cases of the kind known here.

A TALE OF AUGHREY CASTLE—1649.

[Aughrey Castle is situated on the bank of the Shannon, near Inchmod about ten miles from Castleshannon, Anne Chantry after the event described took on Shannon, by Cromwell, who, according to his usual custom, burned the castle and hanged the brave defenders. A large portion of the walls remain standing yet.]

Where gibbs by Leitrim's verdant banks the Shannon's lonely flood
Upon a gently sloping hill McRannel's castle stood.
And down through countless centuries whistle the breeze
Around its shattered battlements and through its crumbling keys.

Old native chieftains exercise an all but regal sway;
And oft within its spacious halls the bard poured forth his lay
To mail-clad warriors brave and true, and ladies fair and gay,
And told of deeds of valor done on many a hostile plain,
Or else of love's bright rosy song in softest, sweetest strain.

While from his harp the minstrel gray drew notes half stirring,
Each stanch clansman pledged his love to cope of Spanish wheel;
And in the midst the chieftain stood, and viewed with honest pride
Those brave and faithful gallowglass who often by his side.

Amid the battle's rudest shock, relentlessly had been
Their deeds of valor spread abroad by many a minstrel keen.
And in the name of motherland poured freely forth their blood,
But though in numbers to his nod a prompt obedience paid,
No rosebeam cul blushs his wish of adding field to field.

And though in Freedom's sacred cause his sword he promptly drew,
And took a leading place where'er green Erin's banner flew—
Though in his suffering country's cause he lost right willing said,
And often smote to earth her foe beneath his trenchant blade,
Yet not when Fortune on his head her choicest gifts did shower
Did thirst for gain his heart inflame, or lust of pomp or power;
For, knowing well that hoarded wealth no lasting joy imparts,
He only wished to hold a place within his people's hearts.

But darker days for Erin dawn—red rolls the Shannon's flood—
Religious discord fills the land, the Cross is bathed in blood,
The light is quenched on many a hearth, the silent tear
And cries of mourning and of woe are heard from every shore.
Then like fruitful nations received the gift with gladness, and, doubtless, had brought gifts culled from the wilderness of Christian lands,
White bees. They kneaded the flour into cakes, and then these Australian men, with their wives, their daughters, their sons—their little innocent children—sat down to the feast which the cordial kindness of the Aborigines or Scotchmen had provided for these wandering denizens of the wilderness. Former injuries were forgotten, and the hatchet buried of their merriment awakened the wild echoes of the wood—and then?—Then came the cry of famine, and the arsenic, and then the torturing spasm of the strychnine. After hours of misery the last of the maimed corpses, helpless creatures of God by civilized" British colonists, the whole group lay dead on the ground.

The murderer was never disturbed by punishment, rebuke or question. The village, indeed, stood on the ground of the massacre. The squatters removed to such massacres. The squatters removed to other stations. The selection served.

The author whom we have quoted relates conversations with one of them, whom he was glad to say all the native inhabitants should be exterminated like vermin. They were like partridge, game to be shot at—and there was no close time—the shooting lasts all the year round.

Unlike game, again, they were to be trapped and poisoned—by the most horrible poisons known. They, in fact, poisoned the well the said English colonist carried out his doctrine with respect to certain native neighbors:

"Calling them by name, he said, 'Here, you eaten sugar,' and gave them flour, and then the other his position, which the poor fellows took and ate unsuspiciously. He then told them to go and drink at the water-hole on their way. By and by he went out to have a look round, and near the water-hole lay one of the blacks, who, on seeing him approaching, cried out, 'Massa, Massa——, (here he used the bad words they mock) me directly buck-jump!' referring to the convulsions caused by the poison, and which he called 'buck jumping.' Soon another paroxysm came on, in which he died."

It is difficult to imagine anything more cruel than the act of poisoning these unsuspecting native creatures by means of flour bidding—but the English colonist cape the climax of cruelty by going to glad and thank agents of his writhing victims. The author remarks that he himself brought canned meat and barrel upon his arrival, but his desires to protect the natives in his district from the superintendent of an adjoining station—"Oh—we have no fear of them. Here we have proof that the natives were not to be trusted, saying that the author desired to protect them—and yet against those inoffensive creatures another colonist could use planning measures!

In this case we have means of testing the charges against the natives, and find that English colonists a murder indissolute people. Of course, in other cases the colonists give what account they please of the conduct of the natives—but, indeed, they rarely care to trouble themselves to make excuses. They seem to think that the murder of a native should occasion no grief in any mind. Mr. Stanley Jerone observes:

"My attention was first drawn to the matter by two rose accounts received from a gentleman, since dead, who had recently returned to the wild life of the gold diggings and the new districts of Queensland. He described in one case the cruel practice of poisoning, and gave me to understand that the shooting of 'niggers' was an ordinary and accepted thing. His statements have also lately on my mind."

The same writer has the following suggestive remarks:

"To form some judgment how far this question is one of importance only we must turn to Mr. E. B. Kennedy's book, 'Four years in Queensland,' published in 1870 by Mr. Stanford. In pp. 70-74 is given what Mr. Kennedy describes as a very truthful article, taken from the Port Denison Times of May, 1866. I make the following extracts:

"The Black question is daily assuming a more serious aspect in this part of Australia. . . . Our Government, with short-sighted and miscalled economy, are still reducing the native police force, which is the only protection that the out-settlers have from the blacks, and which, instead of being reduced, ought to be trebled or quadrupled in strength. If this suicidal policy be persisted in, the inevitable result will be the adoption by the white settlers of a system of self protection against the savages. It is not lonely on account of the settlers themselves, over had whom the demoralising effects of such a system will exert an influence for evil that it will be difficult to counterbalance.'

"After some remarks upon pseudo philanthropists and missionaries, which I need not transcribe, the Port Denison editor concludes:

"'If the settlers are forced into the necessity of taking upon themselves the responsibility of repelling the aggressions of the blacks, and of doing so in a clandestine and illegal manner, consequences the most deplorable are sure to ensue.'

"On this, Mr. Kennedy, writing in 1869, remarks: 'The above gives a very good idea of the state of things at present.' It is, of course, impossible for me to adduce satisfactory evidence as to the extent to which this 'clandestine' war of extermination is proceeding at the present time. Neither gold-diggers or squatters are likely to tell tales of what is done far up the country until years are gone by and the danger of a prosecution is past.'

It is a terrible thing to think that even whilst you, reader, are perusing these words there are British colonists, aware of impunity, proceeding to poison all God's children of the wilderness. What such horrors are taking place the British legislature will devote its attention to a consistent line of action for those who shall be permitted to inflict on a rabbit. Whilst such horrors are going on seeking amusement, getting up innumerable pic nics against the undue abstraction of the liver—that the Christian colonists are doing on British waters, in pulpit, press and platform addresses, are expiating a sin—one of civilized civilization—making no mention, however, that it is being silenced by silence and secured by asphyxia.—Dublin Irishman.

SAINT CHRISTOPHER.

Christopher was born in Canaan. He was twelve feet high, had powerful limbs, and a joyous countenance. Before he was baptized he was called Opher. When he was baptized he was so full of strength he said to himself, "I will wander abroad, and will seek out the greatest lord, and I will serve him." He came to a certain king who was mighty with great possessions and many subjects. This one received him kindly and was glad of his strength. Opher promised to serve him faithfully. When he was bestowed, so he lay down again and slept. Again he was called. He sprang up quickly, and looked about every corner; but finding no one, he once more lay down. A third time he was called; a little child stood by his side and asked to be taken across. Opher lifted the child on to his left shoulder, took his staff in his right hand and went into the water. But the water foamed fiercely about him, and the child was heavy that Opher bowed his back. With every step the water became deeper and the child heavier. Opher said to the child, how is it you are so heavy? I feel as though I were carrying the whole world." The child replied, "You are carrying not merely the world, but you are carrying Him who made the world on your shoulders." With that he pressed down his head under the water. "I am Christ, thy Lord and thy King, I am whose thou servest." In the three in the name of God my Father, and in my own name and in the name of the Holy Ghost." Until now you have been called Opher, henceforth your name shall be Christopher—because you have carried Christ. Plant your staff in the ground and to-morrow, when you perceive on it blossoms and fruit, be mindful of my power." After that the child disappeared. Christopher planted his withered stick in the ground, and in that same night it became a tree and put forth blossoms and bore fruit. Christopher was rejoiced at what had happened, and longed to be able to serve his Lord with something more than the mere strength of his body. He abandoned the occupation at the river and once more wandered forth.

The Holy Spirit guided his steps into a foreign land. He came to a city where the Christians were violently persecuted for their faith. At first he did not understand their language, but he prayed to God for it, and immediately he understood all that the people said. He went up to the place where the Christians were martyred, and spoke words of consolation to them, to help them die with joy. When the king heard this he was angry, and sent one hundred horsemen to seize him. The horsemen found Christopher in prayer, and not one of them was bold enough to approach him or lay hands on him. Then the king sent another two hundred horsemen. When they saw Christopher they stood still at a distance. He, however said to them, "Tell me what is done far up the country until years are gone by and the danger of a prosecution is past."

THE JESUIT'S MICROSCOPE.

Why Some Ignorant German Peasants Refused Christian Burial to a Dead Priest.

We find in the Southern Cross an interesting paper published by the Catholics of Buenos Ayres, the Argentine Republic, South America the following instructive story, which contains an excellent moral:

A curious fact is related of what happened not long since at the death of a German Jesuit. The Jesuit, whose name was Tetzner, a man both pious and learned, was going from Prague to Innspruch, in hopes that his native air would re-establish his health. Death, however, to bar the fatigue of the journey, he died in a village on the road. The magistrate of the place immediately repaired to the house, and in taking an inventory of his luggage found a little box, the extraordinary structure of which made it appear mysterious and suspicious, for it was black and composed of wood and glass.

But how great was the surprise and horror of the first who looked through the glass at the top. He drew back with affright, exclaiming: "I renounce thee, Satan!" The same effect was produced upon all who were hardy enough to look through the glass. The fact was, they saw in the box a living animal, black, enormous and frightful, of immense length, and armed with two threatening horns. The terror was universal, and no one appeared to know what to think of it. In terrible amazement the young gentleman, who had just finished his course of philosophy, observed that the animal was less in it than it was much larger than the box itself; that in the present instance the contrary was the case, which was contrary to every principle of philosophy, and could not be explained but by the order of nature whence he concluded that the animal in the box was not material, but that it must be a spirit confined to it as a punishment.

This observation was received with universal approbation, and every one was persuaded it was the devil himself who was in the box. The person who had carried the box with him it was recollected, with the same evidence, that he could not have had it but for some evil end, and that he must have been nothing but a sorcerer.

The report of the circumstance spread far and wide, and numerous crowds of people came to the house for the purpose of having a peep into the box, and each one said it was the devil. "I have seen the devil to-day."

The judge condemned the deceased to be deprived of Christian burial, and left an order for the priest to perform the exorcisms of the Church for the purpose of conjuring the evil spirit from the box, and driving him out of the country. The sentence of the judge was executed, and the inhabitants of the village carried their reflections to a prodigious length. The witnesses of the funeral ceremony were unanimous in attributing the death of the confessor to the influence of the devil, and the whole country was filled with astonishment.

Every one was busy in giving full vent to his wonder, or rather scandal, his own interpretation, and the minds of all were in a state of excitement, when a certain Prussian philosopher happened to pass through the village. He inquired into the cause of the universal astonishment, and was informed by all with the utmost indignation that the deceased was a sorcerer, and would have condemned him as such had he not quickly destroyed the charm and departed from the world. Taking the box, he removed the cover, and at the first moment, and on turning the box upside down, out came a little hornbeetle and crawled upon the table. The philosopher then explained to the astonished people the cause of their misapprehension. New admiration now succeeded to their former astonishment, and the whole appeared as laughable an object on the table as it had before been terrific in the box. Everything now became calm, the good name of the Father was restored and each one returned laughing to his home.

Many people, however, were found who published this story as a miracle, and as a proof and the sentence of the judge, but forgetting to say anything about either the philosopher or the beetle.

The story, however ridiculous it appears, furnishes us with a very important instruction in its fullness, and is a striking proof of four faults:

First—Our readiness to pronounce on what we are ignorant of.

Second—Our haste in judging of others, and in condemning them. How successful they were in this course of philosophy, observed the animal who was in

WHAT THE RADICALS ARE DOING.

With all their bluster the Radicals do not appear to be very confident of success in the approaching Presidential struggle. There is a most unmistakable making the best of a bad case in the campaign articles published by their leading newspapers, which indicates that they know right well they are in a difficult position. The crimes and mistakes of GRANT press heavily upon them, and they are now trying to fling the embarrassing burden off, but they find they cannot do it as easily as they imagined. As the Old Man of the Sea clung upon the back of Sinbad the sailor, and would not be shaken off, so does General GRANT hang on the shoulders of the Republican party. He will ultimately strangle it. HAYES is evidently not the man to rid the faction of its horrible incubus. His intentions may be good enough, but he has not the force of character necessary to effect such a gigantic work. Not very long since the Radical organs were perfectly unanimous in their praise of GRANT. According to them he had been the saver of his country, just as if he was the only man in the United States who could have brought the civil war to a successful issue for the Union. They forgot that if he had had the misfortune of being tried in the early stages of the war, he would most probably have been thrust aside like other and better men were. It was his good luck to get appointed to the supreme command of the Federal armies at a time when the strength of the Confederacy was already broken, and that circumstance made his fame. They had somewhere to make or some explanation to give about every dubious action of GRANT'S career, or why the country should put up with so second man from office or the putting of a rogue in. Lately, indeed, a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. Now they want "reform," and it apparently hurts them to the soul when the President does anything that illustrates the particular kind of reform of which he is now and always has been in favor.

These radical newspapers have a delicious knack of turning their faces from the setting to the rising sun. GRANT is the departing guest. HAYES is the coming one, and the latter is of course the recipient of all the homage and good wishes. He is at present the chosen representative of the radical desire for reform, and we cannot help thinking he has been very aptly selected. An nobody ever heard of any wish for reform on the part of the radical faction until a Presidential election was near—so nobody heard of HAYES, or of his statesmanship, until the Cincinnati Convention brought him out before the admiring gaze of the country. HAYES has never worked to drive dishonesty or incompetency out of the Government, nor has he exhibited any great anxiety to do so. Of course he cries out "reform" now; but, in the name of common sense, what else could he do under the present circumstances? Surely he could never go before the people and say that he wanted to continue the session and policy of President GRANT! There never yet was a candidate for any office who did not profess the most virtuous intentions, and declare himself ready to be sacrificed for the welfare of the republic. But the pertinent question is—what did the radical party reform all the time they were in power? The party that has supported, through thick and thin, an Administration which has caused every honest American to blush for shame, and which has brought this nation into disrepute before the civilised world, is most assuredly not the one to be again placed in power by the votes of patriotic citizens. Plainly do loud protestations about reform and morality in political matters not deceive the people, and we have too much confidence in the intelligence of American voters to ever believe they can be successful.

HOME RULE AGAIN TRIUMPHANT.

Home Rule has achieved another triumph in Ireland, the scene of the victory this time being the county Leitrim. Captain O'BRIEN, the popular candidate, having been returned as member of Parliament by a large majority over his Tory opponent, the Hon. Mr. TOTTENHAM. There was some danger that the mistake which threw the city of Cork into the power of the Conservatives, would be repeated in Leitrim, because at the beginning of the contest no less than three men professing national sentiments declared their intention of going to the poll. Had they carried out that determination the result, of course, would be that the Tory candidate would have an easy victory over the divided strength of the popular party. Happily, wise counsels prevailed, and two retired, one gracefully, the other somewhat reluctantly, thus leaving the struggle between Captain O'BRIEN and Colonel TOTTENHAM. The landlords of Leitrim have always been remarkable for their strong Tory leanings, and if they could have had their way, as in the good old times of Orange ascendancy, no doubt, Mr. TOTTENHAM would now be in Parliament. But the men of Leitrim, whether in town or county, have been equally noted for devotion to their country's cause, and under the protection of the ballot they succeeded in placing their choice at the head of the poll. There was great excitement, not alone in Leitrim, but all over Ireland, at the result of this peaceful struggle. The Government and its functionaries were warmly in favor of the Conservative candidate, and did all they possibly could to promote his chances. Indeed, the War Office authorities went a little out of the way to embarrass Captain O'BRIEN. He is, as may be imagined, a military man, and, unlike many of his class, is obliged to stop with his regiment. As soon as it was known that he aspired to the representation of Leitrim, and had the good wishes of the people, his regiment was removed to a distant location, the leave of absence was cut off, and he was prevented from making any canvass of the county. But he had zealous friends working for him, and into this interference of the Government only made them labor more energetically, so he defeated his opponent without very much trouble. The very pleasant feature in the election was the thorough unity of purpose exhibited by priests and people. At the meeting at which Captain O'BRIEN was adopted as the standard-bearer of Home Rule, the clergy of the county were present in large numbers and were his most enthusiastic supporters. It was mainly owing to their assertion that the two other rival candidates were induced to withdraw, and thus the undivided strength of the popular forces was pitted against the common enemy. Thanks to their eagerly and patriotically exerting themselves to deceive the people, and we have too much confidence in the intelligence of American voters to ever believe they can be successful.

Had they carried out that determination the result, of course, would be that the Tory candidate would have an easy guide in those abstract and subtle matters wherein so often lurks, unseen by the ordinary observer, a keen enemy to faith. The difference of school between him and the lamented BROWNSON will be at once perceived by those who study this paper carefully.

The continuation of "Rambles in the Rocky Mountains," by General JOHN GIBBON, is appropriately placed after FATHER HILL'S paper, and it will serve as an agreeable diversion from graver subjects. The General describes a most interesting region, relates several pleasing incidents, and he is perfectly at home in his narrative.

The fifth paper is a continuation of "The Divinity of Christ," by Right Rev. P. N. LYNCH. This is an article in every way—subject, treatment, etc.—worthy of the Review. Nothing more strongly proves that the so-called Reformation was a revolt against the headship of JESUS CHRIST than the fact, which is notorious and indisputable, that belief in His Divinity has almost totally died out of all the Protestant sects. Protestantism, indeed, is nothing more than the reflection of the quasi-religious thoughts and emotions of each succeeding generation, and it contains nothing of the same stability as the progress of a changeful intellect. It is merely the "spirit of the times." The human mind, having cast off all divinely authorized restraint, is now on the swing towards secularism and the rejection of all supernatural action upon this world, and Protestantism, as a matter of course, follows. Therefore it disbelieves in the Divinity of JESUS CHRIST. Bishop LYNCH'S paper is, accordingly, appropriate to the requirements of the times.

Following it we find "The Church and the Intellectual World," by Rev. ALEXIS BERNARD, S. J. Without depreciating the merits of the other writers, we may style this article the chief attraction of this number of the Revue. We have seldom read anything in a Catholic periodical which pleased us more. Father TRAINARD gives us a masterly resumé of the history of intellect from the foundation of Christianity down to the present day, and shows the relations existing between the ecclesiastical and secular mind during all that time. He shows how the Church dominated through, out and reigned supreme in the sphere of intellect. She was the authority, she was the guide, she was the judge of thought, and outside of her there was nothing but error or uncertainty. The efflux, then, of the modern corps of materialists who would restrict her action to the teaching of a brief code of morality to the young, must necessarily fail, because they attempt to master that which is now and always has been above and superior to themselves. The Church will always be not only a great but the leading intellectual power in the world, and without her presence the human mind would descend into something resembling idiocy.

The seventh paper is "Homeric Troy; Its Site and Remains," by F. A. PALEY, LL.D., Professor of Greek in the University of London. This paper is a contribution to the Homeric controversy which has been carried on for so many years by the most learned men of Europe, and which is not yet settled. Professor PALEY has studied the subject with great care, and has made a number of visits to the scene of the Trojan war, and he has brought to bear upon it the results of his researches. His paper is very interesting, and will be read with pleasure by all who are fond of the classics.

The eighth contribution, entitled "In Memoriam Orestes A. Brownson," by the editor, is a graceful and sympathetic tribute to the memory of the deceased reviewer, whose name and fame, we trust, will never be lost as long as Catholic literature exists in the land.

The ninth paper is devoted to book notices and criticisms. Our summing up is, that this number of the review is an excellent one.

A SENSATION IN DRY GOOD CIRCLES.—J. J. O'Brien, of the Arcade, Market street, has just created an immense sensation in dry good circles. He has just bought at a most unprecedented discount the stock of two and a half acres on the Sollar, the entire stock of the well known firm of A. Stoltz & Co., Kearny street. Depression of trade and other unfavorable circumstances forced this old and respected firm, of twenty-five years' standing, into bankruptcy and placed the entire stock upon the market. Mr. O'Brien, with that promptitude and energy characteristic of him, immediately secured the license per U. S. Government, and on the grounds, while the wholesale purchasers were looking the goods over, he had

The Civilization of the Nineteenth Century.

A very striking article appears in the current number of The Month, entitled, "Some Considerations on the Civilization of the Nineteenth Century." As may be seen from the title, the paper does not profess to deal exhaustively or completely with the subject, and, indeed, it would be idle to suppose it possible to treat it adequately in such a space. But for the ordinary reader a few salient considerations, well put, suggestive rather than fully discussed, are possibly rather more useful than an elaborate treatise. This paper may be reckoned among the suggestive ones, but its suggestions are sharp and strong, and they are so impressively that we would much prefer they were read by the enemies of the Catholic Church than by its friends. Condensed as the statement necessarily is, we think it impossible any candid inquirer, hostile or other, could rise from the perusal without thinking that the question is not rightly understood by those who believe that the Spirit of Pius IX. is not self-condemned by the mere fact that it declares the Church cannot reconcile itself with modern civilization. The writer divides European civilization in three epochs: the first the age of Faith, the second from the Protestant Reformation to the French Revolution, the third from the French Revolution to—who shall say what? Here is the author's idea of civilization as it has manifested itself in the third period:

> The French Revolution marks the epoch of the world into which we have been born. As I said at the beginning, the popular notion concerning this epoch is that it is an age of progress—that is, by common consent, its leading characteristic and its proudest claim to distinction and in process of tending to endeavor to form an estimate of it with reference to the conception of civilization which I have adopted, we will dwell in the first instance to consider wherein that progress lies. And I suppose the first thing which strikes the casual observer, as marking an incontestible superiority of this age over all the preceding, is the advance of physical science and the perfection to which the mechanical arts have been brought. Discovery and invention, it must be confessed, having been carried very far indeed. I do not think I need enlarge on this point. It is too trite. And I do not think I am wrong in placing it first among the items of our congress, for the advance of "Superstitious Religion," who certainly may claim to be an exponent of "modern thought," seems to identify this particular line of progress with the only conception of civilization he will allow of. Civilization, he tells us, in the passage I previously quoted, is nothing else but the knowledge and observance of natural laws." Another note of

THE PROGRESS OF THIS AGE.

> Which I find dwelt upon with great complacency, is the accumulation of wealth. The Times newspaper, and kindred organs of public opinion, discourse from time to time, in tones of almost awe-stricken solemnity, upon the fact that never before were there so many very rich men in a state, that never was the number of the comfortably-off so great. And further, it is implied that the advantage of wealth are diffused over beyond these limits and that the general level of physical comfort is much higher than it was a century ago.
> A third note of our progress, which is also formally celebrated, is what is called our intellectual advance. And this intellectual advance is said to be manifested in two ways. First, by the very general education—or by what is the same thing, the general possession of the people of the rudiments of elementary knowledge, and secondly, by the ever-increasing consumption of the human mind from every restraint of authority, whether in matters of religion, of morals, of politics or of literature. Hence the "liberty of the press," so justly reckoned a peculiar feature of these days, is the engrossing question of which all men are called upon to believe either pain, or is wrong, of reprobation.
> One more sign of our progress, which I should not omit to notice, consists in that greater softness of manners upon which we pride ourselves. Human life is more respected now than formerly, at least in the individual; punishments are less severe. Again, our habits are more refined. Even police are not shocked by the spectacle of degradation or disgrace in the subject. And further, philanthropy is everywhere at work, building hospitals, improving the dwellings of the poor, reforming the vicious, and generally assuaging the ills of life.
> Such, I think, are the more salient features of that modern "progress" so constantly dwelt upon by the organs of public opinion. And no doubt it is true that the present age of the world is distinguished in these respects from the preceding. In peace and prosperity, in wealth, in the general diffusion of knowledge, in freedom of opinion and its expression, and in softness of manners, there undoubtedly is a considerable advance in these days. It must, however, be remembered that there is a set off to be made against each of these items. Thus the advance of physical comfort, and the adaptation to human waste, have called into existence manufactories, and manufactories have created

THE MANUFACTURING CLASSES,

> And the lives of the men and women who constitute those classes—lives of monotonous toil, without childhood and without old age—can hardly be matter for congratulation, however impressive the results of their labors may be. Next, as to the increase of wealth, it must not be forgotten that if the rich were never so rich as at present, the poor were never so poor. Never was pauperism so rapid, so widespread, so essentially so strong. The contrast of the comfortable classes are paralleled by the degradation of the many. And here I may remark that, giving philanthropists all credit for the sympathies of their benevolence, they are doubtless whether their efforts to increase the physical well-being of the toiling masses really do much to diminish the sum of human misery. Once effect of a great development of wealth is to create artificial wants, and it seems to be at least questionable whether, to the majority of cases, the exercise of more benevolence do not result in the deepening of the consciousness of those wants. Again, the software of the day, with the segregrated society set upon human life," (1) the shrinking from the infliction of pain and from the sufferer entitles and corner side of existence, the "humanity," and "refinement" of the age, do not appear to us to be much nearer to be matter for such qualified satisfaction. Indeed, Mr. John Stuart Mill finds here an evidence of "moral debasement." (2) "Pain," he further observes, "did not appear," to the men of former times, "to be so great an evil as it appears, and as literally is, to us."
> Once more. As to the diffusion of knowledge, the general level in this respect is doubtless higher than in any previous age; but the dangerousness of a little learning is proverbial, and it may well be doubted whether the number of really well-educated men in these days is considerable. We have been told recently, on high authority, that 70 per cent. of the pass men at Oxford are entirely uneducated; and looking back on my own University experience, I am only surprised that the percentage was not put higher. It is indeed an age of great literary activity, emphatically a reading age, and to quote again Mr. Mill, "precisely because it is a reading age, and books which in the result of profound meditation is perhaps less likely to be duly and profitably read than at any former period." (3) Every one reads; but the vast majority of people apply this accomplishment only to the perusal of newspapers and novels; and it is difficult to say which of these classes of publications stardizes the most deteriorating influence. The one sets forth superficial and distorted accounts of current history, illustrated by crude theories and contemptuous philosophy; the other presents unreal views of life, and stimulates passions which, in ordinary, are active enough without artificial irritants. (4) Again, against the blessings of the general diffusion of knowledge must be set down the intense conceit which it produces in those who obtain the merest smattering of it. While a Newton likens himself to a child picking up shells on the shore of truth, the average Englishman of this century—I do not know that I need restrict the remark to our own country—claims to

JUDGE OF ALL THINGS IN HEAVEN AND EARTH

> By the "desires and motives which have been driven into his mind." (5) And the judgments thus formed, summed up, and put into practice by the organs of public opinion, has so large a share in producing them, constitute that "public opinion" which is, to many worlds ago, a "species of religion"; in these days, "having its majority of intelligent proficients" (6), and whose hand is so heavy upon individuality, upon every digression from the beaten track. Why, by such phenomena, and regards as unknowable everything ascertainable by the senses, Mr. Lecky remarks: "The tendency towards materialism is too manifest to escape the attention of observers." (7) The adept certain words of Mr. Alton, "The action of a physical whole, without sympathy or accord for its parts, has succeeded to the notion of a father and his children." (11)
> We shall hardly make one for better quotation, which we do for the sake of the

NOBLE SPIRIT OF CONFIDENCE IN THE RESULTS

> And, therefore, in the ultimate triumph of the Church which it indicates:
> "It is commonly said—one may read it every day in the leading articles—that the age in which we live are gloomy for Catholics; that the result of their Church has at length been fairly tested, and that, consequently, their confidence are confirmed by the history of eighteen centuries, interpreted the signs of the times otherwise. The days are evil, not for the Church, but for human society, which is in process of dissolution—and they are large days for the Church. The passing bell, which is heard by the keenest ears of the age, tells, not of the death of the religion of Jesus Christ, but of the dissolution of the old secular order of which it was the life. It is true that throughout that portion of the world which the Church once baptized 'Christendom,' her sanctuaries are pillaged, her discipline invaded, her rights derided, her ministers persecuted, her doctrines blasphemed; it is true that her Sovereign Pontiff has been despoiled of his temporal principality, that religion is outraged in the Holy City, where it was once a throne. But there the harm which has been done her, the harm which can be done her, ends. Her assailants outside of the age see only strike at her accidentals. Her Divine life is beyond its reach. And never throughout her long career has she given proofs of more exuberant vitality than in this moment. Never did her Supreme Infallible Oracle speak with clearer accents from the Chair of Truth; never was her Episcopate more firmly united to its centre and head; never were her children more thoroughly of one heart and one mind; never were her modes of action so varied and so fruitful. In this age of the world,

THE SNARED PENIANS.

> Mr. O'Connor Power has extracted from Mr. Darcy an acknowledgment that the case of the Fenian prisoners was not known to him when, in answer to the question of Mr. Maurice Brooks, he announced that he could not recommend her Majesty to grant an amnesty. Mr. Darcy, in making that statement, he said, was the 23d of May, and the Government did not hear of the escape until the 26th of June. Mr. Disraeli gave this information with a very bad grace; it was quite evident that the Government had no wish to publish it. The telegraph heads she never even sees. How is greedy for long news, and is content with the keenest relish. Marriages and deaths are always interesting to her, and accordingly are exciting and stimulating. Sheg are has little for printed jokes, and the very rudest attempts upon the same and then delights in them and never forgets them. She pays particular attention to epitaphs. Obituaries she reads with avidity. Leaders she rather better authority than any living first-hand writer. The distinction is slight but between the two is one of degree only, not of kind; that moral evil is merely the absence of good, and that as we remove the latter, so we inevitably remove the former; that there is no degree of the latter in the state which leads to the annihilation of moral evil; that knowledge is virtue and ignorance is vice; that all we have to do, not a reality; that the Creator does not punish, except in the sense that He withholds reverence is in likely to be punished. Mary years ago a gentleman in a subordinate department of the Bank of Ireland discovered a device more useful that hair-splitting, though of the like nature: he found out a way of using the same sheet of each note became two, and to all appearance were the same as when they were one, including, of course, the watermark and all the rest of it. He got the secret, and all the rest of it. He got the secret, and informed the Government of the result of his ingenuity; whereupon, & his solemn promise of secrecy, that he actually spoiled a higher number than Mr. Ormsby Gore, who therefore got into the House by error, who therefore got into the House by error, who is commonly termed a "duke," and in short, that Captain O'Beirne has all the characteristics of the representative of the county.—Dublin Weekly News.

LIEUT. FRED GRANT SAFE.—

> A Washington dispatch says it is not true, as has been generally supposed, that Lieut. Fred Grant, an officer of the Seventh Cavalry, was with his command in the Indian fight at Little Big Horn River. Lieut. Fred is in Washington, residing at the Executive Mansion, lamenting that his father's services during the war in no way prevented his getting a share in the independent press. Three of Fred's classmates already killed in battle, and he is chagrined by bullets shot from the latest improved arms furnished by the Peace Commissioners, and the gentleman who invented it, no desire to share such glory for many years to come.

The Daily Life of Pope Pius IX.

[Translated from the Rose Publié]

Pius IX., like the greater number of ecclesiastics, is an early riser. At an hour when all in Rome are asleep, lights are already seen behind the high windows of the Vatican. It is half-past five. The Pope's bedroom door suddenly opens and his Holiness appears. Buon giorno, says the Pope in a clear, distinct voice to his aged valet de chambre, Signor Zingolini, who is dressed in violet colored robe, and who congratulates his master on his good feeling of unheard-of quantities of snuff. Signor Zingolini then enters the Pope's room, shaves him, dresses him, and then leaves him in his private suite of rooms. At 7 o'clock the Pope returns to his chapel, where he celebrates and also hears Mass. It is at this morning Mass where he admonishes the sacristanous to foreigners of distinction visiting Rome. He is considered a very high honor to receive the sacraments from the hands of his Holiness; but in order to partake of this privilege one must be up at five to the morning. Every person in the Vatican must be present at the celebration of the Mass, including the Noble Palatine Guards, Swiss Guards, etc.

Service being concluded, Pius IX passes into the refectory, where already smoking on the table stands a tureen of soup in which float a number of pieces of bread. Guess. The Pope qualifies the soup with a glass of Irvieto wine, eats four or five biscuits, and now it is almost time o'clock, and now it is almost time o'clock, when he passes into his business room. He is seated at his table—before him is the crucifix and the image of the Holy Virgin. Cardinal Antonelli, exhausted and short-red by long illness, has, in order to avoid irregular brightness could be pensioned, and is himself now in his sovereign.

But Sefior Castelar is inconsistent with himself and with his own history. Of the Spanish orator, who is not a statesman, the most stumbled faith to the ultimate triumph of truth; and he believes that truth is to be found in Protestantism—for which, under suppression can be consistently desire the introduction of Protestantism into Spain—why does he not hold his tongue? Why does he stir the cleric-Liberal question? Secure in his faith, in his "private-ly," why does he not kneel down on the floor—gentlemen, oppose as you may, he will only go on nothing, and we shall prevail?" Why does he not say to Sefior Castelar that his faith he pretends to have to his own "private-ly" is nothing?

And he is inconsistent with his own party. Hasmarck, thirdball, and all the Liberals of Germany and Europe in general have been and are daily using force to the discomfiture of their Liberalism. Where, then, is their faith in the triumph of that truth which they would have the Spanish people accept? Are not the civilized forces must be used in opposition to error; and that it will not do to rely wholly upon the truth in order to win the battle against the Church. Evidently Sefior Castelar has no such support! With his own party when he advises the clerical party to the ultimate triumph of truth.

The inconsistency of Sefior Castelar as an historical fact shows a wonderful weakness of faith in the Spanish Republic. Everywhere, and at all times, in the nineteenth century, the Liberal party has invariably appealed to force in its ultimate triumph of truth. A noise is heard of the rustling of armed men. The News is guards line the hall, then the door of the Pope's room is thrown open, and the Chamberlain, in all of the Pope's Court, announces in a very touching incidents.

Pius IX. is now twelve o'clock. The Pope walks in his gardens, accompanied by five or six cardinals and other dignitaries of the Church. It is then promenade that the Pope, hears all that takes place in the city. Nothing of the kind does not escape his notice. He is made aware of all the doings and sayings of the day before, and of all that is passed. He is then reconducted to private apartments, and the cardinals leave him to himself.

Dinner is served. It is now which is known as the Pope's dinner, and it is simple, and I will like upon myself to notice. The repast, which is invariably in a regular, but lately also consists of two dishes. Ordinarily the Pope contents himself with soup, some vegetables and fruit. He is extremely fond of macaroni. Pius IX. dines alone and with the apparently, as he is surrounded by two newly dressed mulatto boys, with cigars in their mouths, were sauntering leisurely by.

"Here's old man Methuselah," remarked one, while the other began to sing, "Her name is Mary Ann, and she's only nine days old." "Methuselah—his name was Mathuselah. When did you get your name changed?

But before the sable colored warbler could finish his ditty the object of his sercan-tions turned upon him with a terrific look, and the music died away in a subdued growl. "Methuselah—his name was Mathuselah. When did you get your name changed?

"Well, then, your sixty. How is she? Pardon me, old boy, for saying that you look well. Why, I have not seen you for years, and here I am not married yet. Now, how is Mrs. Methuselah, eh?"

"Mr. Parker, the lady of whom I live at present is my fourth wife. I don't like the tone in which you speak of this subject."

"Oh, if you don't, don't you? Well, when a man observes a gentleman and a lady that he oughn't to talk about his sensibility. I don't care how your wife is. Hang your entire family!"

Parker took the early train for California.—Parisian Bulletin.

"Py Schimmy, how dot guy studies de language!" is what a delighted elderly German said when his four-year old son called him a "dear-eyed son of a sea-horse."

SAINT VIVIANA.

Held in the Catacombs of Rome while centuries rolled away.
St. Viviana's form reposed until that happy day
When searching hands, by science led, the silence did invade,
And found when 'neath the marble cold the martyr-child was laid,
And brought the sacred relics forth. What changes earth had known
Since, redeeming the martyr's doom, she won the martyr's throne!

The Roman Empire's pomp and pride forever passed away—
The tyrant and his subject hordes long moldered into clay;
The memory of their lives, a name, their palaces laid low,
Except left unchanged but the one Faith she died for long ago—
Faith the Saviour planted first, which His Apostle spread,
Which lives of saints have glorified and blood of martyrs fed;

The holy Faith, whose fadeless light illumines every clime—
The rock-built Church, whose cross-crowned walls have triumphed over time—
The Church whose children fondly own whate'er their land or home,
Allegiance to God's Vicar here, the holy Pope of Rome.

Our Father Pius, he who gave unto this Western field
The relics of the martyr saint a treasure fair to hold,
When pleading for his beloved flock our reverend Bishop stood;
And gave the precious years of toil and holy zeal made good,
A proud material he hath raised in Viviana's name,
And the fair land beside the sea an added grace doth claim—
The City of the Angels' holds the priceless treasure now,
More precious than the regal gems that wreath a Sultan's brow.

The relics of the holy saint, the virgin pure and mild,
Who witnessed for the faith of Christ while yet she was a child;
The saint whose pleading prayers for me a bounteous love obtained
Whereby when kneeling at the font of grace from the treasure store of heaven's eternal King,
The talisman life, the holy death, the virtues meet, fold
Of one dear patroness, shall win joys for the land of gold.

Her courage, like a shield of power, will guard the young from ill;
And cheer them on the upward way, the heavenly crown in will;
Not closed 'round her Bible's life her tender care will twine,
With blessings still a thousand fold on him who had saved her shrine—
Whose zealous heart and holy hands have toiled for God alone;
Where flowers of Faith are brightening now the desert he hath sown.

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of July 1.

ANTRIM.

The annual cattle show of the Northwest Agricultural Association, which contemplends the enamias of horse, cattle, sheep, pigs, and poultry, was held this week at Ballycastle. It was particularly good in sheep and implements.

Last week a tenant-right meeting was held at Newtownbutler, about three miles from Belfast, Mr. James Greer, of Annadale, presiding, when resolutions were passed congratulating the farmers of Ulster on the effects of their unanimous and outspoken condemnation of Mr. Mulholland's bill.

On Sunday morning a man named Samuel McIlveen, who was poaching on Lord Templetown's estate, at Hannahstown, about four miles from Belfast, was shot dead by the Lordship's gamekeeper. The dog belonging to the poacher was killed on the premises. The latter was entirely stripped naked and McIlveen, who was dressed in a pair of trousers and shoes on his arm, was captured, and is at present under treatment in the Royal Hospital, Belfast. The wife of the poacher was shot a few days since another poacher was shot in a similar manner by Sir Richard Wallace's gamekeeper, near the same place.

ARMAGH.

A Portadown correspondent of the Belfast Examiner writes: "A large meeting of owners of horse power was held in the Temperance room, town hall, on Wednesday evening, William John Dickson, Esq., in the chair, for the purpose of forming an association for the protection of their interests against dishonest tenants."

CORK.

At the Cork Board of Guardians last week a singular case of pauper deportation was brought under notice. Two orphan children, were brought from New Youghal to Liverpool to an Italian steamer. Both the little portion of the children were transferred to the Cork Steamship Company's steamer Minnie for conveyance to Cork, no intimation being given as to the mother's condition. During the voyage to Cork she became very ill and had to be placed under restraint. On her arrival it devolved upon the company to make some provision for her, and through the interposition of a doctor and a relieving officer, she with her children were transferred to the workhouse. From the facts never. Cork workhouse. From the facts never-disclosed it appears that the woman's husband is in New York, and that she belongs to Dingle.

Mr. P. S. Bridge has served notice of his intention to apply to the grand jury of the county of Cork, at the forthcoming assizes, for £2 000, compensation for the injuries he sustained in the late outrage near Mitchelstown. Mr. Delmege's letter suggesting the formation of a farmers' association for the protection of farmers' interests was read. Mr. Lyle said any one of the kind, on the ground test the objects of the association could only be aggressive, and confined to protection against the tenants. The idea that the tenants had any notion of encroaching upon the legitimate rights or property of the landowners was universally scouted.

A thunderstorm passed over Carndonagh on Wednesday, and one case is reported of a woman having been struck and severely burned by the flash. She states that a ball of fire came in at the door and tore up the earthen floor, overturning the table on which it fell and smashing the glass in the window. Large stones were carried up and down. Large stones were carried up and down. The woman is considerably shocked.

LONGFORD.

At Longford quarter sessions the number of cases entered for hearing were four criminal cases, nine ejectments, 237 civil bills. The chairman said he regretted much to state that the results for trial arose out of drunkenness, and of a very peculiar description. At a former quarter sessions a most serious case of assault arose out of a drunken row at a marriage, and now it appeared that on this occasion is arose out of a funeral proceeding. The same actors were the same, and the person of forming an association for the protection of their interests against dishonest tenants."

SLIGO.

Considerable excitement was created in Sligo, on Saturday afternoon, by the ringing of an alarm bell from the spire of Calvary church. A crowd of people hastened to the spot, when it was found that a portion of the roof of the building had taken fire. The military engine was soon brought from the barracks, by a fatigue party of the Sligo R.-s, and under the directions of Adjutant Phibbs and Lieutenant Campbell the men worked with a will, and very soon the fire was got under, very little damage being done.

At the Ballymote quarter sessions, the Chairman, addressing the Grand Jury, concluded thus: "There are no cases for you to go before you and one of assault, and such a calendar sustains the peaceful character of this portion of the county since I became connected with it."

At the last quarter sessions held at Manorhamilton, the Chairman was presented with a pair of white gloves, there being no criminal business.

WATERFORD.

Last week the foundation-stone of the Cappoquin industrial school was laid by Rev. Patrick Power, P.P., in the unavoidable absence of the Most Rev. Dr. Power, Bishop of the diocese.

At the Waterford quarter sessions, George Waters, Esq., Chairman of the county, addressing the Grand Jury, said there were only five bills to go before them. Two were for assault. One of these did not properly belong to the county at all, as it occurred on board a ship at Passage, and the parties to it were not connected with Waterford at all. He was very happy to see that the county maintained the high character he had always been able to give of its people since his connection with them.

WESTMEATH.

At the last meeting of the Athlone Board of Guardians it was proposed by Mr. James Kelly, and seconded by Mr. T. W. Russell, "That we think the Poor Law Returns should be published monthly," and it was resolved that a copy of the resolution be forwarded to the Poor Law Board.

WEXFORD.

At the quarterly meeting of the county Wexford Independent Club and Household Association, held in the Tontine Hall, Wexford, on Monday, New Year, on Tuesday, Rev. P. M. Furlong, C. C., in the chair, the ordinary routine business of the association having been disposed of, it was resolved on the motion of Rev. Thomas Sinnott, seconded by Mr. P. Meehan—That we record our expression of regret at the deplorable result of the late election at Cork; that the signal manifestation of the division it the ranks of the National and Home Rule party is much to be regretted, as example has shown the necessity of united and harmonious action in every contest, and that the previous action in every contest, and that the previous action in every place for holding the annual Home Rule meeting and bazaar having been duly considered, it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. Michael Brown, seconded by Mr. P. Meehan—That the next meeting of the Club be held at Enniscorthy on the usual, in order to make the necessary arrangements."

WICKLOW.

At the usual fortnightly court of Petty sessions at Tinnahly, Mr. Pedlar, Superior of inland revenue, Wicklow district, prosecuted Michael Hayden, a farmer residing at Kilkenny, for obstructing him and his colleagues in the discharge of their duty. Mr. Pedlar, solicitor, appeared for the Crown, and said that Patrick Murphy, an under gamekeeper to Lord Fitzwilliam, prosecuted the defendant Matthew Toole (Hayden's step) for carrying a gun without a license. Toole had been fined £2 10s., which he refused to pay, and it accordingly came before the bench. Mr. Pedlar, Q. C., said that Mr. Pedlar's duty as collector of the land revenue was about to make the arrest as stated by two police constables, when Hayden, the defendant, obstructed him. They prevented the arrest being made. The defendant pleaded guilty, and Mr. Pedlar said that the penalty for the offence was £200, but in consequence of the defendant having suffered only impose the following fine of £50.

A Heaven-Promising Ailment.

Physicians, who certainly ought to be the best judges of such matters, declare that some ailments are a blessing to the patient in every instance. When the temporary effect of a sound ailment is mentioned and regarded as a blessing, in the case of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, or the action of tonic and alterative properties combined with it, it must be admitted that the statement is correct. Physical energy and restorative of those conditions of the body which invigorate the mind and regulate the impulses of the will. The Bitters are a remedy for the nervousness which so many have observed the gradual approach of, and which, if not checked, paves the way for confirmed dyspepsia, or epilepsy, or paralysis, or insanity. Appetite, sleep, and regularity of the functions of digestion and assimilation are promptly restored by this benign tonic. Its health is sound and true, the blood is purified, and the system is fortified against the assaults of malaria, rheumatism, kidney complaint, and constipation.

HEADACHE, languor and melancholy spring from a disordered and constipated stomach, or a torpid liver. Each may read themselves by Dr. Jayne's Sanative Pills, a form of medicine which has been in use for many years, and will be found to combine the most thorough healthy action, renders all bilious attacks, and every symptom of the same, impossible. CAPE COD AHLAZE.—Boston, July 19.—A terrible fire has been raging in the woods of Cape Cod, in the neighborhood of Yarmouth, since yesterday morning. It was started by some boys near Weir Village. It rapidly spread to the town of Dennis and Brewster, destroying several buildings. At noon to-day the fire was raging and rapidly nearing Harwich. The track of the fire is nine miles long and two or three wide. Some thirty square miles of territory has been burned over. The loss is roughly estimated at half a million. A force of three hundred men have vainly endeavored to stop his progress.

VOL. XIX. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1876. NO. 48.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Hon. General James A. Garfield is a very pious politician, an ex-preacher, a purveyor of moral platitudes and a lecturer on ethical subjects. So is Schuyler Colfax a pious individual. He writes for religious journals, lectures before Young Men's Christian Associations and Good Templar lodges, and has a beaming countenance; yet he took the Credit Mobilliar bribe, and lied about it, just as Garfield did.

On the 25th of August Hon. William A. Wheeler, the Republican candidate for Vice-President of the United States, said he hardihood to say, at a public meeting of his supporters at St. Albans, Vt., that "there is not to-day in the late slave States any man holding a prominent position who was not identified in the great struggle as against the Government." And this in the face of the fact that the negro Revel represents Mississippi in the United States Senate; the blackguard carpet-bag Republican Spencer occupies a similar position from Louisiana; that the rebel guerrilla Moseby is a prominent Republican official in Virginia, and that the famous Confederate General Longstreet is a Hayes and Wheeler supporter in Louisiana. So accustomed have the Grant party become to lying that they know not what truth means. On the other hand, the ablest soldiers of the war—such as Hooker, Sherman, Hancock, McClellan, Rosecrans and Sigel—support Tilden and Hendricks.

John Chiddy, as employed on the Bristol and Exeter Railway, was walking beside the line when he happened to catch sight of a large block of stone placed carefully on the rail. The fast express train—known as the "Flying Dutchman"—was dashing up at fifty miles an hour. John Chiddy did not hesitate. There was no time left for reflection. He rushed on between the rails, and pushed the stone hurriedly off. The train passed by, it were saved, but Chiddy himself was struck and killed. He left a widow and several children, who, out of his wages as a quarryman we may doubt if enough was left to provide for his requirements in decent fashion. A public appeal was made for the widow and children. It produced the magnificent sum of £3 17s.! England, we all know, expends men to do their dirty work. There are no "Flying Dutchmen" in England!

The great Centennial Regatta on the Schuylkill comes began August 28th. In the first heat of the four-oared race, between the Vesper, Atalanta, Columbia, Quaker City, University, Kuskas came in first; Dublin second. Time, 9:29½. The second heat was rowed at 2:15. The boats were the Vesper of Philadelphia, Yale University and the Crescent Boat Club of Philadelphia. The Vespers and Yale pulled a nice race. Yale sparred and led by two lengths, which they held as they passed the flag, in 9:02½. Time, 9:20½. The Vespers, 9:30½. The third heat took place between the Columbia College crew and the Elizabeth Rowing Club of Portsmouth, Va. The Columbia drew slowly up on the race until the finish, when it was a hard struggle. The Columbias winning in 9:11. The fourth heat was between the Beaverwyck, Falcon and Duquesne Boat Clubs. The Beaverwycks led from the start, and were never headed. Duquesne second, Falcon third, the fifth heat was between the Rosna and Watkins Boat Clubs, Malta having withdrawn. The Rosna boat stopped several times, and the only contest pulling either power, owing to weeds. Watkins cleared the course in 9 minutes, 5½ seconds. The sixth heat came next, between the London Rowing Club and the Northwestern Club of Chicago, the Atlantes having withdrawn because of sickness. The signal was given, and London soon led by a quarter of a length, making a clean and beautiful start. Neither boat was headed, and the crew of the latter showed their speed until amid the cheers of the multitude the London crew pulled past the flag in 8 minutes, 55 seconds, followed by the Northwestern 41 seconds later. The seventh heat was between the First Trinity crew of Cambridge and the Undines. The former won in 9 minutes, 6½ seconds. The latter seemed exhausted, and came in in 9 minutes, 41 seconds.

A correspondent of the New York Sun charges Governor Hayes, the Radical candidate for the Presidency, with being a member of the "American Alliance," the Know-Nothing order which has indorsed him, and says it is "a secret order, like that of Odd Fellows." The correspondent says of here the best assurance that Governor Hayes was elected a member of said order on the morning of July 5th, and that he sent a letter in the Secretary fully subscribing to its principles." Referring to the above fact, the Boston Pilot says: "But it is well for us, if, blown with the Irish and Catholic, the Germans, Swedes and every other class of us natural citizens, to bear in mind that to-day Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Hayes are supported by every anti-foreign Know-Nothing clique that disgraces the Union. Hayes and Wheeler represent and indorse the party that has brought disgrace on the fair national name; that has robbed the people; that has murdered the trade and commerce of the country; that has established a rule of office-holders to destroy the liberties as they have destroyed the labor of the people."

A meeting of the clergy of the diocese of Tuam was held last month in the Cathedral for the election of a Coadjutor to the venerable Archbishop, who has completed the eighty-fifth year of his life and the fifty-first of his episcopacy. His Grace is the senior Archbishop in the world, and sets after the patriarchs at the Ecumenical Council. His Grace preserves his mental and physical vigor unimpaired, and is at the present time engaged in his annual confirmation progress over his extensive diocese, which covers the largest area in Ireland, comprising the greater part of the two counties of Mayo and Galway, the second and fourth largest in Ireland. His Grace continues to celebrate Mass in the cathedral every morning at eight o'clock; preaches in both Irish and English to his flock on Sunday; and it was but the other day we read his eloquent reply to an address from the people of Belmullet, in the diocese of Clonfert, on his passing through that town to administer the Sacrament of Confirmation in the parish of Moore, an isolated portion of his diocese. Among the names mentioned as likely to be sent forward to Rome by the clergy are those of his Lordship the Most Rev. Dr. McEvilly, Lord Bishop of Galway, and the Very Rev. Thomas MacIlale, Professor of the Irish College, Paris. His lordship is a diocesan of Tuam, and for many years occupied the position of President of St. Jarlath's College, now worthily filled by the Very Rev. Canon U. J. Bourke, so favorably known for his works on the Irish language. Dr. J. MacIlale is also a diocesan of Tuam, and is a nephew of his Grace the Archbishop.

There are to day in St. Louis, Mo., thirty-four parish churches, twenty-seven parish schools, five Catholic hospitals, an orphanage, three Catholic colleges, seven Catholic orphan asylums and three female protectories and reformatories. There are about sixty secular priests and forty-five priests belonging to orders, all actively at work. There are thirteen female religious Orders, and seven male religious Orders, each, according to its institute, doing the work of God. There are now four Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul, numbering 1,100 active members, and distributing each year, in systematic and judicious charity, fully $20 000. And there is a Catholic population of at least 150,000. There is no form of human misery, not on ill the flesh is heir to, which does not find a relief in the Catholic Church of St. Louis. The orphans, the sick, the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the fallen women, the widow, the helpless infancy and helpless old age, for all these there is help and comfort, and that without distinction of race or creed.

In the course of a speech in Albany, N. Y., recently, Mr. Payne of Ohio said: "Only day General Custer came to my seat in an excited manner, with tears in his eyes, and told me that he had been subpœnaed to travel from Washington Territory to Louisiana, a distance of three thousand miles, to testify before the Congressional Committee. His testimony was to be excused from the unpleasant duty. After he had given his evidence, he called upon Gen. Grant, who refused to see him and dismissed him in disgrace." Custer was sent to fight the Indians with 300 soldiers, because "all the available force" was needed for election purposes in the Southern States.

The leading German Republican and Liberal voters of Chicago have issued a manifesto to their fellow-countrymen, giving their reasons for voting for Tilden and Hendricks. The address, which is signed by Edmund Jussen, Gus. H. Unger, F. Baumann, Edward Rummel, Philip Stipp, and several hundred other German Republicans and Liberals, concludes as follows: "But in Samuel Tilden we recognize the man to combat the evils of the hour. His name alone is a watchword of reform. He is not tortured and bound, hand and foot, by pledges to corrupt politicians; he is not supported by rings and associations, by political knights of the road who bring their shining lances to bear upon the pockets of the people. His nomination is the result of the spontaneous and irrepressible will of the people to place an honest, energetic and able man at the head of the nation. Amid shouts of applause his name was proposed by Charles Francis Adams, in the New York Conference of Liberal Republicans. He has already proven that he possesses the requisite courage and ability to treat upon an honest administration of public affairs, and to unmask political thieves and scoundrels. His capacity and zeal for reform have long enjoyed a national reputation. He does not stand in need of the recommendation of personal friends that he is equal to the task. He will give us honest money, as he will give us an honest administration. No fraud will escape him; corruption will in vain seek to thrive where he commands, and through his election we may well expect to re-establish the original purity of our instit

ALICE OF BALLINASLOE.

With footsteps the fairest, with prospects the brightest,
With hopes for a future unclouded by care,
All gladness and mercy, "my own mary Kerry"
Is left for a moment, and four months of widowhood,
And happy as children, by marriage united,
Sir Montague and Lady Alice, their chosen the resort
Where nature looked fairest, their choice the most sheltered
Of all the sweet valleys in sunny Killarney,
And eighty Novembers to Montague merry go round.
They thought not of sorrow, they dreamed not of pain,
My thoughts all rapture, "my husband on my right hand
The peerless young Alice of Ballinasloe.

Her eyes' brilliant lustre—her hair in a cluster,
Overlooking a forehead as white as the snow!
A form like a fairy, so joyous and airy,
A step just as light as the bound of a roebuck,
Caused so with gladness, he'd gaze every hour—
The dangerous, the chosen, the boon for the universe,
A grief that could banish, a joy that was true!
Ye hope not impossible, ye anxious believing
Who pine and who sigh, and who would never believe!
Be fed, for there are, oh! how many such as my wife!
The peerless young Alice of Ballinasloe!

Whoever she fits by me, at distance or near me,
Whether she sits by track, bringing tears to my eyes,
I watch with fondness her every motion,
And breathe fervent prayers for her welfare on high.
Each fold of her costume, each word, glance and gesture,
My memory treasures as misers its gold;
"The joy in her word, in her air, in her bow,
Is enough to arouse a heart to love and to hope."
In truth there is no one has had such an influence
As Alice, another in presence, the visiting in sway;
Then bless the sleet, white strangers she met,
I pray for young Alice of Ballinasloe.

Each hour of the day-time, to others a gay time,
I count as a curse—a blot on my life;
For darkness sight pining, and weep half my time
For those who
To cheer the declining—to raise the lowly,
Something to others—to others, not to myself,
The more and the more, the sooner and the purer
A very joy seems to have had power
By Alice the young Alice of Ballinasloe,
Her sweet blessing, was raised hands approving
Me.

I implore Heaven to bless my wife!
To unchanging love of Ballinasloe,
Bestowed by young Alice of Ballinasloe.

Ah! had I been bolder for the spot I love best!
Or more
Of—shadowless love, as trees and as fair too,
As rich and as pure and proud of the West,
The Record of nature, and praise of the West,
The Wonder of Christ, and with him
Of Saints and celebrities, of glory and love;
I would have wrought, I would have sung in her,
Her heart's depth of feeling with music and words;
And sung it so ardent, her country should love,
And sung it so approval, her country should love,
Her sweet blessing, my life like a rose,
Beside the sweet Alice of Ballinasloe.

SPEECH OF THE POPE.

On the Feast of St. James the Apostle his Holiness received in audience at the Vatican a large body of the students of the various foreign colleges and seminaries of Rome. Among them were students from the great College of Propaganda, the English, the German, American, Hungarian, Scotch, Greek, and the Belgian colleges, the establishment of the Eternal City, the pontifical seminaries of the Colleges Pio. They were accompanied by their superiors and professors, and constituted an immense assemblage in the Consistorial Hall of the Palace. The Holy Father entered the hall about noon, and was attended by Cardinals Franchi, Pasco and Bilio, and several prelates of the Papal household. The Rector of the Hungarian College read the address to his Holiness, and it conveyed to the illustrious Pontiff their heartfelt congratulations on the commencement of the thirty-first year of his glorious Pontificate. At the close of it his Holiness addressed the youthful assembly in the following sense:—

"If you be true to the vocation which you have been while, indeed, to instruct the people, and to enlighten them with the darkness of the Gospel, to melt the ice of green, the fire of sin in the souls His apostles may make of sin to the words of consolation to you.—Venite post me; faciam vos fieri piscatores hominum. Remember the miraculous draught of fishes which on filled the nets, but, nothing else to bear the great weight, the fishermen broke them here and there, and in this way a large portion of their fish lake. The great multitude of fish caught is the net signifies the multitude of believers who have enlisted the voice of God. The broken nets, from out of which many that had been taken and were originally in the sea, signify the heresies and schisms which have from time to time arisen, and which, alas, even in our own days, have thinned the ions of nations believers, and of the many who have been led astray by the perfidious and blind writers of the past century. These men have been the masters of error, the corrupters of the people through the influence which their position gave them, and have been the unchristian moralists, pitiless and oppressors of the Church of Jesus Christ. In due time you will be called upon to make use of that weapon which they have sought to corrupt, and it will be your duty to combat error in its various shapes, and especially by your exemplary lives. You will have to combat it with sound reasoning, founded on knowledge and with the grace of God. I am speaking to the young, and anxious as I am to receive a relief of your hundred reliable errors, I must allude to some which in certain places have been promulgated and by students in colleges. They are errors that have been the outcome of an anti-Catholic and anti-Christian spirit, not in vain, but errors that have sprung from a hell-born pride. These students have published a programme (and have directed it to the students of both benevolences) in which they declare that the religious training ought to be destroyed, and that according to the basis of their syllabus they desire to be atheists, revolutionaries and materialists. But from roots such as these there can only spring up a tree which withered branches, poisonous leaves and tainted fruit. It will be your duty in time to counteract these wild excesses, and to raise up the dignity of our manhood, which these people would fain trample in the dust, and which they would destroy in the train of the most revolting principles. But who are we, you will say, that we should put ourselves to carry against such numerous and such powerful forces? I know that you are still young, and that your studies are not yet finished, your souls are not yet fully strengthened to resist the attacks of passions, and, therefore, it is with reason you should ask who are we? Let take heart, my children;

NOTHING CAN WRONG OR ARREST CANNOT,

Who, believing giving the order for the sealing of the seas or pouring their hands to the work, commands us to direct our course in a good direction. But what better direction is there than that in which Jesus Christ precedes us? Venite post me. And what is the meaning of following Jesus? He himself tells us distinctly what it is—qui vult venire post me, abneget semetipsum, tollat crucem suam, et sequatur me. It there is one among you who is slothful, let him bestir himself—abneget semetipsum—since slothfulness is an obstacle to study and to works of piety. If there be another who is more than little disposed to discipline, let him self to humility. By such acts of self-denial you will make yourself fit for doing battle against the errors of the world, and you will be able to propagate in the world by your sacred ministry. As all are bound to keep close to the tracks marked out by the Divine Master, so the ministers of the sanctuary and all Catholics ought to tread with docility in the teachings which emanate from this Holy See. Train yourselves to respect that center of unity, which is a necessary to maintain the deposit of the faith. It is worthy of note, with reference to the incident of the drought of Odessa, to which I have already alluded, that the Holy See did the acts was given to several, in order to call into the Church not into the desert" was given to Peter alone. Solely to the Vicar of Jesus Christ is it appointed to launch the mystic vessel into the deep sea, to the end that, guided by faith and animated with hope, he may, with these and united with hope, he may, with these and united with hope, he may, with these and united

THE CHRONICLE ANSWERED.

In the last Sunday Chronicle there was an editorial article under the title of "Church and State," which requires from me more than a passing notice, and we cannot but express surprise that such sentiments were allowed to appear in that paper, for reasons that must be obvious. The purpose of the article is as unjust as it is apparent. It is to arouse the popular sentiments and direct it against the Roman Catholic Church, and against those of the holy faith who are of Irish blood. To this manifest purpose it professes itself to discover, and it suggests to its readers that they, too, ought to see, that "this Church has a policy to subserve, and in order to carry out that policy, is, through its ecclesiastical power and the teaching of the priesthood, giving direction to the Catholic vote, and is endeavoring, for some secret and covert purpose, to control the politics of this country." Ingeniously or cunningly enough it continues: "In this argument we will not undertake to prove what this policy is, or its purpose." Perhaps had that paper essayed the proof, its readers might have had either the opportunity to discover in time the conspiracy, or the meanness of its own prejudice or distemper, or that it is itself wholly in a policy to subserve in a political way, to the success of which it is a first essential to assail the Church, and excite animosity against the adopted or native citizens of the Irish race. And we shall now engage to show from its own columns that it has such a policy as we insinuate. It says: "We see all other nationalities divided in political opinions, but this one is not; we see the Negro and other religious denominations divided in party allegiance; this one is a unit. We find Irishmen, with few exceptions, Catholics; we find Irish Catholics, with few exceptions, Republicans." Again: "It is enough, right here, to prove the animus of the Chronicle. To use a common phrase, in that which we have first quoted, it "let the cat out of the bag!" and we may be sure that could it only find Irishmen, with few exceptions, Catholics; and Irish Catholics, with few exceptions, Republicans, neither the Church nor her Irish Catholics would have a warmer temporary friend than the Chronicle. But the vote of the "Irish Catholic" cannot be coerced or got by such extraordinary arguments, bluts or persuasion.

The Chronicle thus states as a fact that the Irish and other "nationalities"—a blunder of classification, by the way, which we wish the Chronicle could successfully labor to make good—are to the Church as they are to all other denominations, in respect to party allegiance. It is not true that the "Irish Catholics" are united in their politics, nor that in party allegiance the Church is united. It is true, however, that the great proportion of the voters of Irish birth or lineage are alike Catholics and Democrats, and they are so for the best of reasons. In answer to the Chronicle's question, "Why are they Democrats?" we will proceed to state. They are, for reasons which constitute the brightest traits of character in the Irish as a race, devoted to their faith; and, as a people, imperiled alike with the love of liberty and the sentiments of gratitude to their benefactors. As the Chronicle bears witness—yet it is remarkable that it does not seem to see by the law knowledge—"that no other nationality so devoted to the Roman [Catholic] Church as the Irish, and no people who adhere more closely to its teachings." We need not multiply nor add proofs to this, which is in itself the noblest and proudest boast that ever consecrated a race to the service of Almighty God, or gave lustre to a people in the practice of the cardinal virtues. But it is worthy to be heard of seeing good in this very fact it utters, the Chronicle seeks to pervert it into a reproach or grievous evil. It ought to observe that it is but the natural and harmonious consequence of the very highest devotion to their Church—while all other nationalities have at one time or another succumbed to the popular storm and surrendered or bartered their religious birthright once the "Irish Catholics" to be what they are in the land of liberty. In the early days of the Republic, when Irish emigrants landed upon our shores they found two great political parties. One of these extended to them the hand of cordial welcome, and invested them, after a suitable probationary term, with the sacred right of citizenship. The other frowned upon their coming, and endeavored to withhold from them the blessings and benefits of naturalization. The old Federal party received them as fellow, and treated them as unwelcome visitors. The Democratic party greeted them as brethren and admitted them to full fellowship as citizens.

Gratitude has ever been a shining attribute of the Irish race, and hence, if for no other reason, they early manifested their gratefulness to the Democratic party by their adhesion and devotion to it, just as in every war in which the country has been involved they have proved their earnest patriotism by the peril and the sacrifice of their lives in its behalf. But it is not for this reason alone the great mass of the "Irish Catholics" are Democrats. It is because they are devoted to the cause of liberty, and are disposed to the largest measure of freedom in every respect compatible with good government and the best interests of the whole people, that they are Democrats; for in that party and in its principles, which have never undergone change from the ancient Fih of the Fathers of the Republic, they find the precious liberty and the wholesome measure of freedom, and also that toleration and that absence of hatred and caste distinction and discrimination on account of race or religious creed, which are not to be found in the party opposed to it. The Democratic party never sought to interdict the emigrants from foreign lands from the precious boon of American citizenship it never created a popular sentiment against any race on account of its country or religion; it never had part or agency in originating either open or secret organizations—such as the Native American and Know-Nothing—in the era of need and sole purpose of a crusade against Irish and Catholics; it never acknowledged as its leaders or continued in fellowship those who declared that "Popery must be exterminated," or who asserted that "Chinamen are better than the Irish;" and it never, in any State or in any instance, tried to make the religion or the nativity of the citizen a test of election or the qualification to public office or employment. Whenever it has triumphed in any community or State, or got control of the General Government, it has not then suddenly discovered and announced to mankind that "No Irish need apply," nor has it favored any class or race to the exclusion or prejudice of any other. It does not preach the Gospel of hate against any people because of national locality, nor seek to inflame a conflict of races, which, if it shall ensue, cannot be otherwise than vindictive and bloody and everlastingly to be remembered. And it has never attempted, in which essence the "Irish Catholics" to be what they are in the land of liberty. The old Federal party received them as fellow, and treated them as unwelcome visitors. The Democratic party represented to be by those who agree with that Republican leader who holds them inferior to the Chinese.

And now we will close with a ready hint for the Chronicle to reflect upon. Does it think that any people worthy of respect were ever brought to leave a party which had always treated them as brethren and equals, and to go over to the opposite party, if it had no better welcome to offer them than constant and unjust abuse and misrepresentation? Is persistent, vindictive proscription? The Chronicle's party might profit by wisely considering this question, and it can hurt only itself by neglecting or refusing to do so.

THE CITY'S DANGER.

The great conflagration which happened on Monday night must be taken as convincing proof that this city is liable at any moment to be visited by a disaster as general and over-whelming as that which befell Chicago some time ago. When the newspapers were uttering their warnings then, and declaring the necessity of precautions against fire, many people imagined that this was useless work, more calculated to raise alarm than do any good. The peculiar position of San Francisco, the character of its buildings, the grade of its streets, and the nature of the climate were spoken of as if they furnished all possible guarantee against an extensive conflagration. Every intelligent citizen must now know their exact worth, and how far they can be depended upon. So far from San Francisco reaping any particular safeguard from destruction by fire, it seems to us that there is scarcely a city in the United States more exposed to such danger, or one in which the citizens need be more vigilant. The large and populous district lying south of Market street, the scene of the recent conflagration, is, by unanimous admission, allowed to be the place where a serious fire is most likely to have its origin; but there is no reason for expecting that if it made any headway at all, it would be confined to that locality. It is true that the strong winds generally blow towards the bay in a westerly direction, but the experience of Chicago, Boston and other places, demonstrates that a large fire works to windward almost as speedily and irresistibly as it does to leeward. In fact, once it gets beyond the control of the fire department, there is no telling what course it will take, or where it will stop, its path being the most capricious and unaccountable thing in the world. Above all, and before all, it must be remembered that it takes very little indeed to put a conflagration out of the control of the fire department. A delay of a few minutes in turning on an alarm, an accident to an engine on its way, a change in the wind, the most trivial circumstance, will work irremediable mischief.

The honest truth is, that the best organized and most active fire department is only good for checking incipient conflagrations, and is unable to cope with a fire of large dimensions. Therefore it is plain that upon the people themselves depends the protection of the city from overwhelming disaster. Beyond any doubt a large majority of the people of which San Francisco is visited are owing to a carelessness which might almost be classed as criminal. If the occupiers of houses, particularly those persons in charge of stores and factories, where furnaces are kept running, were a little more cautious, very great losses would be spared to the whole community. We dare say that in the case of Moseley's fire is discovered, it will be found to be nothing but negligence on the part of some individual who had charge of the machinery to some one of the factories destroyed. It may well be imagined that ordinary care would have prevented the whole and occurrence. The saddest feature about the fire is, after the loss of life by which it was unfortunately accompanied, the fact that the losses fall wholly upon poor families who can ill afford to lose anything. Quite a large number of respectable and industrious families have been deprived of all they possessed in the world and are in urgent need of help. We trust that steps to alleviate their sufferings will be taken by the proper authorities, and with the least possible delay. We are proud to say that the people of San Francisco have a credible reputation for ready generosity and active sympathy with suffering. On many an occasion they have displayed it, both towards strangers and foreigners, and we feel sure they will not be backward now when the elements for help are those of their own race and residing in their own city.

The readers of THE MONITOR will feel interested in learning that the health of the celebrated Irish orator, which some time ago seemed hopeless, appears to be returning, as may be inferred from a letter of Very Rev. Father Prendergast, who, writing from Dublin, August 8th, says: "I found Father Burke at the monastery of Tullow. He was in excellent spirits, overflowing with wit and intellectual life. His disease, however, has not been arrested, and he is near his interrogatory, in it not true that such is the spirit of proscription against Catholics throughout the land—simply to proclaim the fact that a candidate for any public position before the people is a Catholic, is quite sufficient of itself to array an enormous opposition to him, if not solely to defeat him? Hence, in proportion to their numbers there are fewer Catholics in the elective or appointed public offices in the Union than of any other faith or belief; and unless the Chronicle can show that the Catholics, in the proportion of, say one to ten, when in office are likely to "control the politics of the country," and to subvert the Government, it will be obliged to confess its error and its injustice in respect to them. Likewise it must admit that, since "intelligence is power" the "Irish Catholics" are not the "ignorant bigots" they are

THE POPE AND THE TURKS.

There is no one person living, we believe, who gives the San Francisco Chronicle more trouble than the Pope does. Of course the venerable Pontiff does not know it, and we are afraid he is even unaware of the existence of such a bright journalistic luminary as our "liberal" contemporary; but, nevertheless, his sayings and doings, real and imaginary, but principally the latter, impose a great deal of troublesome work upon the Chronicle. There is hardly an issue of the paper published which does not contain a leading article or an editorial paragraph referring to Rome affairs in anything but a laudatory manner. The pretext is often some absurd rumor which cannot be traced to any reliable source, or else some telegraphic dispatch emanating from nobody knows whom, and decoyed, or even the shadow of authority. In the issue for last Monday there was a short article headed "The Pope and the Turks," which contained as many gross errors and malicious misrepresentations as could well be crowded within the number of lines it contained. It was based upon a telegraphic item which appeared in the dispatches of the previous Saturday, to the effect that some Albanian prince had offered to raise a thousand men to fight for the Turks against the revolted Christians. The Chronicle thought it "strange and inexplicable" that a Christian prince should volunteer aid to such a cause, and undertook to explain the inexplicable. "The alliance," says the dispatch, "is supposed to be the result of an order from the Vatican." Before assuming importance to such a statement we should like to know who is the writer of the dispatch, and who are the people that make the supposition alluded to. We should also wish to learn what "alliance" issued, to whom was it addressed, and who sent it. If neither date, address or nature can be told, is it not more than probable that this "order" never existed at all, but is the mere invention of the brain of the unknown compiler of dispatches? Any one who reads the American news in European papers can form an excellent idea of the accuracy and reliability of the items submitted to us about foreign affairs. The Chronicle, without a solitary particle of evidence, assumes the "order" to be genuine, and then, in its role of advocate of the Turks, proceeds to fortune-tell the manner which led to it; and, as one might imagine, these are not of a character creditable to the Catholic Church. The explanation is found "in the fact that Rome hates Russia and the Russian Church because the latter, though holding substantially the same creed as the Catholic, denies the supremacy of the Pope." Is not the Pope living now? Is not Rome the people living near it? Is there no supremacy, save that of the Vatican? Is there no Archbishop of Canterbury, no Primate of Ireland, no national and local ecclesiastics, who, in their own sphere, are supreme? Is there no Archbishop of Dublin, no Archbishop of San Francisco is visited are owing to a carelessness which might almost be classed as criminal. Mary Rogerdus of Columbus, O., became insane when she heard that her husband was killed in the Black Hills. Imagining that she was Abraham, she bound her little girl, placing her on an inverted washtub, piled wood around her, set it on fire, and would have burned the child to death but for the fortunate interference of a neighbor.

Sir Thomas More and Catholic Faith.

Judge A. C. Buffum, a convert to the Catholic Church in this State, in his valuable essay on "The Harmonious Relations between Divine Faith and Natural Reason," shows that the ignorance and prejudice prevailing against the Church proceeds from two classes of persons. First, those who never saw or read any standard Catholic work, but who take for Gospel the traditionary statements of her malignerers; and secondly, professional controversialists, who play the part of a fool lawyer in search of arguments to support his side of a case. These controversialists do not seek for truth, but they examine with a partisan zeal for a purpose that forbids knowledge, and is capacitates for the acquisition of truth concerning the faith they seek to ruin. (1) Hints of the first class he says:

"Lord Macaulay—one of the James Macintoshes, if not, in natural and moral accomplishments, without his genius as an historian—speaking of the trial of Sir Thomas More, who was put to death by Henry VIII., censures his conduct as unjust and cruel, from his wife's and sanction his Hired conviction which he adopts to be in accordance with the law of the land. Sir James says—"By the 5th of the statute which Anne's marriage was declared valid, every attempt to interfere on the Princess Mary's behalf was made high treason. Every person who should maliciously and directly attempt by writing or printing to deprive the King of his style, dignities or titles, was declared guilty of misprision of treason. It does not seem that Sir Thomas had been concerned in any plot against the supremacy." (Macintosh's Life of Sir Thomas More.) Lord Macaulay, the child of the Church Church, associated with the character of Sir Thomas More—"he was a man of a gentle and generous nature, fond of pleasure with a mirthful heart—he did not wish to see the Church of England a persecuting power." Lord Macaulay, in his "Essays," says: "Sir Thomas More was a man of eminent piety, of spotless purity of life, of fervent zeal, of great talents for controversy, of great learning, of great natural eloquence, of wit and humor, of shrewdness and knowledge of the world. He was also a man of cruel disposition, a persecutor, a dark and terrible enthusiast." Macaulay's life of Sir Thomas More was written in the bosom

IRISH LOCAL NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of August 12.

ANTRIM.

At the Belfast police court, John Orr, a young man described as a lunatic, was brought up on remand, charged with having feloniously caused the death of his mother. The prisoner was remanded for a week in order that the authorities might commmunicate the facts of the case to his ex-confessor the Lord Lieutenant.

An outrage, said to be of an agrarian character, has taken place on the lands of a farmer named John Hill, of Ballybody, near Ballyclare. It is alleged that in broad daylight a number of men broke open his gates and injured his property, wounding himself, his wife, his son, and an old neighboring farmer who came to his assistance.

CAVAN.

On Tuesday week a Home Rule demonstration was held at Cootehill, Cavan. Fully 25,000 people assembled in a field adjoining the town, in which a spacious platform was erected. Contingents came from the surrounding neighborhood, and Monaghan was conspicuously to the front. The townspeople were on fete, and good order was everywhere preserved. Mr. Fay, M. P., and Captain Kirwan were present. Mr. Fay pointed out the singular fact that, while Cavan was still under the provisions of the Coercion Act, not one man was sentenced at the last assizes. Resolutions pledging the meeting to persevere in the Home Rule agitation sanctioned by the Dublin conference, amnesty, and land reform, were carried with unanimity.

CORK.

The Royal Agricultural Society have not been fortunate, says the Cork Examiner, in the matter of weather for their meeting. The show in the park opened amidst a perfect storm of wind and rain. So bad was the weather that the Judges found great difficulty in completing their work, and most of the horses had to be removed from the ground as soon as they had passed the judges. The shedding was seriously damaged, and in some places the whole roofing was blown clean off. The Lord Lieutenant visited the show, when the storm was at its worst, and made a cursory inspection of the stock and machinery.

At the Cork city assizes Mr. Justice Keogh in fined pensioner Hall in the sum of a fine of £5, upon a man named Milner, who spoke to one of the jury in a case under trial, intimating that he was the defendant's brother-in-law.

At Cork a breach of promise case was heard before the sub sheriff and a jury, who were impanelled to assess damages the defendant having allowed judgment to go by default. The plaintiff was Miss Williams, a young lady from Macroom, about 23 years of age, and the defendant a gentleman of 70, named Good, who had returned with much wealth from India last year, and fallen in love. The jury awarded the lady £2,000 damages.

DOWN.

The storm which visited the northeast coast was attended with disastrous results in Lough Strangford harbor, two hundred yachts, belonging to Mr. James Carvill, Newry, and Rev. Mr. Richmond, Warrenpoint, having been totally wrecked.

GALWAY.

At Tynagh, near Eyrecourt, there has been an alleged succession burning on the extensive farms held by Mr. Robert Roe, J. F., Loran Park, near Roscrea, from Mr. Pollock. The usual notices have been served for some months. Mr. Roe only lately got possession of the farms.

At the last meeting of the council of the Baltimore Tenants' Association, held at the residence of Patrick Madden, Keg-Dando street, the chair was occupied by Walter E. Duffy, Esq., President of the association. There were also present: Rev. D. Mylod, P. P., John J. Madden, D.L., Patrick Corcoran, Patrick Madden, Matthew Harris, J. Kilmartin, &c.

KERRY.

The new Board of the Tralee Town Commissioners held a special meeting on Monday for the election of chairman, when Sir Henry Donovan. Mr. John C. Nelligan was unanimously elected.

At the last meeting of the Kerry Farmers' Association gloomy reports were made of the state of crops in the county, and at a meeting of the President, Mr. Lyng, it was resolved to invite the co-operation of neighboring associations to procure if p s sible a reduction of rent and of local taxation.

An accident of a fatal and melancholy nature, resulting in the death of two men, occurred at Ballybunion recently. It appears two men, named Connor and black, had been making a passage which they had sunk nearly sixty feet. Next morning when they attended to make further excavations, Connor, who had first gone down, had scarcely reached the bottom when he signalled to be pulled up; but while he hoisted up he became insensible and fell out of the bucket. Black immediately descended to rescue him, but he also perished, both being, it seems, suffocated by foul air.

KING'S COUNTY.

Two men named Meara and Buckley left the ferry at Portumna in a canoe to sail out to the Shannon. Immediately afterwards, it is alleged, the men quarrelled, and Meara remained in the canoe, without his companion. When interrogated, his replies were not satisfactory, and he was placed under arrest. A search had been made for the missing man, but no trace of him can be discovered. The assumption is that there has been foul play.

KILDARE.

At the Naas assizes David Hughes, a private in the 83d Regiment, was sentenced to twenty years penal servitude for having criminally assaulted an old woman over 70 years of age. Another soldier was sentenced to six months for an offence of somewhat less magnitude.

At the Kildare assizes, on the 4th inst., Sergeant Armstrong, in discharging the jury in the last case, said he was very glad to bear testimony to the highly independent and satisfactory manner in which the juries in every county upon the home circuit had fulfilled their important duties.

LIMERICK.

The death is announced of J. M. Tidmarsh, J. P., at his residence, the Crescent, Limerick. When the sad intelligence reached Kilkenny, says the Kilkenny Journal, deep was the sorrow which pervaded every heart, for, during the many years he lived among us, there was no more upright citizen, no more useful public man, no more benevolent heart in the sense of charity and humanity, than James M. Tidmarsh.

The long-continued drought which prevailed during the greater portion of the summer months has already had its effects made painfully apparent by the scarcity of grass and the high price of meadowing as compared with former years.

A movement has been initiated in Limerick for the purpose of presenting Very Rev. Dr. Carbery, O. P., with a suitable congratulatory address and testimonial to mark the occasion of his promotion to the high office of Provincial of the Dominican Order in Ireland. Dr. Carbery is about to remove to Dublin.

LANDONDERRY

In the Crown Court at Derry, before Judge Battersby and a petty jury, Patrick Wilhabbe, a private soldier in the 27th Regiment, was indicted for the murder of Margaret Miller, on the 16th of March last. The jury found a verdict of manslaughter, with a recommendation to mercy. The prisoner was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. George Lindsay Barker, a sea captain, was indicted for the manslaughter of a seaman named Dawson. The allegation was that Dawson, having fallen overboard into the Belmore river, was drowned, and the captain did not take means to save his life. Mr. Hugh Holmes defended the prisoner. The jury, after several hours' deliberation, disagreed and were discharged.

MAYO.

A report reached the constabulary of Castlebar on Friday week that a murder had been perpetrated at the Neale, near Ballinrobe, on the day before. The victim is said to be an old woman upwards of 60 years of age, and the scene of the affair is stated to be a cabin in a remote district. In point of fact, the unfortunately find many very bad Catholics in all Catholic countries. France is no exception, but rather, as we say, the most complete type of Christendom in operation. Her people are essentially Catholic, yet perfectly free to adopt or reject the virtues of their faith.

As Rome is the head of the Church, so France may be said to be its heart. From the prominence of that heart in the steady and mighty stream of pecuniary support and missionary zeal that principally feeds the ever-encroaching tide of Protestant progress abroad. France is the oldest daughter and the pride of the Church, great in all her fidelity, an immense number of her children take the liberty of being very bad Catholics. Sometimes those are even in the majority, or claim to be so, and at such times they take the opportunity of making the most decisive display of their wickedness. They take a certain pride in being thought independent of religious restraints, and rush into such extremes as to leave no doubt on the subject in the minds of an already world.

In reality, however, the acutally bad Catholics are never in a majority in France. They succeed merely through diet of imprudence on their part and timidity in their adversaries. It must be considered that there are not only in France, but everywhere else, who are not actually bad, here very little real. They are inclined to give up, especially before a rushing storm of execration and violence and frenzy like that which the Reds and sans culottes know so well how to get up at a moment's notice.

At first the Catholics of France had but little confidence in their republic. They identified it with the principles of its first noisy continental advocates—that is, with radicalism, agrarianism and mob rule. Leading Catholic minds, however, have seen a hope in it, and determined to give it a trial. As time progresses they take better to the republic and work on with better heart. In no possible way could the power of the Catholic party be more severely tested than in the late contest over free Universities, and yet the Senate triumphantly sustained the Catholic policy on that question, although the Government championed the contrary one. When we consider that the principal heresy of the age, the chief instrument relied on by the Devil to work harm, is the usurpation of educational control by the State, what can be more gratifying or encouraging than such a result?

The importance of the victory is easily measured by the rage of the Radicals. Their press and their harangues boil over with hatred, and take the form of threats against a Senate which shows itself so conservative as institution. But, as Catholic activity has gained control of the Senate, can it not also with sufficient courage and energy control a majority in the Assembly? There can be but little doubt now that Catholicity is backed by a hearty monarchical majority in France. It simply requires confidence in that majority to come forward, and wealthy citizens in the leaders in preventing fraud, to place the faith in that position of promise. Success to which it is there entitled.

When the French Republic shall have put itself in working trim on that basis, when good people in France clearly understand that they can maintain their rights and the interest of society in a republic only by working for it, but that they can do it by proper effort; when they are confident that the power of the Catholic party of intelligent rights are safer and more respected in a republic modified by the better classes than under a personal government, we may begin to look with confidence for permanence in the form of republic.

We look forward with hope to this consummation. Not that we hold one kind of government to be better per se than another. Our position is that a republican or popular government is better than a personal or autocratic government whenever it is on a par of age, and when the people are ready for it. The universal tendency is towards the latter, but there is no such tendency towards the former. It is a general thing, however, the better elements can control if they will. All decisions of a republic know that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty;" they have yet to learn, however, it would appear, that liberty is well worth the price, and that popular liberty is farther removed from the rule of an unprincipled mob than from the rule of a selfish monarch.—*N. ROYAL ELOPEMENT.

Royal circles in Tahiti have been startled by the announcement that the Princess Mary Ann had eloped with a half-caste named John Salmon. The Princess is heiress to the throne of Tahiti, and grandniece of the Mary group, or, as it is called sometimes, Cook's Archipelago. Salmon is related to the well-known Salmon family of Tahiti, the mother of whom claims to be a high relative of Queen Pomare, the present ruler in the name of Tahiti. When the Princess Mary Ann died, her aunt, Queen Makea, of Rarotonga, chartered the Australian schooner Comet, Captain Jones, to pursue the fugitives. The Coronet sailed for Mangia, one of the Mary group, and on board were the chiefmen of the island, Captain Stanford, a gallant Californian. Captain Jones made known his mission, when Captain Stanford replied that he had the Princess Mary Ann and five males of her choice on board, while Salmon was likewise in their midst. Captain Rose demanded the Princess on behalf of honor, at the same time exhibiting a perpetual decree of banishment for Salmon from the island of Rarotonga. After a conflict, Capt. Stanford concluded to give up the royal parties, and when the Princess Mary Ann found that she was to be separated forever from her lover and paramour, she, woman-like, wept like a fountain. But it was of no use and the only consolation offered—usually sufficient to console the native—was a grand feast on board the Humboldt. They danced and wept alternately, in true native style, Finally, the Coronet, with her royal freight on board, departed for Rarotonga, leaving the forlorn Salmon to pine away on the lonely island of Mangia. But he need not fret, for the romantic Mary Ann is young and handsome, very wealthy, and the heir-ess of two thrones—that of Queen Makea and that of the King of Tahiti. The royal runaway episode has profoundly agitated all classes in Tahiti, for the Frenchmen and Englishmen are eager to capture Mary Ann, and thus come to play the role of King of Bourbon. The fact is dreaded that foreigners in the Pacific isles have an eye to the main chance, and are always trying to get away with a barbarian Princess. Maybe is all preposessing, and has that admirable thing called coin in abundance.—Auckland Star.

Sagacity of Elephants.

Howe's circus was showing at Indianola when the storm of the 4 h came on, and because of injury to the railroads, was compelled to remain there until the track was temporarily repaired. Rain prevented regular performances, but their absence was more than compensated by the interest manifested by the elephants during the storm. The canvas was cut away, exposing the top of the unwieldy animals' backs. Then was exhibited the wonderful intelligence which they half-human brutes. They obey every command of the keeper, crawling on their knees, turning on their sides, standing on their ribs, and assuming more wonderful and novel positions than ever described. Then came the storm. When released from their perilous position there was not a scratch upon them, and no schooling ever gave a more emphatic expression of relief from confinement than did those elephants. They trumpeted, swayed back and forth, and did everything but talk. The remaining distance to the city was made overland, and a happier crew never started on than were those animals. The cool, breezy atmosphere, and the bright moonlight were all inspiring. As the bridge ware gone at each stream, the elephants took fresh enjoyment of their liberty. At no time were they obstinate and disobedient, but seemed to enjoy its situation. On arriving at Des Moines railroad care had to be procured, which was not easily done, as ordinary cars are too low. Some were found, which were about one inch higher than the tallest elephant's back. They were brought alongside, and the platform properly placed, when "Jack" noticed that it was a strange car, seized the door-frame with his trunk, gave it a vigorous shake, and then tried the floor. Satisfied that it was strong, he marched gravely into the car, placed himself lengthwise, gave a rocking motion, and humped up his back. A bolt overhead hit his back, and he marched straight out of the car. "It's no use," said the keeper; "the won't go back there again." The ribs which supported the roof were removed, the elephant closely watching the operation. When this was done, "Jack" went in, swayed the car, humped his back, and everything all right, trumped his satisfaction, and went to eating.

A Massachusetts clergyman received thirty cents for a marriage fee the other day. The groom offered him twenty cents at first, but finally added ten, "though times is hard."

SAMUEL J. TILDEN.

Honest Republican Opinion About Him.

[From the New York Times, August, 1871.]

There were a few flippant protests against the scheme [Tweed's charter for New York city] utter by such high-toned Democrats as Samuel J. Tilden and others of his character, but they were without effect for Tweed and Sweeny had the voters already brought up.

[From the New York Times, October, 1871.]

If anything can arouse the New York public to that pitch of indignation which alone becomes them in the present crisis, it is the accident which we publish to day. Here we have, on the books of the labors of Mr. Samuel J. Tilden, full and conclusive evidence that William M. Tweed differs only from a common thief in having stolen two of thousands, instead of ten dollars. * * * We refer to the affidavit of Mr. Tilden for a detailed account of how the disposal of the money was traced.

[From the New York Times, November, 26, 1871.]

The voters of the Eighteenth Assembly District ought to esteem it an honor and a privilege to elect Samuel J. Tilden to the legislature. He has shown himself a gallant, conscientious, efficient foe to corruption. We appeal to every Republican to rote and work for him, and to do so the more cheerfully—as we make this appeal because he is an honest Democrat.

[From the New York Times, July, 1872.]

Let us then leave Mr. Tilden a little while and turn to see how the Democracy are getting on. Mr. Tilden. The reason we wish to draw the attention of our readers to him is, that he is being mentioned pretty generally, as the Democratic candidate for Governor this fall. Mr. Tilden is not, indeed, mentioned his own name, because he has been a long time in politics, and he is well aware that the Democracy are not fond of so-called leaders. This we will say: that Mr. Tilden would make a very good candidate, for he has considerable ability as a man and a most very high character.

Mr. Tilden is much liked by the best reputable portion of the Democratic party, and perhaps there are more even in Tammany Hall who would like to see him run. * * * He is at any rate a Democrat of long standing in the party; a man of unsullied honor, public and private; a good, public spirited man, who would be no disgrace, but much the reverse, to our State. This we may say with perfect sincerity. Mr. Tilden, if Mr. Tilden were to ask us, as his old friends and advisers, whether he should stand for Governor if he were invited to do so, we should feel it our duty to dissuade him from that course. We should like much to see him happy, but would it make him happy to undergo a fight for office? If the Republicans nominate General Dix, Mr. Tilden could not run successfully against him. Incidentally he would do his party a great deal of good, for he would improve its moral tone.

A Cause for Surprise.

"Jeremiah," writing from Sea Grove to the United Presbyterian, says: "At our last communion orders of admission were issued to all those who were desirous of uniting with the Presbyterian, Baptist, United Presbyterian, Methodist, Quakers, Catholics, and a Jewess was of our number a few days ago. In a social way the first five denominations are of the most intelligent and agreeable ladies I have met is a thorough-going Catholic, who feels a real pity for the heretics who come and go without the offices of her infallible Church. It is hard to see in her a fault in the world, and she is very popular. Secretary her Church, or to find a mark to fix her identity as a disciple of the Pope." "Jeremiah" is one of our correspondents, and we know him in the back woods, and must have a little allowance for his want of Sabbath with old prejudices. He has undoubtedly heard of horned priests with cloven feet, of the snake-like cunning of Father Gavazzi, the trap-doors and subterranean vaults in Catholic institutions, and of the "secret marks of the 'mum of sin." In his youthful ardor there may have been visions of a countersunk hell beneath the altar, a cavern of Babylon and "Jeremiah," the David of Sion. We can also imagine how in his journey to Sea Grove he would "mumble" inconsolable fellow-travelers by a close and searching search for the marks of Popery.

Well, he arrives at Sea Grove; he meets a Catholic, a lady at that, perhaps a disguised female Jesuit, and finds her "pope" a "father and surprise." He perceives neither serpent horns, nor cloven hoofs, nor even Father Donohue takes his place as pastor of St. Michael's church.

—A German correspondent of the Cork Examiner writes:—Of the eleven Prussian Roman Catholic dioceses only the four of Ermland, Culm, Osnabruck and Limburg are still administered in the regular way. Those of Feilds and Treves have lost their Bishops through death; the Bishop of Breslau, Paderborn, Munster and Cologne have been deposed, and the Bishop of Hildesheim has left the country.

—On the 23d of June, Feast of the Sacred Heart, one of the soldier priests who, under the auspices of the Pontifical Zouaves, made the novitiate of their priesthood, celebrated in the holy sacrifice of the Mass the intention of the regiment, in the chapel of the Visitation at Paraple Monial. General Charette and a large number of Zouaves were present and received Holy Communion.

—It is a shameful fact that there is not one Catholic chaplain in the army. At certain posts there is a Protestant stated to the wants of the Catholic soldiers, but there is not one commissioned by the Government. Even where the majority of the soldiers are Catholics, Protestant chaplains have been appointed, and every Sunday expound their belief of the past week, which exposition the Catholic soldiers are required to hear. Is not this state of affairs a shame and an outrage?

—His Grace Archbishop Blanchet has addressed to the clergy of Oregon a circular announcing the acceptance of Right Rev. L. The circular confirms the faculties both ordinary and extraordinary which the priests have received from Bishop Loulens and also the ordinances and regulations already published in the country.

C. Elder, of Natchez; Grace, of St. Paul; Quinlan, of Mobile; Rosecrans, of Columbus; Dubuis, of Galveston; Conroy, of Albany; and Persico, formerly of Savannah.

—Three churches at the Quirinal Hill Rome, standing near one another, are doomed to demolition, so that the street bearing the unfortunate name of Via Pell Settembri may be enlarged, and that the buildings for the Ministry of War may be increased. Previous to the destruction of these churches the Cardinal Vicar ordered that they should be disconsecrated. A number of clergymen accomplished this sorrowful rite. They removed the sacred pictures from the altars, the consecrated stones, the relics and the crosses. They had permission also to remove the remains of the religious buried there. The names of these churches are St. Therese, attached to a large convent turned into a barrack by the Italian Government, and occupied by the Royal Guard; the church of the Barberine Vaca, and the Church of St. Caius.

—A large meeting of the citizens of Limerick, held on the evening of August 10th, presided over by D. James O'Shaughnessy, J. P., was held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of promoting the success of the proposed testimonial to the Very Rev. Dr. Carbery, O. P., to mark the occasion of his elevation to the high office of Provincial of the Order in Ireland. The Chairman made the pleasing announcement that it was not Dr. Carbery's intention to remove from Limerick to Dublin, so that, after, all they would have him still among them, though not so often as heretofore. Several resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were adopted, and a subscription list having been opened a large amount was subscribed.

—The colony of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, sailed from Fribourg, Germany, some years since founded a house of their Order at Port Said, in Egypt. On the 11th of June they were visited by their Bishop, when three pupils received first Communion, and nineteen—among whom were three postulants—received the Sacrament of Confirmation. On the 15th of June—the Feast of Corpus Christi—a public procession was held in the streets. It was as much as one or two estasions permitted. The Mahometan garrison had expressly turned out in full uniform, forming supplies in the streets through which the procession had to pass. Although Jews, Protestants and Mussulmans far outnumber the Catholic population in Port Said, not the least sign of irreverence, either by word or gesture could be noticed; on the contrary, it is asserted that a great many of the non-Catholic bystanders showed unmistakable signs of reverence and devotion.

The Wonders of Ancient Rome.

The art of working metals and cutting precious stones surpassed anything known at the present day. In the decoration of houses, in social entertainments, in cookery, the Romans were remarkable. The mosaics, signet rings, cameos, bracelets, incenses, chains, necklaces, gold and silver tables, lamps, chariots, colored glass, gilt-rings, mirrors, mattresses, cosmetics, perfumes, hair dyes, silk robes, pastories, all attest great elegance and beauty. The tables of thege root and Delian bruans were as expensive as the sideboards of Spain to-day, and were also admired in the great exhibition at London. Wood and ivory were carved as exquisitely as in Japan and China. Mirrors were made of polished silver. Glassculters could imitate the colors of precious stones as well as the Portland vase from the tomb of Alexander Severus, was long considered as a genuine sardonyx. Glass could be hardened so as to cut stone. The palace of Nero glittered with gold and jewels. Perfumes and flowers were showered from ivory ceilings. The balls of Heliogabulus were hung with sho h of gold.

Tiberius gave a million of sesterces for a piece of citron wood for his bedroom. Bed of Drusilius weighed five hundred pounds of silver. The cups of Drusus were of gold. Pearls and precious stones were melted and swallowed in vinegar. The most naturally fools much chagrined at this, for how could he be able to meet his wife and family when he goes home? He is the proprietor of a coach-making establishment, but he couldn't have both because of his trade and calling that he was not permitted to enlete royalty, for one of the aldermen who was entitled to the privilege is a pipe file manufacturer, and the other is in the plumbing and house-painting line, and surely coach-building is as good a business as either any day. We mustn't be cory rised if this town committee should vote royalty a sham and a humbug, and go in sack and hoods for republicanism.—N. Y. Tablet.

WOLFE TONE.

In all the world, from pole to pole;
Wherever Irishmen are found—
Wherever glories exist and woe—
Of Joy and Mirth or Sorrow unknown—
The name of Wolfe Tone is known.
And soft runs the starry note
His Cambrian praises, bold and clear—
The music and immortal Poet's

When fortune frowned, and all was gloom.
And others coldly stepped aside,
Who rose, regardless of the doom,
For Ireland's glory and her pride?
Who dared the foeman in the strife
With courage, daring, all his own,
And gave his freedom and his life
For Ireland's sake—His gallant Tone!

He could not bear to see his land
Oppressed and trampled, scourged and bowed,
Her priests and people tortured, hunted,
Her temples leveled to the ground.
To better die than live to see
Such wrong and shame and misery thrown
On Erin's lovely land, thought he—
The faithful and true hearted Tone.

The better die a thousand times
Than live a galling, crushed slave,
Than live a galling, crushing tyrant (Pitt)
Would make the dead blush in the grave.
So lift the old green flag on high,
My country must be blood and bone,
And 'neath its sacred folds we'll die,
Or freemen live, said gallant Tone.

And so he rose in self honr,
For Ireland's freedom, Ireland's right;
To free her from a foreign power
Its stainless sin, his purpose bright;
But oh! he failed to win the crown;
Which is from God alone to give;
He never lived to see it won,
And Ireland wept for brave Wolfe Tone.

Rest on! To-day from all the land
All creeds and classes are joining
To honor thee, whose loving hand
Was reared as well their arm from wrong;
To screw the grave with choicest flowers,
While in their souls thy memory lives
That yet shall bloom in fairer hours,
And bear ripe fruit—rest on, Wolfe Tone.

TRIBUTES TO VIRTUE.

Among the many ways of honoring the Holy Father on the thirtieth anniversary of his coronation, that adopted by the Unita Cattolica was exceedingly fitting. It may, indeed, be said of Pius IX. that all good men say good things of him; and the Unita collected a few of these sayings, uttered by the most important men in Europe, and strung them, as it were, into a wreath. Among them are the following:

"Pope Pius IX. was humane and good."—Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, 1850.

"He is rich in the most precious gifts of a prince—fortitude and loyalty."—Massimo D'Azeglio.

"I see in Pius IX. only the most amiable and illuminated sovereign."—Lord John Russell.

"The respectable old man who has spread over the Papacy the luster of his virtues."—M. Thiers.

"Under his white hairs peace and liberty are brought to the universe."—Father Lacordaire.

"What ingratitude has not this generous and meek Pius IX encountered."—M. Guizot.

"In defending the ancient rights Pius IX. defends the public rights of Europe."—Villemain.

The list might be greatly enlarged, but this will suffice to show the appreciation of great writers and thinkers for Pius IX.

—On Tuesday, 18th July, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Moriarity, Lord Bishop of Kerry, professed in the chapel of the convent of Mercy, Miss Rowan (to religion, Sister Mary Clare) a native of Ballyheridridge, Wexford, and Miss Kipple (to religion Sister Mary de Sales), a native of Mallow. The Earl of Kenmare was amongst those present.

—Father Tracy, who has been the pastor of the Catholic church of Greenwich, Mercer county, Pa., for nine years past, has resigned, and has gone to the monastery near Greensboro, Westmoreland county, Pa., for the purpose of joining the Benedictine Order in his Church. Father Donohue takes his place as pastor of St. Michael's church.

—A German correspondent of the Cork Examiner writes: "Of the eleven Prussian Roman Catholic dioceses only the four of Ermland, Culm, Osnabruck and Limburg are still administered in a regular way. Those of Fulda and Treves have lost their Bishops through death; that of the Archdiocese Breslau, Paderborn, Munster and Cologne have been deposed, and the Bishop of Hildesheim left the country.

—On the 23d of June, Feast of the Sacred Heart, one of the soldier priests who, under the influence of the Pontifical Zouaves, made the novitiate of their priesthood, celebrated the holy sacrifice of the Mass for the intention of his regiment, in the chapel of the Visitation at Paray-le-Monial. General Charette and a large number of Zouaves were present and received Holy Communion.

—It is a shameful fact that there is not one Catholic chaplain to the army. At certain quarters Catholic priests attend to the wants of the Catholic soldiers, but there is not one commissioned by the Government. Even where the majority of the soldiers are Catholics, Protestant chaplains have been appointed, and every Sunday expound their brief of the past week, while opposition the Catholic soldiers are required to hear. Is not this state of affairs a shame and an outrage?

—His Grace Archbishop Blanchet has addressed to the clergy of Idaho a circular announcing that the resignation of Right Rev. L. Lootens has been accepted in Rome, and that the Holy See has appointed the Archbishop of Oregon administrator of the vacant Vicariate Apostolic. The circular confirms the faculties both ordinary and extraordinary which the priests have received from Bishop Lootens, and also the ordinances and regulations already published in the country.

—Among the American memorials and relics of the Pope may be mentioned Monsr. J. B. Purcell, Archbishop of Cincinnati; Archbishop Bayley, of Baltimore; Kenrick, of St. Louis; Alemany, of San Francisco; Peraldi of New Orleans; Henni, of Milwaukee; Wood, of Philadelphia; Williams, of Boston; Rappe, formerly of Cleveland; Loughlin, of Brooklyn; Duggan, of Chicago; Bonnand, of Pittsburg; Amat, of Monterey, Gosebrand, of Burlington; Lynch, of Charleston; S. O. Eidar, of Natchez; Grace, of St. Paul; Quinlan, of Mobile; Rosecrans, of Columbus; Dubois, of Galveston; Conroy, of Albany; and Pereira, formerly of Savannah.

—Three churches on the Quirinal Hill Rome, standing near one another, are doomed to demolition, so that the street bearing the unfortunate name of Via Nuovissima may be enlarged, and that the buildings for the Ministry of War may be increased. Previous to the destruction of these churches the Cardinal Vicar ordered that they should be deconsecrated. A number of very ancient pictures perished this sorrowful rite. They removed the sacred pictures from the altars, the consecrated stones, the relics and the crosses. They had permission also to remove the remains of the religious buried there. The names of those churches are St. Theresa, attached to a large convent turned into a barrack by the Italian Government, and occupied for the Royal Guard; the church of the Barberine Nuns, and the Church of St. Caius.

—A large meeting of the citizens of Limerick, held on the evening of August 7, presided over by D. James O'Shaughnessy, J. P., was held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of promoting the success of the proposed testimonial to the Very Rev. Dr. Carbery, O. P., to mark the occasion of his elevation to the high office of Provincial of the Order in Ireland. The Chairman made the pleasing announcement that it was not Dr. Carbery's intention to remove from Limerick to Dublin, so that, after, all they would have him still among them, though not so often as heretofore. Several resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were adopted, and a subscription list having been opened a large amount was subscribed.

—A colony of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, exiled from Fribourg, Germany, some years since founded a house of their Order at Port Said, in Egypt. On the 11th of June they were visited by their Bishop, when three pupils received first Communion, and nineteen—among whom were three pashas—received the Sacrament of Confirmation. On the 15th of June—the Feast of Corpus Christi—a public procession was held in the streets. It was solemn as circumstances permitted. The Mussulmans garrison had expressed a wish to join in full uniform, forming sepalier in the streets through which the procession had to pass. Although Jews, Protestants and Mussulmans far outnumber the Catholic population in Port Said, not the least sign of irreverence, either by word or gesture, could be noticed; on the contrary, it is observed that a great many of the non-Catholic bystanders showed unmistakable signs of reverence and devotion.

The Wonders of Ancient Rome.

The art of working metals and cutting precious stones surpassed anything known at the present day. In the decoration of houses, in social entertainments, in costumery, the Romans were remarkable. The mosaics, signet rings, cameos, bracelets, bronzes, chairs, vases, couches, banqueting tables, lamps, chariots, colored glass, gilding, ingrain, mattresses, cosmetics, perfumes, hair dyes, silk robes, potteries, all attest great elegance and beauty. The villas of kings rose and Indian forests were as expensive as the sideboards of Spanish walnut, so much admired in the great exhibition at London. Wood and ivory were carved as exquisitely as in Japan and China. Mirrors were made of polished silver. Glasscutters could imitate the colors of precious stones so well that the Portland vase, from the tomb of Alexander Severus, was long considered as a genuine sardonyx. Glass could be hardened so as to cut stone. The palaces of Nero glittered with gold and jewels. Perfumes and diamonds were showered from ivory ceilings. The halls of Heliogabalus were hung with cloth of gold.

Pliny says there were a million of sesterces for a picture for his bedroom. A banquet dish of Drusus was valued at five hundred thousand sesterces. The cups of Drusus were of gold. Tunics were embroidered with the figures of various animals. Sandals were garnished with precious stones. Paulina wore jewels that she paid visits valued at eight hundred thousand dollars. Drinking cups were engraved with scenes from the poets. Libraries were adorned with busts and presses of rare woods. Sofas were inlaid with tortoise-shell and covered with gorgeous purple. The Roman grandees rode in gilded chariots, bathed in marble tubs, dined from golden plate, drank from crystal cups, slept on beds of down, reclined on Tyrian purple, and wore two hundred robes and were adorned with precious stones. They ransacked the earth and the sea for rare dishes for their banquets, and ornamented their houses with carpets from Persia, Babylon, Assyria, Egypt, Numidia, marbles from Numidia, bronze from Corinth, statues from Athens—whatever, in short, was precious or rare or curious in the most distant countries.

A Claim to a Peerage.

There is at present being tried before a commission appointed before the House of Lords a very interesting claim to an Irish peerage. The late Lord Stuart de Decies was the last holder of that title. It appears from the evidence given before the commission that, while traveling on the continent in 1826, he met a Madame Paulina de Ott in Vienna. After a little time they became engaged. There being some objections to their marriage in Austria he induced the lady to follow him to England, where it is alleged a marriage was celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church, Spanish Place, London, in the same year. Subsequent to this marriage a child was born in place—one in Scotland and one in Ireland. Ever after this he is said to have treated her as a man and wife, and were always recognized in that relationship. Two children were the issue of this union—a boy and girl. It is the former who is now the claimant of the peerage. None of the relatives oppose the claim, but the Crown insists on the production of evidence to show that Lord Decies and Madame de Ott were actually married. Though it is alleged three marriages were celebrated there is no documentary evidence to prove the statement. There is ample evidence to show that the parties lived together as husband and wife from the year 1830, but very little to show that they were considered so previous to that year. The claimant, who is known as Mr. Stuart, was born in 1827. He has succeeded to his father's estate, which lies in county Waterford. His estimated annual rental is £15,000. The claim which is at present being examined has nothing to do with his property. It is simply a claim to be recognized as one of the peerage, under his father's title of Lord Stuart de Decies.

DISCONTITED ROYALTY.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin and a brace of aldermen are proud and happy men this day. They have stood in the presence of royalty and royalty's youngest son unmoved, and they have been graciously permitted the precious privilege of going on bended knees and kissing royalty's jaweled hand. This was done at the Queen's Marine Palace, at Osborne, Isle of Wight, when the corporate deputation rep- ed one day to present a rather stale address of congratulation on the return of the Prince of Wales from India. But there is a town councillor who is much mortified and very unhappy about the business. His, too, was one of the deputation, but he was omitted from the kneeling and kissing ceremony. The worthy man naturally feels much chagrined at this, for how will he be able to meet his wife and children when he goes home? He is the proprietor of a coach-making establishment, but it could not have been because of his trade and calling that he was not permitted to salute royalty, for one of the aldermen who was admitted to the privilege is a soap-boiling manufacturer, and the other is in the plumbing and house-painting line, and surely coach-building is as good a business as either any day. We mustn't be surprised if this town councillor should vote royalty a sham and a humbug, and go in cock and bens for republicanism.—N. Y. Tablet.

WOLFE TONE.

In all the world, from pole to pole,
Is there ever a land so curst,
So lost, so lone, so drear, so dire,
Whose children feel such thirst?
They still remember and revere,
And well nain the starry sons
His fearless prince, lord and friend—
The noble and immortal Tone!

When furious from end to end, all all was gloom,
And others—deify'd by doom—
Who rose, regardless of the doom,
For Ireland's glory and her pride?
Who dared the fortune to the strife,
With courage, daring, all his life,
And gave his freedom and his love
For Ireland's sake—this patriot Tone?

He could not bear to see his land
It pressed and trampled, scourged and bowed;
Her priests and people tortured, hanged,
Her temples levelled to the ground;
The banner die than live to see
Such a wrong and shame and misery thrown
On Erin's lovely land, thought he—
The faithful and true hearted Tone.

The better die a thousand times
Than live a cringing, servile slave,
Where reason gell and sea are crimped
Would make the dead blush in the grave.
So lift the old green flag on high,
My countrymen in blood and bone,
And 'neath its sacred shade we'll die,
Or freedom live, said patriot Tone.

And so he rose in evil hour,
For Ireland's freedom, Ireland's right,
To free her from a foreign power
His sublime aim, his purpose bright;
His life a sacrifice to the cause,
Which a priest dark and false betrayed,
He saved the fearless spirit down,
And Irish reps for freedom's Tone.

Rest on! To-day from all the land
All creeds and classes fondly throng
To honor one, whose aching hand
Was raised to rend their fetters wrong;
To view thy grave with tributes o'er
Is more than all the words are worth
That yet shall bloom in Erin's lore
And bear rich fruit—rest on, Wolfe Tone.

THE TURKISH ATROCITIES.

When the outrages in Bulgaria first came to the public knowledge Mr. Disraeli all but made fun of them. He was told of villages burned, of women violated, of children hacked to pieces, of whole districts depopulated, but he only shrugged his shoulders, lifted his eyebrows, and said, in effect, "I can't be helped." As the British Ambassador to Constantinople, Sir Henry Elliot, the Premier would have it that there was great exaggeration in reference to the stories of Turkish cruelty. Now he has reason to be sorry for having adopted such a course. Day by day it appears more clear that the accounts of Moslem atrocities on defenceless Christian people were, if anything, understated. Letters from various quarters go farther than to confirm the first accounts; and even the coolest official who was dispatched from the British Embassy at Constantinople to investigate, to investigate what had been done, reports, in his very first letter, that some 8,000 villages had been sacked, and wholly or partially burnt; that 3 young girls had been kidnapped; that in the same ganga of prisoners drawn like cattle, dogged with whips, and bealed with the butt-ends of guns; and that he believed some 12,000 Bulgarians have been put to death!

The latest letter of the correspondent whose reports first provoked inquiry adds further to the horrors. He has ridden, it seems, with the consul called Buick, in Bulgaria, and "about two miles away from the town, approaching the town, on a hill there were some dogs. They ran away, and we found dead there on this spot a number of adult males about, and one ghastly heap of skeletons, with clothing. I counted from the saddle a hundred skulls, picked and licked clean—all of women and children." In the town, on every side, were skulls, charred remains, dead bodies clothed, and heads with long brown hair hanging to them. Near the church also there were mutilated women and human remains. In the churchyard the sight was still more dreadful. "Outside the church yard for three feet deep was festering with dead bodies partly covered—hands, legs, arms, and heads projected to already confirm sion. I saw many little hands, heads, and feet of children lying over the graves of girls, with heads covered with beautiful hair." The floor of the church was covered with decaying matter. Outside the church yard and church alone the writer believes there must have been three thousand corpses. Dogs had been seen dragging their bodies in which heaps of bodies lay. In one place as a woman was passing over [illegible] small skulls, with hairs clinging to them, which she had in her lap." The newspaper correspondent concludes the account of his horrible tours of death, "were not exaggerated. They could not be. Not one statement made by Turkish ferocity was left uncommitted. The harvest is rotting in the fields. The cattle are dying in the stalls. The Turk is in support of the Power in whose name these inconceivable horrors have been perpetrated. He is the best friend, in fact, of Beaconsfield, Lord Derby, and Lord Salisbury. In one place as a woman was passing over [illegible] small skulls, with hairs clinging to them, which she had in her lap." The newspaper correspondent concludes the account of his horrible tours of death, "were not exaggerated. They could not be. Not one statement made by Turkish ferocity was left uncommitted. TRIBUTES TO VIRTUE.

Among the many ways of honoring the Holy Father on the thirtieth anniversary of his coronation, that adopted by the United Catholics was exceedingly fitting. It may, indeed, be said of Pius IX. that all good men say good things of him; and the Union collected a few of these sayings, uttered by the most important men in Europe, and strung them, as it were, into a wreath. Among these are the following:

"Pope Pius IX. was humane and good."—Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, 1856.

"He is rich in the most precious gifts of a prince—fortitude and loyalty."—Massimo D'Azeglio.

"I see in Pius IX. only the most amiable and illuminated sovereign."—Lord John Russell.

"The respectablest man who has spread over the Papacy the luster of his virtues."—M. Thiers.

"Under his white hairs peace and liberty are brought to the universe."—Father Lacordaire.

"What ingratitude has not this generous and much ill-requited man met with!"—M. Guizot.

"In defending his ancient rights Pius IX. defends the public rights of Europe."—M. Veuillemain.

The list might be greatly enlarged, but this will suffice to show the appreciation of great writers and thinkers for Pius IX.

MISSION DOLORES

Celebration of the One Hundredth Anniversary of the Founding of San Francisco.

Imposing Religious, Civic and Military Demonstrations.

Grand Pontifical Mass

Sermon by Archbishop Alemany.

Immense Procession of Catholic Societies.

Interesting Historical Sketches by Hon. J. W. Dwinelle and Gen. M. G. Vallejo—Corner Stone Laying of a New Church.

The demonstration last Sunday, under the auspices of the Catholic societies, in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of Mission Dolores of San Francisco, was worthy of the day and the event. It was carried out in all the particulars in its management, and as it is a historical event of more than ordinary magnitude THE MONITOR decreed a commission of publication in full this fall. Sermons, historical addresses delivered, which on perusal, will be found full of interest. The selection of the day appropriately commenced with religious ceremonies.

The Pontifical High Mass.

The day dawned aspiring but suspiciously. A heavy mist hung over the city, which developed into a drizzling rain shortly after nine o'clock; but before this hour the streams leading to the Mission contained scores of pedestrians who wended their way toward the grounds selected for the celebration of the Pontifical High Mass, expecting, by an early arrival, to secure favorable positions—and were doomed to disappointment.

Immediately west of the old College building, and adjoining the graveyard on the north, the altar was erected, under the broad canopy of heaven. Over it was placed a high framework in the shape of a Gothic arch, before it a platform with benches, also further in the background the stand for the performers and musicians. Pole containing tropical plants and flowers, hanging baskets holding choice full-grown ferns and ornaments adorned the long alleyway. Bouquets, and heavy embellishments, were tastefully arranged in other proper places. There were no decorations on the musicians' stand, except a portrait of the venerable Padre there. The ball ceiling, covering the altar, was embellished with small Papal and United States flags.

WHO ATTENDED.

At ten o'clock the various societies who desired to be present, they occupying the centre of the scene and impressive ceremony, commenced to arrive and take up positions in the inclosure surrounding the platform. Then came Governor Irwin, Mayor Bryant, Collector Sanderson, United States attorney Coghlan, Major-General Turner and Staff, Brigadier-General McComb and Staff, Supervisors Macdonald, Roberts and Hayes, City and County Attorney Barnett, School Director Jones, the Mission Guardian, Spanish Consul Castella, many prominent bankers and merchants, representing On the right the Grand Marshal and Chief aids seated themselves, as well as the representatives of the Franciscan Fathers from various Orders, among whom were noticed the Very Rev. Father Villarasa, O. F. M.; Very Father Pardan, O. F. M.; Rev. Father Harrington, O. F. M.; Rev. Father De Marco, O. F.; Rev Father Caballeria, O. F.; Rev. Father Dumas, O. F. M.; Rev. Father Dugue, O. P., and the Rev. Father Alvarez, the Franciscan Order. The latter gentleman came from Santa Barbara for the purpose of witnessing the ceremonies of the occasion, established by the members of his Order one hundred years ago.

THE OFFICIATING CLERGYMEN.

Shortly after 10 A. M. the solemn procession of officiating clergymen and attending acolytes wended its way from the sacristy of the old Mission Dolores Church to the temporary altar at which was to be celebrated the Mass, which was observed made way, and, with uncovered heads, assisted the reverend actors of the church. The gowns on the platform, without exception, arose to the level and dignified altar built on the imposing line of richly-robed dignitaries and priests of the Catholic Church approached the altar.

Right Rev. P. J. Conner, Bishop of Marysville, officiated as Celebrant; Dr. Gantly, of the Mission San Jose, as Deacon; the Rev. Father Andrew Barrigan, as Sub-Deacon; Father T. Gibney, Vicar General, as Assistant Priest. The Most Reverend Archbishop Alemany presided, and was attended at the throne by Father T. McSweeney, of the Cathedral, and Father Richardson. The Masters of Ceremonies were Rev. Fathers Bowden and J. O'Connor.

THE MASS.

Never before in the history of California, or, in fact, in the whole United States in the Union, has a Mass been celebrated at which so many persons were present—full as very many were forced away who desired to participate, but were unable to obtain even a glimpse of the altar.

It would be difficult to even approximate the number of persons—women and children, of all stations and conditions of life—who were present and the United States in the person.

It would be useless to enter into any detailed description of the Pontifical High Mass. It would be sufficient to say that this most impressive ceremony of the Catholic Church was appreciated by all who witnessed it. One's thoughts involuntarily reverted to the past hundred years, when the holy and pioneers offered up their prayers at the same identical altar. Then, and now! This was the next reflection. The vast body, the multitudinal voices of the singers, the chanting of the priests, all served to contribute to the solemnity of the occasion. The "Kyrie Eleison" failed not to call to mind our needs, while the "Gloria" bore forth from our lips a pean from on high.

The saturnine faces of the silent multitude and their many clothed garments bounded into a dreamy picture and helped to lull one off delight as the music swelled in power or died away in scarce audible tones. The sermon was given and each grande breve born with a silent attention, and when the consecrated host was given and each grande breve born with a silent attention, and when the consecrated host was given and each grande breve born with a silent attention, and when the consecrated host

OUR CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Our Centennial Celebration has come and passed away. All who had the pleasure of witnessing it will long remember the affair, and, perhaps, its memory will not entirely disappear from among the people of San Francisco until the occasion of its repetition arrives. When that time comes the scholar and historian of the twentieth century will display his learning and research by describing for his audience the brilliant pageant that made its way through the streets of this city on Sunday, October 8, 1876. And those who listen will doubtless find the story as full of interest as we found the masterly orations of Hon. JOHN W. DWINELLE and General VALLEJO which traced the fortunes of San Francisco from its foundation up to the present time. Our earnest hope, our fervent prayer, is that the republic in which it is our pride to dwell may endure in plenitude of power and prosperity, that the glorious flag which waves over us now may float in triumph over our descendants then, and that the holy faith professed by the humble men who laid the foundations of the city may be the glory and the solace of its entire people of the United States.

Owing to an attack of illness, which we trust will be neither serious nor protracted, Bishop GRACE of Minnesota, who, it had been announced, would preach the sermon at the Pontifical High Mass, was unable to be present. We believe he thought it better not to attempt the journey hither, although he was anxious to keep his promise, as well as to see for himself the progress made by Catholicity on the Pacific Coast. His Grace the Archbishop took the place of the absent prelate and spoke both in English and, Russian. We venture to assert are of hearing Bishop GRACE was more than fully compensated for. The sermon preached by his Grace the Archbishop was, in the opinion of all, one of the best and happiest efforts. As might be expected, he dwelt more particularly upon the religious aspect of the celebration, vindicating the motives and conduct of the missionaries, and exploding the policy towards the Indians adopted and steadily pursued for long years by the Spanish Government. Certainly, the spirit which animated that policy and the rules which governed it, make a strange, yet most creditable, contrast with those displayed by our nation when they come into contact with savage and uncivilized people. The music during the Mass was excellent, and the whole scene was in the highest solemn and impressive.

The starting of the procession from the Mission grounds was rather late, but that could not, under the circumstances, be helped. It was no easy work to marshal such an immense body of men and get them into proper order, emerging from what was comparatively a confined space. But quiet good humor, combined with strict discipline, overcame all difficulties, and the procession soon took up the pre-arranged route. We question much whether there can be any second opinion as to the fact of its being one of the largest and most imposing demonstrations ever witnessed on the San Francisco. Its passage along the streets was of course, the cause of considerable obstruction to the ordinary traffic on Sunday, and on Market and Kearny streets the cars were regularly blockaded for some time; but we heard no complaint made, and the immense throng who looked on from the sidewalks seemed well pleased. Such a demonstration does not occur every day in a year, and when it does take place a little inconvenience is always borne with most good humoredly. It was near four o'clock when the procession reached the Mechanics' Pavilion.

The exercises at the Pavilion were purely secular and historical in their character. There were no prayers, no benedictions, no religious function of any kind. Catholics do not like to force their creed upon any one, or to obtrude its ceremonies upon those who have no sympathy with them. Those who were invited might go or witness the Pontifical Mass or not, just as it suited them; but when they were asked to go into the Pavilion to hear the speeches of the Hon. J. W. DWINELLE and General VALLEJO, they were not expected to stuff the audience of a long-winded prayer from a clergyman whose right to offer up any sort of ministration for them they would not acknowledge. It would be well, indeed, if the adherents of the different sects reciprocated this thoughtfulness and courtesy, for we know as a matter of fact that whenever any demonstration is made or celebration kept by non-Catholics, even when non-religious in nature—such as the opening of a fair or exhibition, the holding of a public meeting, etc.—some minister or preacher is invariably put forward to pray—that is, perform a religious office—for the whole assemblage. This is manifestly a breach of good taste.

It is scarcely necessary for us to do more than allude to the orations delivered by Hon. JOHN W. DWINELLE and by General VALLEJO. They were simply masterpieces of eloquence and splendid exhibitions of historical scholarship. (1) Mr. DWINELLE's manly, liberal and graceful tribute of respect to the Catholic Church we feel bound to speak in terms of the highest praise and with feelings of gratitude. It is so much the fashion nowadays to sneer at the Church, decry its institutions and malign its influence, that when a man rises superior to popular prejudice and ventures to do us mere justice, we cannot refrain from expressions of thankfulness. We are the more bound to do it in this instance because we see that Mr. DWINELLE's remarks brought down upon him the censure of a certain newspaper in this city which is more noted for bigotry than for charity. But we deal with that matter more fully in another article. General VALLEJO's address was delivered in Spanish, that being his mother tongue, and consequently the one with which he is most familiar. A full and accurate translation will be found in our report of the proceedings, which appears on our inside pages. The oration is extremely interesting, well compiled and exhaustive in its details, and we are sure it will receive the earnest attention of every one of our readers.

It was quite late when the exercises at the Pavilion were concluded, and yet there remained another portion not the least important of the day's proceedings to be carried out. That was the laying of the foundation stone of the new church which is to be erected in the Mission grounds under the invocation of St. Francis of Assisi. The Archbishop, accompanied by a large number of clergymen and some others, repaired to the spot as soon as possible. It was now so dark that it was difficult to read the necessary psalms and other portions of the liturgy required, so a missionary torchlight procession was improvised by a number of youths bearing candles, and under these novel circumstances was laid the foundation stone of the sacred edifice which in days to come may yet be the cathedral of the city of San Francisco and excite the wonder and admiration of all who behold it.

Thus happily and appropriately terminated the celebration of the Centennial anniversary of the foundation of our city. It was left, we are sure, no jarring or discordant note in the breast of any intelligent or fair-minded man. The religious element absolutely necessary in the demonstration, which, indeed, would have been meaningless without it, was not obtruded upon any one, and the secular part of the programme was such as would and should meet the approbation of all parties, creeds and nationalities. The various societies and other bodies that participated in it, the orators, and, in short, all those who so ably labored to make the celebration what it was—a thorough and gratifying success.

SOMETHING TO BE NOTICED.

We are very well aware that the Chronicle is, more than anything else, an anti-Catholic organ, and therefore we do not expect from it anything which is not inimical to the Church or its affairs. But it professes to be a Republican organ, and in the light of this profession we cannot overlook its course in the matter now heard of in political circles. Next, in its Monday number it could afford hardly two columns of space to gratify its readers with the report of the Centennial celebration, while the other daily dailies gave full reports; and in the Call there were over nine columns devoted to the grand affair. Again, on Tuesday morning while it, as a Republican organ, gave only a little more than half a column to the notice of Senator SARGENT's speech of the night before, the Call, which is not a Republican organ, reported the speech in full and gave up two and a half of its columns to it. Yet it could not have been the lack of space which caused the Chronicle to slight its own party's distinguished Senator in the way it did, for in the same double sheet issued on that morning it printed seventeen columns of an argument made in a suit before one of the Courts, in which the public in very little interested, and which appears to partake of the character of a thickness quarrel between the parties involved rather than of a suit for actual damages on either side. It is so unusual, besides, for the Chronicle to print anything of the kind, to such an extent at least, that it is impossible to resist the belief that its object in the instance before us was not entirely for the good of the public. But while it gave up so much of its space to Conner's argument or speech in the law cases, and solicited so little in the speech of its party's Senator, it nevertheless found room in which to pour out more than half a column of its anger and ridicule and dispeat ribaldry upon the Hon. JOHN W. DWINELLE for the glowing apostrophe to the Catholic Church which constituted the peroration of his scholarly and eloquent oration at the Pavilion on the 8th instant. We hope no Catholic voter, either Democrat or Republican, will be influenced to cast his vote contrary to his present intention by anything which he may see in the Chronicle to arouse his indignation or provoke his scorn—for it is bound to pursue its course of antagonism and hatred to the Catholic Church—but we will suggest to the Republicans who do not believe in the policy or efficacy of such a course, as far as it affects their party and the voters, that, if the result in this State in November shall show that their organ in this city has driven away votes which might have given victory in their ticket only for its denunciations or ridicule of the Catholic Church, they must place the responsibility for such an event only where it properly rests.

THE QUESTION OF RIGHT AND OF POWER.

In his admirable and eloquent oration at the Pavilion last Sunday, on the centennial of the Mission Dolores and this city, the Hon. JOHN W. DWINELLE said:

> Under the new régime the mission of the Church should not merely increase it would, but because it should. The same executive power of the forty-nine States of extent of the United States (a not inconsiderable one) which has hitherto been exercised as an unparalleled criminal. A (a logical consequence of the United States not exempt from the subjects of the pontiff Catholic missionary, or a species of the tenure of the power Catholic power.

MR. DWINELLE was right in his expression and statement of the theory and genius of our system of government, but, unhappily, he erred in the matter of absolute fact. Wherein he declared that neither the executive arm nor the legislative department of the Government possessed the right—under constitutional authority—to do the acts of wrong and violence which he mentioned, he uttered simply and clearly the truth; but wherein he stated that it was not within the power of the National Executive and the National Legislature to commit such acts, he lamentably erred, because the testimonies are so plain as they are flagrant, that the present Executive and the Congresses which have legislated in accordance with his policy, have usurped and exercised the power to commit them. In proof of what we here assert it will be necessary only to cite the aggressions and spiritual confessions or sequestrations to which the Catholic Church and its missionary establishments in the Territories of the United States have been and are suffering. Those several and very grievous wrongs and outrages, as well against the individuals under the charge of the Church as against the rights and property of the Church itself, have been perpetrated in some instances by military force backed by Executive authority, but to the most by the shameful perversion of the very law which was passed on the recommendation of the President to enable him to put in force his so called "peace policy" with the Indians.

We have not space to enumerate the several instances in which military power, approved and supported by executive authority, has aggressed in the property rights of Catholic missions, and by force wrested them from their first ownership, but we will point out one instance which is notorious. It occurred upon this coast, and related to be a part of the original Territory of Oregon, and now is in Washington Territory, still more outrageous and more grievous were the aggressions, the confiscations and sequestrations which have been committed, under cover of the President's Indian policy towards the Indians, upon the rights and the property of the Catholic Church, and its missionary establishments among the various tribes within the territory of the United States. When President GRANT proclaimed his "peace policy" his language bore but one fair construction. It was that there should be applied to the charge and care of the Indians only such men as would best subserve the interests of the nation and the tribes alike, agreeably to the paramount letter and spirit of the Constitution in the matter of religious belief. It certainly was not contemplated at the time that, under it, the President or any in authority could proceed to the extremity of forcing from the spiritual instruction of the Indians the missionaries of their own choice, the priests who had served and taught and led them for years in religious duties, and in teaching them the arts and industries of civilized life by which to cultivate the soil to their own support and benefit nor was ever the suspicion awakened that so great an outrage could be committed by virtue of that policy as that of actually forcing the founders and Fathers of the Catholic missions from the very lands and establishments, or the schools and sacred edifices, which they had first settled upon and built and consecrated to the Church and for the good of the Indians, and then of installing in their places, to take possession of their property and to leave charge of their missions, the appointees of the President who were selected from another faith to preach to the Indians another religious belief, and to deprive them of the instruction of their beloved teachers and of the consolation of their own faith. Yet it was to these extremities that the President immediately proceeded, and no less steps, in almost every instance, were taken by the usurpation of rightful executive power the new amendment would be perverted into an engine, the whole machinery of which should be erected to the purpose of uprooting and destroying the schools wherein Catholic parents could have their children taught agreeably to their own wishes, and in battering down the Catholic Church in the land of religious freedom. In short, under the proposed school amendment, as designated by GRANT and pushed on by BLAINE and others of that ilk, there would eventuate that species of persecution and persecution by which he advocates and supporters hope at last to "exterminate Popery," and to dishearten Catholic ordinances of the rights and liberties which the Constitution now guarantees to them in common with all other citizens. Need we say more on the subject?

Fair in Aid of St. Francis' Church.

THE annual fair in aid of St. Francis' church, Valley street, was formally opened Thursday evening, and it will continue during the whole of the ensuing week. The display on the several tables is varied and attractive, some of the articles for disposal being of a very desirable character. The fair is in abundance of their best to make the time pass agreeably for the visitors, and, as a matter of course, to get rid of their wares at ridiculously low figures! Nobody ever goes to a fair with the intention not to be sold wonderfully cheap. We hope that during the coming week the patronage of the public, which was given on this occasion will be repeated in a still more liberal manner. The object is a most worthy one, and it is—I did not almost say the only—one for which no charity has been established in the city. As San Francisco grew, however, the population spread south, the rich abandoned the district for more fashionable locations, and the end was that St. Francis' parish became a comparatively poor one. But a debt, which under other circumstances would not be burdensome, though now it is felt to be embarrassing, has been incurred in the building of the church, and the annual fairs are all that can be spared to diminish the debt, and consequently it is rather slow of extinction. Nevertheless it is disappearing gradually, and in the course of a few years it will be completely removed. Every zealous and generous Catholic should help on this good work, for though the pay by dividend has yet been private, a community of interest and sympathy ought to bind all.

The Place to Buy Brass Goods.

We direct the attention of our readers, both lovers and others, to the new advertisement of J. J. O'Brien & Co. of "The Arcade," 921, 923 and 925 Market street, where will be found elsewhere in our columns a long list of the most desirable purchases of the best and most fashionable styles of brass goods made recently in New York. The vast and daily increasing business of "The Arcade," which now enjoys a high reputation as the best place to Conse, makes it possible for J. J. O'Brien & Co. to dispose of very great quantities of even the finest class of goods, and this, of course, enables the house to purchase at figures much below the ordinary rates. It is the invariable custom at "The Arcade" to give all patrons a fair share of the advantages gained by this system of cash buying and direct importation. So sooner is a bargain concluded either in New York, London or Paris, as the case may be, than intelligence is forwarded hither, and the goods are positively purchased at prices at once known the public can understand and appreciate. This, indeed, may be considered as the chief secret of that success which has gained for "The Arcade" the leading position which it occupies to-day. We would, therefore, again recommend all who have the opportunity to inspect the stock of new goods lately arrived and specially alluded to in the advertisement.

MUSIC RECEIVED.—Among the music received this week we especially notice "Under the Locust Trees," song and chorus by U. C. Burnap, from the firm of M. Gray 105 Kearny street, and "What Nbe Thought" by the same composer and from the same house; also, the "March of the Exempt Fire Company," composed by Charles Schultz and dedicated to E. B. Cotter, Esq., President of the Company.

The Modoc Independent says: "Owing to the low price of corn, some of our young men have decided not to plant their Fall, preferring to let the front remain on the sheep until next spring."

Mrs. Mary Lothridge, widow of the late John Lothridge of Santa Rosa, was buried to-day in her home on Mission st., near the Catholic Church in that city, on Thursday night of last week.

The official statement of the Secretary of State shows the total vote for Governor (Booth, Republican, over Talbot, Democrat, in the 49 of 53 Mono.

CATHOLICS IN PEACE AND POWER.

Considering the numbers, the wealth, the intelligence and patriotism of the Catholic community in the United States, and considering that the Constitution forbids the making of religious belief either a recommendation or a bar to election to public office, there are astonishingly few Roman Catholics in place or power here. We grant that in the small and insignificant offices, State or municipal, where the work is hard and the pay not extravagant, a certain percentage, by no means large, of men professing Catholicism are admitted; but positions of honor or emolument, which bring men into national prominence and confer high social rank, are rigorously withheld from them—quite as rigorously as if penal laws were in existence and they were disqualified from holding them. These places are regarded as being the exclusive property of persons belonging to some Protestant denomination, or else to men who profess no faith at all, and who are, therefore, infidels. One might imagine that the doors of these honorable and desirable departments of national dignity and responsibility were ornamented with the inscription: "No Irish need apply," or "No Catholic admitted." Such is our spirit of our Government, because it expressly decrees religious liberty for all. And the inspires not alone that nobody shall be molested on account of his faith, but that he shall not debar him from holding any office, no matter how high, honorable or remunerative, under this republic. The persons, the party, who organize secret societies, who agitate religious questions, who encouragement, or who create popular excitement about the "progress of Romanism," and who aim at restricting the rights or privileges of Catholic citizens, violate the fundamental principles of the Constitution, which all should hold sacred, and convict themselves of traitorism, of being enemies of true republicanism, and of being unworthy of the country which gave them birth.

But, in spite of all this dead weight of bigotry and prejudice, Catholics do not unfrequently work their way into prominence in national affairs. They, when they do, they invariably prove themselves to be men of the highest ability, of the most unimpeachable character, and of the most undoubted patriotism. The two rings, the clique, the bar rises our demands still higher. Let us, Sybilline, put a higher price on our wares. Let us favor foreign ideas, not, of course, in words—mere vibrations of air—but by firm and stern resolve, that we are resolved to have independence. Let every Home Rule constituency in Ireland and treat Heath as he was a judge (one of the candidates for Parliamentary honors that, if elected, they abstinent "take their seats" in a sham assembly. Let them thus unite the cry in Hungarians, who, by this patriotic procedure for years in succession, will the sword of Pesseh in front, wrung from Austria their substantial autonomy, and thus, with Austria, made a powerful confederation. Let us not be ashamed to be, and to be called, a Protestant that he is not to be listened. Why, the brightest names in the State of Irish patriotism are Protestant. Mymons, Swift (he Gallraith of his day)),

The Rev. Father Lavelle, P. P., on Mr. P. J. Smyth.

The patriotic parish priest of Cong has addressed the following letter to the Dublin Freeman:

CONG, September 15, 1876.

SIR—After a long silence, not unobserved by my countrymen at home and abroad, I feel bound at length, no matter how much unwilling, to raise my voice in my country's cause. My silence, I am aware, has been misinterpreted, but my explanation, and it is—I did not absolutely [illegible] of three years. The sentiments and principles of to-day," identical with those I professed and [illegible] to profess and defend to the [illegible] gloomy days not long since gone. Those sentiments, principles and heartfelt aspirations I now shall resume unto up to my usual breath—the absolute right of my country to complete independence of foreign rule.

With these preliminary remarks I beg, with your permission, to offer my views on the present controversy between Mr. P. J. Smyth and "Home Rule." I have carefully not alone kept myself au courant with the current history, but even assisted, as far as I could, its merits and demerits; and I venture to say that I brought to my study a dispassionate mind. Now, the fact is that National Hungarian outrages, cannot be very long—said they, when our "Senate of Princes" are again required, let only the man who pledges himself not to sit in the hostile assembly, and I know full well the responsibility which I incur by this candid profession; but, believing as I do that the fate of Ireland will not be at once decided by the public deeds. I remain yours faithfully,

PATRICK LAVELLE, P. P.

You cannot eat a duck on goose eggs and hatch anything but goslings. No amount of shouting, or of outcry, or of eulogies on the duck will alter the result. You cannot make a Hayes on the eggs of Bismarck and produce anything but a brood of corruption, and it's no use trying.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

to swear fealty to the Mexican Constitution, he nevertheless extended his protection as much as it was possible in conformity with the instructions which the new Governor had given him. It was impossible for him to prevent the confiscation of the property of the bishops, the old ministers of the Gospel and the new Governor. He appreciated them very much, and if he had to proceed against some of them it was ingloriously enough, because he had no sympathy or partiality against them. After governing during five years very judiciously Escandida succeeded in getting together, with his friends, Fathers Lino Rey and José Calpatrano some 8,000, to return to Mexico. Don Manuel Valadrid, the then acting secretary of his advent, got the good will of the Governor, and was very intimate with them. The Governor, José Juan Fuente, fourth Mexican Governor, was an illustrious and just man. He died poor. Governors Gutierrez, Cinco, Alvarado, Nicholinzo, and the last Pic Pico, had to face here entirely

REVOLUTIONARY MEASURES.

The Fathers had gone; the Neophyte Indians had become gentle; the Mission had remained solitary, and the Governor, in such circumstances, had to take possession of the lands claimed by the missionaries in their eminent right and for the defence of the country against the invasion that already I loved. The ancient Fathers, when they saw that the political horizon came was going to sweep away the system of Missions, began to reduce to money the property they could not take away. In the Missions of San Gabriel, San Luis Rey, San Juan Capistrano, Santa Barbara, San Fernando, and others, with individuals, and from the years 1834 to 1836 more than $1,000 000 were thus realized from which they claimed the share. The money which was accumulated by the Missions from the time of their primitive years all over, it seems to be so, in Spain, Mexico, and Italy, and I think it all went to its proper destination. But this is it, many, many of the Governors now nor the Californian ever got the least part of the money. The Mexican War, the Revolution of 1846, the Missions maintained the troops because the Governor of Mexico did not send them. But it is important to under-stand that the Spanish flag floated over California, and that the fathers did nothing else than comply with the orders of the King. At the same time they had to look towards their own preservation and the maintenance of the Missions as the soldiers were employed as escorts to the Missions, and to accompany the Governors when they went to visit them. Besides, the Missions kept the Indians whole communities and all the white people were thus persuaded.

In 1691 Guadalupe missionaries came from Mexico and stopped at the Mission of San Francisco. They succeeded, by putting in charge of it Father Magnes Dome, who were appointed by the political Governor, until it was put in charge of the Indian Santillana, who was afterwards ordained in Rome by the Most Archbishop of California, Francis Garcia Diego.

Father Geronimo has his retrospect in another column of history. From to-day we must proceed to those, our fortunate descendants, who will see the advent of the second of the fourteen Archbishops of the Mission of San Francisco de Asis. I have said."

The band played a selection of patriotic airs, and the poetry of the address had still remained throughout the exercises dispersed.

CORNER-STONE LAYING.

A New Church Dedicated to St. Francois de D'Assisi to be Erected alongside of the Old Church.

At the conclusion of the ceremonies in the Parliament the Archbishop and Bishop O'Connell took a carriage and proceeded directly to the Mission Dolores for the purpose of laying the corner stone of the new church, although it was after sixty years ago by a single dwelling that sat in which the direct stood. The new church will be erected on the north side of the Mission church. The corner-stone is of Scotch granite, and is sixty inches long, thirty-six wide, a square opening was cut into the upper half to contain the casket. It was covered with a block of stone with a cross cut into the stone and slit. In the front of the corner-stone also was cut the date, 1876. The corner-stone was prepared by Lorenzo Sbarbi, the partner supplying the stone for the new Stock Exchange. The stone was laid in the northeast corner of the tower to be erected in connection with the church. The church will be one hundred feet high, with stone facings and trimmings. Its estimated cost will be about $40,000. The old church will have a new front and will be used as a school. All the world knows the former, and perhaps something of the latter; but I could not bring up any conception of Luther in Germany to the idea I had of him before. I saw his manuscripts, collections of his works and portraits; but his big drinking cups were after all the most prominent memorials he left behind him. He was a jolly old soul, hearty and free. I felt very easy, and banged away at the Pope and the devil with good will and good effect. But there was nothing high and grand about him. I went to see the place where the devil is said to have lain and thrown the ink-bottle at Augsburg; but even there, not a gleam of poetry associated itself with his name. The huge drinking cup seemed to swallow up everything, and the culprit, said to be his, appeared to tell the whole story:

"Who loves not wine, woman and song,
Remains a fool all his life long."

In short, his burly face and figure, and the goblets that testify to his powers, made it absolutely impossible for me to connect any heroic idea with the man."

God's Will—The Laws of Nature.

At St. Mary's, Moorfields, London, September 10th, Very Rev. Canon Gilbert preached the first of a course of sermons on "God's Will—the Laws of Nature and Social Prosperity," taking for the foundation of his remarks, "Teach me to do Thy Will, for Thou art my God." (Psalm cxliii, 10).

Having pointed out the necessity of seeking to know God's will, the revered preacher said that it was written in the Bible, in conversation and nature—and those who studied them were prosperous in the world. Some people were ready to admit that there was nothing easier than to discover God's will. Of general principles this might be true, but really there was a good deal more complicated and knotty than to discover God's will. Good people were often boasted gave their own opinions, and said it was God's will. Speaking of the diversity of opinion on and interpretations of revelation, the reverend preacher likened the teaching of the sects to the several branches of the one science. A medicine there was homœopathic, allopathic and many others holding antagonistic views, each seeking claiming to be right. So it was with regard to the numerous human sects; no one of how contrary might be their interpretations, they formed an opinion and then published it as God's will. God's will was not to be looked upon in two spheres—His positive will and His permissive will. Those things within His order are His positive will; those He suffers to occur are by His permissive will. The latter he does not desire, but their being occurred through no man conduct He permits them to happen. Speaking generally, all accidents and calamities that visit this earth, with but few exceptions, are brought about by the folly and stupidity of man. Hunger for instance, and disease all in his power to prevent them, and famine and pestilence were brought on by the brute force of a majority is as obnoxious as if it were done by a single individual—Pot-a Nero of Rome or a Philip II. of Spain. And this we should realize did we live in a city where there was a Roman Catholic majority, which should insist in judging from its point of view that religious exercises would become promote the moral education of the children, and then the only logical result would be to—

How ordering the school system which religious sexists so loudly clamor for, as the only hope of saving the country, with the Bible on the "schoolmarm's" desk, is thus set forth:

"It must be a hope of a settlement which shall leave us a public school system but in removing the whole matter of religion from the control of the State, and committing it to Christian over Jew or Rationalist, or to the religious belief of any man over the faith of another.

Of course there is very little hope of controlling the present school system while separate are obliged to pay their taxes to the support of a school to which they cannot conscientiously send their children.

Mr. Patton's illustration of opening the the Board of Trade with a chapter from Bible, could be carried still further, and the "House of David" might be opened with a chapter, selected from some Rabbinic tale, from the Psalms of David. We do not wish to give the learned lecturer a "pat on the back," on the old Scotch formula of "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," but coming from such an unexpected quarter we should like to see more than $4,000 realized from which they claimed the state. The money which was accumulated by the Missions from the time of their primitive years all over, it seems to be so, in Spain, Mexico, and Italy, and I think it all went to its proper destination. But this is it, many, many of the Governors now nor the Californian ever got the least part of the money. The Mexican War, the Revolution of 1846, the Missions maintained the troops because the Governor of Mexico did not send them. But it is important to understand that the Spanish flag floated over California, and that the fathers did nothing else than comply with the orders of the King. At the same time they had to look towards their own preservation and the maintenance of the Missions as the soldiers were employed as escorts to the Missions, and to accompany the Governors when they went to visit them. Besides, the Missions kept the Indians whole communities and all the white people were thus persuaded.

In 1691 Guadalupe missionaries came from Mexico and stopped at the Mission of San Francisco. They succeeded, by putting in charge of it Father Magnes Dome, who were appointed by the political Governor, until it was put in charge of the Indian Santillana, who was afterwards ordained in Rome by the Most Archbishop of California, Francis Garcia Diego.

Father Geronimo has his retrospect in another column of history. From to-day we must proceed to those, our fortunate descendants, who will see the advent of the second of the fourteen Archbishops of the Mission of San Francisco de Asis. I have said."

The band played a selection of patriotic airs, and the poetry of the address had still remained throughout the exercises dispersed.

CORNER-STONE LAYING.

A New Church Dedicated to St. Francois de D'Assisi to be Erected alongside of the Old Church.

At the conclusion of the ceremonies in the Parliament the Archbishop and Bishop O'Connell took a carriage and proceeded directly to the Mission Dolores for the purpose of laying the corner stone of the new church, although it was after sixty years ago by a single dwelling that sat in which the direct stood. The new church will be erected on the north side of the Mission church. The corner-stone is of Scotch granite, and is sixty inches long, thirty-six wide, a square opening was cut into the upper half to contain the casket. It was covered with a block of stone with a cross cut into the stone and slit. In the front of the corner-stone also was cut the date, 1876. The corner-stone was prepared by Lorenzo Sbarbi, the partner supplying the stone for the new Stock Exchange. The stone was laid in the northeast corner of the tower to be erected in connection with the church. The church will be one hundred feet high, with stone facings and trimmings. Its estimated cost will be about $40,000. The old church will have a new front and will be used as a school.

"The Bible in the Schools."

(From the Chicago Post.)

This was the subject of a lecture delivered last Sunday afternoon in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, by Prof. Patton, to as large an audience as could be packed into Farwell Hall. Those who pleaded, knowing that the orator was one of the bluest of the true-blue Presbyterians—whose prosecution of Prof. Noting for "heresy" in preaching liberal doctrines not in accordance with the views of the early Covenanters is well known—perhaps expected to hear the exclusion of the Bible from the schools by the Board of Public Instruction denounced, but were much taken aback when they heard this champion of Presbyterianism openly proclaim that the use of the Bible was the worm gnawing at the heart of the great tree of "Public Schools." Of course the professor could not help having his fling at Rome; and though he might in fact a momentary pain, we will freely forgive him for the balm he brings to the wound.

After reviewing the Constitution of the United States, the several State Constitutions, the homogeneous character of our population, and the objects of the Bible and Christianity, he goes on to say that this is not a question as to the intrinsic value of the Bible, nor is there a disposition on the part of the people to exclude the Bible through misapprehension, or for popular effect, "the one prohibited book." It can be used for legitimate secular purposes, or say other work might be; but when it is sought to be introduced, or retained, as an inspired, authoritative volume of religion and morals, and to be read as an exercise in daily worship, it comes under the same objection as do all other religi ne works concerning which there is a difference among the supporters of the schools. Let any one seek to introduce the Roman missal or the Episcopal prayer book, or Doddridge's' Rise and Progress,' or any book, however excellent in itself, into the public schools, and he will find himself at once in the "cock-pit of the community only, and not forever, until it was put in charge of the Indian Santillana, who was afterwards ordained in Rome by the Most Archbishop of California, Francis Garcia Diego.

We believe with him, of course, that the true American doctrine is an entire severance of Church from State. Tale doctrine has been contended for by Catholics of this country more than by Protestants. The State may tolerate all kinds of house of worship, from the Mormon-house of the Christians to the "camp meeting" of the Methodists; but when it comes to our public schools, supported by public taxation, he says, "The only safe principle is to take the whole subject of religion out of the public schools, and remit it to the Church and family." He continues:

"Purely religious questions do not pertain to the State, and with reference to them no man's conscience is so inviolable as that of the public schools. By so doing, we should simply burn the brand of hypocrisy into our own foreheads!"

WHAT KIND OF A MAN LUTHER WAS.

Luther is generally grossly misrepresented by those who have never thoroughly studied his character or his work in the way of appreciating it. In a book entitled "Familiar Letters from Europe," by C. C. Felton, late President of Harvard University, we have a striking illustration of this. The writer says: "It is singular how certain names grow upon you in Germany and elsewhere dimicish; at least they have done so with me. Take Luther and Albrecht Durer.

Grammar School Extraordinary.

Pupil—Man is a common noun of the feminine gender.

Teacher—Can you tell me what, sir?

Pupil—Man is a common noun, feminine gender; common, because he can be bought and sold, and feminine gender because he's got more woman on the brain; might perhaps, because his wife and six children come to live in the objective case and governed by woman.

Teacher—Go to your seat and put a wet towel on your head. Next; parse woman, pupil.—Woman is a female noun of the feminine gender.

Teacher—Mercy on us! What do you mean?

Pupil—She's a female noun of the masculine gender; masculine 'cause she wears breeches and is determined to vote; feminine gender, because she has curls, whalebone, crinoline, sunbelts and thunder clouds in the first person because she is always making more noise than half a dozen boys in the objective case and governed by fashion.

Teacher—Sit down and close your mouth or I'll close it for you. Next boy, parse boy.

Pupil—Boy is an uncommon noun, of the masculine gender and feminine sometimes, 'cause he's hard to find nowadays, and a little girl is often found in boy's clothes; female persuasion, 'cause she's always talking about some girl's first person, big like; singular number, 'cause there's nobody but himself in the case and governed by his sweetheart, Sebastian schnappes and his mother's pocket-book.

Teacher—Go home and bathe your head, Neal; parse girl.

Pupil—Girl is an angelic noun, of the feminine gender, and masculine sometimes.

Teacher—Leave us from sudden death! boys will you never be raised. How is the noun, a hen, relish and blubber-wasn't that, sir?

Pupil—Yes, sir, small girl, not three years old, is playing with a key. Now it's standing on a cartridge box, and thinks it is fine tune. The key is the nominative case, fine tune's accusative.

Teacher—Why, you impudent little rascal, you mean to say that you think the key is the nominative case to the fine tune?

Pupil—Yes, sir, because the key opens the fine tune.

Teacher—Leave us from such an explanation.—What did you say, you little Sally?

Sally is an uncommon noun, being a soft tone between small-pox and molasses candy, 'cause neither male nor female can be brought to wear breeches, 'cause nothing can wear pantaloons in proportion to compounded interest, and a low pressure locomotive rolls out in a small circle from the scattered rails of a horse car track—the first that ever rolled in pressage of an up-town road for the mariner from the jagged reef of Hell Gate. A genuine specimen of the unimpugned order hangs above the yellow waters. Nouns that add second to minutes with not the slightest

A DREAM OF THE FUTURE.

I dreamt a dream, a dazzling dream, of a green isle far away;
The glowing west in the ocean's breast caiteth the dying day.
And that island green was as fair a scene as ever man's eye did see,
With its rhododendron bold and the campanile old, and its home-and-the-stare tree.
No foreign foe did the green isle know—no stranger band is here,
Save the merchant train from sunny Spain and from Afric's golden shore;
And the young man's heart would fondly start, and the old man's eye would smile,
As their ship-sign would roam o'er the ocean's foam to that lone and holy isle."

Years passed by, and the orient sky blazed with a new-born light,
And Bethlehem's star shone bright afar o'er the fort world's darkness night;
And the diamond shrines from plundered mines, and the golden fanes of Jove,
Melted away in the blaze of day at the simple spell-word Love.
The light severe o'er the island green played with its varying beauty,
And the fires of Zeal waxed dim and pale like the stars of the morning scream;
And o'ring by river, in the bright air clear, from out each sunny glade,
The thrilling bell from the quiet cell or the alcazar's ancient arcade.

A cloud of night o'er that dream so bright soon with its dark wing came,
And the happy voices of that island green was lost in blood and shame!
For its kings sober hearted their trust, and its queens, though fair, were frail—
And a robber band from a stranger land with their wiles around them cast.
A final spoil on that green isle fell—a shadow of death and gloom
Passed without relief from shore to shore, like breath of the simoom!
And rush green hillside was crimson dyed, and each stream ran dyed red and wild
With the mingled heart of the brave and good—of mother and child and child!

Death was my dream, though many a gleam of hope through that black night broke,
Like a star's bright form thro' a wheeling storm, or the morn thro' a midnight oak!
And many a time, with its wings sublime and with its soft breath
In softness fair,
Would the morning rise on eastern skies but ev'ermore again in night—
For in that poverty the people there still raised their tortured heads,
When the name of right and the power to smite are in the hands of tyrants dead!
For those it the would meet at the morner's test, and heed not the populace's sad,
Would bow in awe to that first great law—a banding nation's cry.

At length arose o'er that isle of woes a dawn with a purple smile,
And its inspirer bore a voice of power awake the slumbering soil;
And the people all obeyed the call of their chief's unexpected head,
Vowing to raise, as sacred days, the name of their own dear land.
My dream grew bright as the sunbeam's light as I watched the isle's career
Through the varied scenes and the joys serene of many a future year—
And oh! what thrill did my bosom fill as I stood on a pillared pile,
Where a senate rose more in power watched o'er the rights of that lone Green Isle!

POLAND AND BULGARIA.

The Atrocities Committed by Russia Thirteen Years Ago in Poland.

The Berlin correspondent of the London A. D. 1863 the 19th ty very nmg ago, ——— yet in that year horrors and atrocities were perpetrated by a Christian power in a Christian country of the European continent, before which the hideous abominations of even the fearful Turkish massacres in Bulgaria pale into comparative insignificance. Strangely enough, the Christian power in question is the very same which at the present moment vouchsafes the cruel variety of humanitarian cry with lungs of brass. By a grim irony of fate, the murderers, incendiaries, torturers, violators and destroyers of thirteen years ago are so exasperated by self indignation at what, at the best, is but a feeble and half-hearted imitation of their own remarkable exploits, that they can hardly be restrained from furbishing the world with further proofs of their philanthropy, at point of bayonet or the sword of the executioner in one hand, and the flaming brand, wherewith to burn the infidel out of house and home, tightly clutched in the other. Two evils do not make one good; the infamies committed by regular Russian soldiers in Poland in 63 were as nothing to the villanies of the deeds done by irregular Turkish volunteers in Bulgaria; but one may be permitted a view of the agitation now raging in Russia, and of the overwhelmingly virtuous indignance of the Russian official press to mutter softly to one's-self in a humble and depressing manner, "Those who preach should practice!"

Hear what the Dniewnik Polski, a highly respectable Warsaw paper, had to say in respect to the Christian demeanor of the Russian officers and soldiers who were charged by the Czar Alexander Nicolaievitch with the suppression of the Polish insurrection in the year 1863. The whole of the facts it recounts have never reached the cognizance of the British public; others have been known and forgotten. The moment is, perhaps, not inopportune for once more bringing those tragedies under the strong light of publicity:

"A name is still pronounced with trembling lips in Poland, when the insurrection of 1863 is spoken of; it is that of General de Bellegarde. His headquarters were established in Radom. He was a man of lofty stature, with the profile of a bird of prey. Whenever a few fugitive insurgents were brought before him, and their mothers, betrothed, or sisters pleaded for mercy to them, he used to exclaim, in his hard, harsh voice, 'They shall hang; basta! or 'They shall be slaughtered, and you with them!' Close to Radom, to the left of the high road to Warsaw, there is a little meadow. Upon this spot Bellegarde had a permanent gallows erected, upon which hundreds of insurgent prisoners were strangled in cold blood. Their bodies were then into a trench dug by. Some women of Radom crept out of the town during the night and strewed flowers upon the corpses lying in the open trench. Bellegarde heard of this, and forthwith had the pit filled up, and ordered a number of Cossacks to compel their horses to trample upon it until it was level with the surrounding ground, and upon had the whole meadow covered with dung, so that the place of burial might be totally effaced. The murdered insurgents were Christians, nevertheless; but, then, so were their murderers!

"General Stanislejew had his headquarters at Siedlin. He alone caused seven hundred human beings, some insurgents, others only suspected of having taken part in the revolt, to be hanged opposite his house. Every time an execution came off he stood smiling and watching at his window, and always appeared highly diverted when the women standing round the foot of the gallows knew shrieked louder than usual in their agony. When women came to him to implore his mercy he was wont to beat them furiously with his flats, throw them on the ground and stamp them with his spurred heels. The priest Stanislaus Brzoska had cut with a few resolute adherents to the neighborhood of Lithuia, when the revolt was already at any quelled. He was taken at last, and when he was brought before the General, the latter shouted, 'Give me the scoundrel here!' A fearful scene was enacted. Marijohn seized the priest, struck him with extended fist in the eyes, knocked his feet to out, flung him down on the floor, throttled him and trampled upon him. When the poor victim was senseless, he was carried out to the gallows and hanged.

"Another instructive example of Moscovite philantrupopy was furnished by a colonel who commanded the Russian forces in the government at Plock. At the close of the struggle, which ended disastrously for the Poles, there was found among the wounded a non-commissioned officer who had been an orfarly of Korik. The Colonel, when he heard this, had the wounded man brought to him, and said to him, 'Krok has always let his Russian prisoners go, and even gave them a half rouble apiece to keep them from starving on the road; so I will also let you go free.' But before the man was set at liberty this monster caused him to be mutilated in a manner indescribable—that the unfortunate wretch died the next day. He caused another wounded prisoner to undergo the same treatment, and to be twisted in a number of small ropes, and then burnt alive.

"A long list of names could be made out of such unnatural monsters from among the Russian officers who took an active part in putting down the insurrection. Zurkieff, Andrieff, Rudolph Wolf, and Count Berg's nephew, figure in the foremost rank of these butchers and mutilators of humanity. How many a Polish obsequy of noblemen and peasant colonies were, without the least provocation, fallen upon, pillaged and burnt to the ground by these Christian officers! The men were held down on the ground and hacked till they lay mangled and lifeless; the women were mercilessly violated by the Russian soldiery. Count Alfred F. a Circassian by birth, spread terror wherever he went by the following method of proceeding: When he encountered a carriage or cart on the public roads, he made the occupants get out, and had them mounted on their backs and beaten with blood. If they asked why they were treated in so barbarous a manner, he first shot them [illegible] 'It is only the prologue to my question of where are the insurgents?' and how on will be well disposed to give me an answer!'

"At Wilcoviecen, on November 28, 1863 the insurgent leader Kosciakowski, who had formerly been an artillery officer in the Russian service, was condemned to be shot. The soldiers told off to execute him, however, aimed so badly that after several volleys the man was not dead yet. He was still mutilated. They got tired of firing at him, and flung him, still alive, into a deep ditch full of water, where he was drowned. A peasant woman who had witnessed the whole proceeding was so epileptic and outraged by the cruelty of this fiend act, that she broke into loud anocrations against its perpetrator, and was upon that ordered off, flung by her husband, over, and drowned her by force.

"The two brothers Kosowska, in Mobilew, despite their entreaties to be shot, were buried alive.

"Numerous townships—as, for instance, Wengrow, Mosbow, Siemiatycze—were totally destroyed; old men, women and children were slaughtered in them by hundreds."

The Dniewnik Polski solemnly affirms that in the manner hereof, and of many similar acts, the Russian army distinguished itself nearly and able to prove every assertion contained in its statements, and lays particular stress upon the fact that these ghastly crimes were not committed by the irregulars, such as the Turkish Bashi-Bazouks let loose in Bulgaria, but by soldiers of the regular Russian army. "And," concludes the Dniewnik Polski, "not only soldiers, but officers of high rank, generals and colonels, erected the monuments for their own glory in Poland. How, with such a reckoning as this upon their conscience, the Russians can dare to pronounce sentences over foreign deeds of darkness, is indeed a physiological novelty which the present age owes exclusively to our Russians!"

I, who have been with my own eyes how Christians make war against Mahometans in Eastern Europe, cannot help feeling that injustice to the latter is being done if the question be allowed to rise all one way, and confined in one narrow channel. The massacres in Bulgaria, even stripped of all exaggeration and reduced to their actual proportions, are horrible. Nothing, for instance, could paint their terrors to the mind's eye. Englishmen would do well to read in their mountain a thence exertion of Mr. Tennie's, which thrilled the heart of Oreat Britain a dozen years ago, under which were printed the ominous words, "Order reigns in Warsaw!"

To Shake, or not to Shake?

Are, that is the question. Is it better to quiver from head to foot in the paroxysms of the ague or is better the chronic misery of a course of that standard anti-febrific remedy, Hostetter's Bitters, there cannot be much question as to how we prefer to undergo the excruciating torture of the former. Every locality on this continent whose inhabitants are tormented with the shivering pangs of fever and ague, the demand for the only genuine preventive and eradicator of malaria provided by science, the confidence of eastern people in it has never been exceeded by their faith in any remedy. Quinine, arsenic, bunnock—what a host of poisonous drugs have been given upon pillaged and burnt to the ground by these Christian officers! The men were held down on the ground and hacked till they lay mangled and lifeless; the women were mercilessly violated by the Russian soldiery. From Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, of Boston, formerly Editor of the "Christian Freeman."

DEAR SIR: It may be some satisfaction to you to be informed of my family. My daughter was brought low by a typhoid fever last spring, and after the physicians had exhausted their skill to the simplest food furnished her. For months she remained in the most debilitated condition, but from the first of September last, when she commenced using the Bitters, she began to improve, and now she steadily gained strength, and is restored to health and vigor, after having been given up by the good state of health, and has enjoyed it for several years past. I am so thankful for the good your Bitters have done my family, and for the benefit I have derived from them myself, that I feel constrained to say so, and request you to use my name as you deem best. Yours truly, S. COBB.

A Drowning Man will Catch at a Straw.

If he does it, it will do him no good. The moment of relief, when the rejected cords and [illegible] seem they have become dangerous, will result in a most every position for relief. This is why so many experiments are made by victims of Malaria, in their struggle, buy a bottle of Bitters with confidence. It will build up Nature upon that foundation, and disease will leave, and drowned her by force.

A DREAM OF THE FUTURE.

I dream'd a dream, a dashing dream, of a green isle far away;
The gloaming went to the ocean's breast embath the dying day,
And that insect diffus was as fair a scene as ever man's eye oft see,
With its interlaced beds and its temples tall, and its homes and its mines free.

No foreign foe did the green isle know—no stranger band it bore,
Save the mercenest train from sandy Spain and from Africa's golden shore;
And the young man's heart would fondly start, and the old man's eyes would smile,
As their thoughts would roam over the ocean's foam to that lone and "holy isle."

Years passed by, and the orient sky blazed with a new-born light,
And Bethlehem's star shone bright afar o'er the lost world's darkening night;
And the dim-eyed shrines from plundered mines, and the golden fanes of Jove,
Melted away to the blaze of day at the simple spell, word Love.

The fight across o'er the inland green played with its native brave,
And the fires of Baal waxed dim and pale like the fires of the morning stream;
And "rose by rose, in the bright air close, from out each sunny glade,
The deathly bell from the spiral cell or the cloister's tranquil shade.

A cloud of night o'er that dream so bright soon with its dark wing came,
And the heapy rivers of that inland green was lost in blood and shame;
For to Alaon color betrayed their trust, and the nation's only fair, were frail—
And a robber band from a stranger land with their war-hosts filled the pale.

A final spell on that green isle fell—a shadow of death and gloom
Painted withering o'er from shore to shore, like breath of the simoom;
And starless nights was crimson dyed, and each sire an ruined red and cold
With the mingled blood of the brave and good—of mothers, and child and child!

Dark was my dream, though many a gleam of hope through that black night broke,
Like a wave's bright form in the ocean's storm, or the more stro's midnight oak!

And many a time, with its whips sublime and with its scathing lightning,
Would the morning rise on eastern skies but to vanish again in night—
For in sad priest prayer the people there still raised their fettered hands,
When the sword of right and the power to smite are the spirit that commands.

For those o'be would never at thy monster's tear, and bend and to a robber's sigh.
Would bow in awe to that first great law—a hundred soldier's lay!

At length arose over that isle of woes a dawn with a steadier smile,
And its mother bore a voice of power across the clamoring isle;
And the people all obeyed the call of their chief's unwhipped sword,
Vowing to raise, as its ancient days, the name of their own dear land.

My dream grew bright as the sunbeam's light as I watched the isle's career
Through its battle field scenes and the joys across of many a festive year—
And oh! what thrill did my bosom fill as I stood on a pilgrim's pile,
Where a senate once more in power watched over the rights of that none loves the isle!

POLAND AND BULGARIA.

The Atrocities Committed by Russia Thirteen Years Ago in Poland.

The Berlin correspondent of the London

A. D. 1863 was not so very long ago, nor yet in that year coercion and intervention as perpetrated by a Christian power in a Christian country of the European continent, before which the hideous abominations of even the fearful Turkish massacres in Bulgaria pale into comparative insignificance. Strange enough, the Christian power in question is the very same which at the present moment confronts every feature of humanitarian cry with visage of brass. By a grim irony of fate, the murderers, incendiaries, torturers, violators and destroyers of thirteen years ago are so exasperated by holy indignation at what, at the best, is but a feeble and half-hearted imitation of their own remarkable exploits, that they are ready to be rearmed from top to heel, to astonish the world with further proofs of their philanthropy, at point of bayonet—the sword or the musket in one hand, and the flaming brand, wherewith to burn the infidel out of house and home, in the other, grasped in the other. Two evils do not make one good; the infamies committed by the Russian soldiers in Poland in no way excuse the vileness of the deeds done by irregular Turkish volunteers in Bulgaria; but one may be permitted, in view of the agitation now raging in Russia, and of the over-wrought state of virtuous indignation of the Russian official press to maintain softly to one's-self in a humble and deprecating manner, "Those who preach should practise!"

Hear what the Dresdner Pickst, a highly respectable Saxonian paper, has to say with respect to the Christian demeanor of the Russian officers and soldiers who were charged by the Czar Alexander Nicolaievich with the suppression of the Polish insurrection in the year of our Lord 1863. Many of the facts it recounts have never resented the cognizance of the British public; others have been known and forgotten. The moment is, perhaps, not inopportune for once more bringing those tragedies to the strong light of publicity:

"A name is still pronounced with tremb ling lips in Poland, when the insurrection of 1863 is spoken of: it is that of General de Bellegarde. His headquarters were established in Radom. He was a lean man of lofty stature, with the profile of a bird of prey. Whenever a few fugitive insurgents were brought before him, and their mothers, betrothed, or sisters pleaded for mercy in them, he used to exclaim, in his loud, harsh voice, 'They shall hang! Schuft! or 'They shall be slaughtered, and you with them!' Close to Radom, to the left of the high road to Warsaw, there is a little meadow. Upon this spot Bellegarde had a permanent gallows erected, upon which hundreds of insurgent prisoners were strangled in cold blood. Their bodies were thrust into a trench hard by. Some women of Radom crept out of the town during the night and strewed flowers upon the corpses lying in the open trench. Bellegarde heard of this, and forthwith had the pit filled up, and ordered a number of Cossacks to trample their bosoms with their horses' hoofs, in such a manner that the whole meadow should appear level with the surrounding ground, and thus had the whole meadow converted into one huge, wide place of burial might be totally effaced. The murdered insurgents were Christians, nevertheless; but, then, so were their murderers!

"General Rosnitzyres had his headquarters at Siedlin. He alone caused seven hundred human beings, some insurgents, others only suspected of having taken part in the revolt, to be hanged opposite his house. Every time an execution came off he stood smiling and wrinkling at his window, and always appeared highly diverted when the women standing round the foot of the gallows shrieked louder than usual to their agony. When women came to him to implore his mercy he was wont to beat them contumeliously with his fists, throw them on the ground and stamp them with his spurred heels. The priest Nanisiuk fits was tied out with a few resolute adherents in the neighborhood of Lubin, when the ravel was already to ally quelled. He was taken at last, and when he was brought before the tribunal, the latter shouted, 'Was nie hier verurtheilen hier!' A fearful scene was assembled. Manjukin se Zed the priest, struck him with encoded fist in the eyes, knocked his teeth out, flung him down on the floor, mutilated him and trampled upon him. When the poor victim was senseless, he was carried out to the gallows and hanged.

"And that instructive example of Muscovite philanthropy was furnished by a colonel who commanded the Russian forces in the neighborhood of Pilzno. At the close of the struggle, which ended disastrously for the Poles, there was found among the wounded a non-commissioned officer who had been an orderly to Kuuk. The Colonel, when he heard this, had the wounded man brought to him, and said to him, 'Kruk has always let his Russian prisoners go, and even given them a half ruble apiece to keep them from starving on the road; so I will also let you go free.' But before the man was set at liberty this monster caused him to be mutilated in a manner indescribable—so that the unfortunate wretch died the next day. He caused another wounded insurgent, belonging to Kuuk's detachment to be twisted in a number of small ropes, and then burnt alive.

"A long list of names could be made out of such unnatural monsters. From among the Russian generals who took an active part in putting down the insurrection, Count Berg, Antipatr Medinski, and Count Berg's nephew, figure in the foremost rank of these butchers and incendiaries of humanity. How many peaceful chateaux of noblemen and peasant colonies were, without any legal pretext, pounded upon, pillaged and burnt to the ground by these Cossacian officers! The men were put down on the ground and mounted till they lay mangled and lifeless; the women were unscrupulously violated by the beasts of brutality. And if, a Circassian by birth, a spread terror wherever he went by the following method of proceeding. When he encountered a carriage or cart on the public roads, he made the occupants get out, and then insisted until their bodies were a mass with blood. If they asked why they were treated with such barbarous cruelty, he coolly replied: 'It is only the proper answer to questions of yours—are the insurgents? my question of yours—are the insurgents? Now you will be well aware how to give me an answer!'

"At Wilcomierers, on November 20, 1863 the insurgent Stanislaus Kiesskowski, who had formerly been an artillery officer in the Russian service, was considered to be about. The soldiers told off to execute him, however, a mere scratch; finally after several volleys he was but yet dead—only horribly mangled. Tony got lifted if flung at him, and flung him, if he was found to stock full of water, where he drowned. A peasant woman who had witnessed the whole proceeding was so appalled and outraged by the cruelty of this final act, that she broke into loud reproaches against the perpetrators thereupon they seized her, flung her into the water, and drowned her also.

"The Count Plater, Minister to Mobile, law, despite their entreaties to be shot, were buried alive.

"Numerous townships—as, for instance, Wengrow, Mschow, Sosnitzjesse—were totally destroyed by fire, and the men and children were slaughtered in those by hundreds."

The Dresdner Pickst solemnly affirms that in the Saxony there are many persons still able to prove every assertion contained in its statements, and layer particular stress upon the fact that these horrible crimes were not committed by the irregulars, such as are the Bashi-Bazouks of the present day in Bulgaria, but by soldiers of the regular Russian army. "And," concludes the Dresdner Pickst, "many of these soldiers, officers, but officers of high rank, generals and colonels, erected into Governors for themselves in Poland. How, with such a reckoning as this upon their consciences, the Russian officials in Poland can continue unconcerned before foreign deeds of darkness, is indeed a physiological novelty which the present age owes exclusively to the Russians!"

I, who have seen with my own eyes how Christians make war against Mahomedans in Eastern Europe, cannot help feeling that injustice is likely to be done, if public indignation be allowed to run all one way, and confined to one narrow channel. The massacres in Bulgaria, even stripped of all exaggeration and reduced to their actual proportions, are horrible. But, on the other hand, in plastering their terrors to the mind's eye, Englishmen would do well to recall to their memories a remark made by Mr. Tennisl's, which thrilled the heart of Great Britain a dozen years ago, under circumstances of the ofnibious words, "Order reigns in Warsaw!"

To Shebe, or not to Shebe?

Aye, that is the question. Is it better to suffer from heat in the shade, or to seek relief in the cool breeze? Or, to make the directions clearer by a course of that standard self-deliverance, Hostetter's Bitters, is the question to be asked? And the answer to the materials serious to it is inquiry. From every locality on this continent there comes an increasing demand for the only genuine preventive and remedy of fever and ague, and every year we know how fatally the epidemic is on the increase. The Bitters are the safest remedies of the family. Quinine, arsenic, mercury, lead, are those which produce any fever, which cause either a slow to produce any fever, which cause either a slow to produce any fever, which cause either a slow to

GRAFFITI PENITAL.
(ARCHA. LAGI MAGGIORE.)

The following inscription passes in "Old Mortality," for genuine, without much doubt. It is by Count G. Wicke, a Swedish nobleman, whose poetic genius led to his ruin. Mr Wicke and Mr. Tenby are Freemasons, and he has at present a student in Oxford University.

I.
The rose has turned from gray to red
Since first my spirit wandered forth
From the strand of cities of the North,
And to these mountains fled.

And here I set my face towards home;
Albeit but poor meed it have,
A draught, sunshine, few blood red ear
Mid these the way to Shelf Rooms.

O Shrand Lady who dost hold
Upon the serene hills thy reign!
O Mother mild, thou dost shine
Crowned with bright crown of virgin gold!

O Rome, Rome, at thy feet
I lay these wayside flowers and song
For, all too long have I been away
That roses are by Tiber's stream.

II.
And yet what joy it were for me
To turn my face unto the South,
And hurrying on never stay, never mouth
To kneel again at Peter's!

Or wandering through the ancient places
Feel break the flood of Adam's miracle
To see the purple mist and gloom
Of morning o'er the Appenines!

Or many a storied hidden haunt,
Orchard, or garden cool and gray,
Till rose from the Campagna's way
The notre dame, the golden moment!

III.
A pilgrim from the northern seas—
Thy thousand roses by Thy throne
Of Him who hung on the hill Sorata!
Thou wouldst not scorn my song, methinks,
Albeit with the Angelic Doctor,
And better than the sweetest rose,
The golden fervour of the Soul.

O Joy to see before I die
The Lord enthroned as Eternal King,
And hear the silver Trumpets ring
Out clear as the pulses of God!

Or all the altar of the bliss
Robed with the myriads sanctified,
And I, as a thane of old, stood by
From the cool limits of seas and skies.

IV.
For but what thoughts can one bring
To Heaven or Heaven's King
May I not my heart from me let flow
And only have a song to sing?

Before you troubled me of God
The raspberry gospel did abound,
Or was the country shelter love
Flutter or bathe above the wood,

I shall have run the glorious race
And fought the fight with Paul and Jane,
And carried upon my body scars
Of Him who ever reads hath the Rose.

"Fenians and Home Rulers."

One of the most cheering indications of the existence of a really sound and wholesome spirit among the masses of our countrymen is furnished by the almost complete failure of the endeavors which have recently been made to get up a quarrel between "Fenians and Home Rulers."

There are, beyond doubt, in Ireland, a large number of men who had strong sympathies with the Fenian movement, and who went with it so long as it went in the direction of a power capable of contending against the military might of England. Most of them, we fully believe, are just as willing to-day as they were in the summer time to "sacrifice for their country" if they saw the chance. No child has come upon their feelings of patriotism, nor has their power of reasoning, fanatical claim of personal liberty been a fair share of good feeling and common sense, but they seem to be persuaded that they are under any obligation to hate, or abuse, or assail as traitors the men who are striving to serve their country by other means. They do not join in the cheers which are raised to be taken, because Home Rule movement has not been won in three years, the Home Rule movement must be worthless and mischievous. Probably they know enough of Irish history to know that that style of argument would condemn every patriotic struggle waged in Ireland for seven centuries. Perhaps they recall to mind the fact that a recent endeavor with which they were associated was being prepared for during a period, not of three years, but of three times three, and that in a single night all the labors, and plans, and the high hopes of that period were dashed into ruin. It is but natural that, recollecting these things, and considering also various other circumstances of the case, they should be unwilling to condemn the Home Rule party for not having attained their object within three years. We dare say they recognize the fact that the Irish struggle for self-government has been and may yet be a protracted and strenuous one; that it may be added as nearly in one way but in many ways not that as some or party of Irishmen have a right to stand up and say that all patriotic action in Ireland must be conducted in their way, and in no other.

It is much to the credit of each of our readers when he resists an attention to the parliamentary policy of Fenianism that they cannot be inclined, in any considerable numbers, to join in a war, either of words or of violence against the Home Rule party. Will any one tell us that the new style under which we commonly hear of, as the Home Rulers, in the interval, as we are, of Repeal and the Constitution of '82, are attacked by the voice of Fenianism? We do not believe it. Will any one say that wild insurrection is a term, delivered on platforms before newspaper reporters and in hearing of the police, are commonly and deservedly the fate of the party? Really we cannot think so poorly of their wisdom. Will any one tell us that the mere necessity is brought to make a plot at a lecture in a public hall in Manchester was regarded by the writers of the intelligence of the spirit of Fenianism? It would be hard to credit such a statement. A few men, misled by gross misconception and excited to fanaticism by exciting appeals to their patriotism, may be got to commit themselves to any folly, but no large mass of Irishmen can ever be led into the principal error of wasting "war to the knife" against any form of Irish patriotism.

Two lessons are clearly taught us by the course of our past history. One of these is that it is a great crime against Ireland to create divisions, antagonisms and contentions in the ranks of Irish patriotism; the other is that where these are raised differences of opinion among our countrymen on questions of national politics, it is wrong for any party to endeavor to secure the victory by violent or unfair means into a union with itself. In the second of these conditions of affairs the proper course for each party to pursue is, to let the others seek their own ends in their own modes. As long as England withholds from this country by her right of self-government, so long will there be in Ireland moderate politicians and extreme politicians—men who will choose to strive for one end or of self-government by constitutional methods, and others who will prefer to seek for a different sort of self-government by very different methods. Both parties should recognize this fact, and abandon any idea that either will be able to annihilate the other. Neither party should be so absurd as to affect to possess a monopoly either of wisdom or of patriotism. Each is fully entitled to employ the force of fair argument on behalf of its own lines of policy; but attempts on the part of either to subdue the other by terrorism or Irish violence would be the merriest rain, our thought with evil.

In these views we believe thousands of our countrymen entirely agree. How possible that a few individuals may dissent from them, disregard them, in the name of unison and well-meaning men, but they are bad advisers. Happily we are becoming very clear that they bad advisers are little to be heard in the respectable section of our countrymen. Extreme Nationalists and Home Rulers are steadily refusing to be led by the same. Good-will between these has long existed; it is becoming not a faster but stronger every day. And in the issue we see a good omen for the future of our country. —Dublin Nation.

Radical Campaign Documents.

In my considerable number of men can be found to endorse the campaign rotten-ism of the Republican party—the issues of the coming election are of a character that it is bedding for support upon principles which are in direct opposition to the Constitution of the country, and by means which are surely impossible to find escape once scraped with the refuse of mankind. It is clear that the coming election, especially in November, the Executive of this country will have saved his elevation to a principle of relentless hatred and warfare against seven or eight millions of American men, reckoning among them a multitude of the most eminent, influential and respected men in the Union.

A pamphlet has been forwarded to us from Cambridge, Mass., containing the full harvest of Hayes and Wheeler by a club called the Principia Club, which not the most extensive, succeeded to elect the pioneering expedient can exceed, much less justify. Is it possible that such low-minded villainy as the one issue from the seat of one of our principal universities? The most illiberal envy can be assumed to refer it. It consists of sixteen pages of the most audacious and adversary typing it has ever been our misfortune to examine. Our readers may take the following as a specimen:

"The Bible out of our common schools, the school system itself under the control of the sectarian spirit and despotic church institutions, untaxed church property, the political influence of the Roman priests, a large majority of the officers of the army and navy unconditionally opposed to allegiance to a large ex potentate, the priests forming and drilling military companies in the Southern States, these and other things are already in progress, and only await a change of administration to be openly acknowledged."

Were this all, we could afford to treat it as a jest, for we cannot believe that there are any serious number of Americans fools enough to be led away by such nonsense. But there are passages of libelous and obscene slander of both men and women which we cannot dedicate our columns by quoting. As air of probability is attempted to be thrown in the pamphlet by a sworn assertion by searching their intercourse to be separate priest, and by various other documents which are forthcoming. The Daily Gazette thinks of the foul-mouthed villains who are dared to publish them, and seemly more loathing to the place laden and good priests whose be dishonor them in publishing, for these be the by the compulsion of supposing them to be ignorant enough to believe such grossly improbable and wicked trash.

The merely there must be some law in this country to hinder the dissemination of such obscenities among the people. If the writer cannot be indicted for criminal libel, then what is Mr. Comstock doing, what the Society for the Suppression of Vice, that they do not suppress this high degree of that period were dashed into ruin. It is but natural that, recollecting these things, and considering also various other circumstances of the case, they should be unwilling to condemn the Home Rule party for not having attained their object within three years. We dare say they recognize the fact that the Irish struggle for self-government has been and may yet be a protracted and strenuous one; that it may be added as nearly in one way but in many ways not that as some or party of Irishmen have a right to stand up and say that all patriotic action in Ireland must be conducted in their way, and in no other.

Fleshyism in Ireland.

It is a wonder certainly that our people are so sledge patient to an independent spirit, as all under the influences which are continually tending to human thorn and debase them. Let us take as a specimen the following delectable address which some four hundred little boys and girls of the county Galway were intended to present to a youthful landlord the other day:

—We, the children of the schools on the Mount Bellew property, beg most respectfully to approach Sir Henry Gratten Bellew, our dear young landlord, his amiable sister, Miss Bellew, and his much respected mother, to bid them welcome! welcome! welcome a thousand welcomes home!

"How our hearts rejoice honored sir, to see you grow up so strong and healthy, and how ardently we join in the universal wishes and fervent prayers of our parents and friends, that you may be blessed with health and happy days to occupy that high position to which your title, your rank, and also the traditions of your honored house and name so eminently entitle you.

"Our fondest wish, and the most earnest desire of our souls is to live and see the day when we shall see you will take the place of your noble father, the late error to be lamented, as Captain Bellew, the kindness and best of landlords, and so your presiding for us that symptoms fondi, and also to see you married, and blessed with a family of your own, to succeed you, we have already a model of your kind, generous and benevolent heart, and of the happy relations that must ever exist between you and your devoted tenantry.

"In conclusion, honored sir, we most respectfully beg to assure you that this will be a day of pleasing recollection to us through life, and that we will always think and speak of it with pride and pleasure.

"Begging for you and Miss Gratian Bellew, and also for your gifted and charitable mother, Mrs. Gratian Bellew, every success and kind to the school children, and ever so dear to the tenantry, the blessing of a long and happy life."

Now, we are no enemies of good relations between landlord and tenant. We desire them, but at the same time good relations and a grovelling flunkeyism are very different things. What is an education in public spirit and self-respect this is for four hundred Irish peasants and Irish-reared? Was there ever a more precious piece of bloodboring bathos and craw-thumping obsequiousness? Just read it again. Go for days wish and the most earnest desire of us" means." Why, if the poor little things were praying to gain heaven, they could not say more than this. "Your providing for us this auspicious feast." The "auspicious feast," we are informed in a strain of glorified gush, consisted of roast cake, sweets tea well fruit, and was served out unless arranged in parallel rows in view of the lake, the lovely terrace from which and the genial and treating influence of the atmosphere, combined with the rich variety of the trees, and shady cake and elms, had a most cheering effect on the rosy cheeks. That is to say, the children had a tea-party, and the cake spread in the open air. But then there was also "your great condescension in providing." as if giving Henry Gratian Bellew was a lordly plaster of "this Virginia" in the midst of his simple subjects. Then the blood of the Grattens, it is said to-day, no longer inspires high thoughts for Ireland; but were it not so, and were the young men's Gratian ten times over, this is no way to have children of the Irish race brought up. Pupils of the National system are taught to use the appliance of a new one into the schools of the country by trying to break up the National party and to create out of the germs of dissension for the gratification of his own poor and petty vanity. The reading of these letters was received with bursts of cheers, and loud and repeated cries of "Three cheers with English!" On the motion of Mr. Costello, the public spirited Secretary of the Ellesberry Home Rule Club, seconded by Mr. Burt Snell, the great meeting proceeded at once, and with heartiest enthusiasm, to adopt the following resolutions:

1. It is impossible to tely put in the sentences of the pilgrims without having immediately struck by their honest conviction of the true friendship and sincere attachment, devotion and by their earnest wish to worship God in every truth. At considerable searches of name, money and abundant do they undertake the great journey. After a night spent in a crowded railway carriage, they are to be seen on parties arranged in parallel rows in view of the lake, the lovely terrace from which and the genial and treating influence of the atmosphere, combined with the rich variety of the trees, and shady cake and elms, had a most cheering effect on the rosy cheeks. That is to say, the children had a tea-party, and the cake spread in the open air. Conference of '75, and to pledge itself to support and carry out those principles by every proper means in its power. Mr. Burk's speech—brief, but powerful—set forth in the most forcible and unmistakable manner the position of the struggle now manifestated by the nation; denounced the cowardice of expecting that piety once would, all at once, get all they want from the times as many; and pointed out that while freland, before the Union, had from an Irish Ministry responsible to the native Parliament, the Home Rule programme proposes to provide that indispensable attribute of freedom. In succession to Mr. Burk, speeches by Mr. Meldon, M.P. for Mr. Bernard C. Molloy, Father Kinsella, Dr. Gratian and several other gentlemen, at whose instance resolutions in favor of religious education, fixed tenure at fair rents, and a full political amnesty, were carried by unanimous consent.

The final vote of the day was one of condolence in Mr. Bish. It was moved by Mr. Patrick Cahill, LL D., Honorary Secretary of the Queen's County Independent Club, who made a strikingly eloquent speech, describing himself as one deputied by another great Irish constituency to testify their fidelity to the cause of Home Rule; remarking, with scornful humor, that, if some people are to be credited, the Irish National party is broken up irretrievably about once in every week;" and finally, in a few brief, but weighty sentences, paying a noble tribute to the genius, the courage, the energy, and last when Mr. Butt had brought into play all the leading elements of the movement. Volleys of ringing cheers rent the air, Cahill's eloquent eulogy, and a request by the club to Mr. Butt and his fellow-visitors from the capital to grace the forthcoming proceedings to a close.—Dublin Weekly News.

Monsignor Capel at Lourdes.

The following letter appeared in the London Times of September 18:

SIR—On my arrival here I had the opportunity of reading a leading article on the Secretary of Lourdes, which appeared in the Times of the 11 inst. Being on the spot I have endeavored to seek a reply to some of the questions raised in the article. It is composed that to the week just ended some 20 000 pilgrims have been present. Of course in organ d bands, under the direction of competent persons, composed of priests and laymen, from Belgium, Angoulesme, Perpignan, Nimes, Saumeru, St. Cloy, Dijon, Marseilles and the districts about Lourdes. The variety of persons and of localities whence they come, and the long distances they come with the crowd, enables one to form a judgment of the sincerity and earnestness of the pilgrims who visit the Grotto of Lourdes. As there are always to your knowledge a number of priests and of some of the ministers of religion, I have presumed that such visits are to be received on human testimony, then see the apparition at Lourdes every day for a week, and received a considerable fact. It is, however, no part of Catholic faith, and any one accepted or rejected any or any attitude without the least praise or condemnation.

Apologizing for trespassing to such a length on your space, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

F. J. CAPEL.

The indecent and disgraceful conduct of as Indianapolis Republican such as Shelby, Indiana, the other night, has attracted the attention of the country, and shows of what kind of solve workingmen in that State the Republican party is composed. Two disputants fell on that two thousand drunken Hayes and Wheeler Hoodlums from the Railroad City took part in the unchristian procession, among whom were six hundred negroes belonging to the most vicious, brutal and ignorant of that class of the Indianapolis population. Armed with revolvers and canes, they broke open business houses, gutted saloons and restaurants, maltreated citizens, insulted ladies and inaugurated a reign of terror in the usually quiet town of Shelbyville. The deaths are freely attending and disgusting—as must so that if scenes and

THE SUPPLIANT.

Fury spitting, love of search, more stood beside
The pow'rful Pandora with extended wings;
To them the gracious angel thus replied:
"Depart, ye ills, to wretched those who send desire here through."

Then each of them in turn his merits said—
The first: "I stood by those the graves of Time,
And, like a sentinel, cried forth the dead
To rise and live forever in my rhyme."

Another then: "I am Despair I, and death
The mystic name that I in mortal ears bear,
My stations planted but a single look
Of fear's right hand to make them breathe and live."

The third: "I rivaled nature with my dree;
And to the turf earth, to its darkest bosom,
My pencil traced such scenes as the sentinel view,
The heaping clouds, the tardens and the flowers."

And let the entered; but there still was one,
To whom the angel turned, and spoke: "Say now
What merits claim you to the seat of heaven?"
"I ASK!" the answer. "I have made no show."

"A suppliant am I for entrance here;
But when I do hope, it is to take another place,
Like love's ghosts the sins of many a year
Make me no darkest entrance my face."

The angel: "Go, there is no room for thee."
And as in vain the suppliant turned away,
The spirit with no other voice, imperious
Cried forth from "Keep with me, brother, stay!"

And then they told the angel he had done,
Kind deeds to earth and soul—"I have fear
If by deserving I could win a place
Or be a worthy of even unto here."

They told: "If kingdom and he gave me mine!"
"His dream," were the answer did my place alter!
"I passed his happy home with weary feet,
And he had called me in—I had not known."

"All else was I, he gave me clothes to wear;"
"His love-tokens, when every friend did flee
He came to me"—"He was a benefactor here then;"
"Such were my deeds"—"Nay, no room for thee."

Then sent still fairer than the rest did say:
"Good angel, still I plead for entrance here!"
Ah, do not turn the suppliant away!

"But rather bid him stay, and I will give
My place to him"—"Thou hast no need of this;
Thy love to thy God earth, and thou
For from his side shalt not be parted thence."

To whom the angel: "Sister, in the midst
Of earthly care—agony—I see thee stand
Within the gate of heaven in the world again,
And I will bear thee to the throne of God."

IMPORTANT STATISTICS.

The following statistics, showing the proportionate extent of the most material of vice in Catholic and Protestant countries respectively, has been furnished us by Dr. McKinley of Philadelphia:

Population of Hamburg.....	240,000
Number of Catholics in same.....	10,000
Number of Catholic paupers.....	1,800
Number of Catholic paupers in same.....	1,800
Average.....	18.000
Population of Munich.....	1,500 000
Number of Catholics in same.....	1,000
Number of Catholic paupers.....	14,000
Number of Protestant paupers.....	1,000
Average.....	30,000
Population of Berlin.....	1,000,000
Number of Catholics in same.....	100,000
Number of Catholic paupers.....	17,000
Number of Protestant paupers.....	1,000
Average.....	17,000
Population of Paris.....	1,800,000
Number of Catholics in same.....	1,500,000
Number of Catholic paupers.....	74,000
Average.....	57,000

These ratios hold good, and are in equal proportion, in all the democratic cities. Inquiry through English towns and cities, confirms the greater centers of commerce, such as Paris, Marseilles, Bordeaux, etc., exhibit a proportion four times of Protestant women of the town to given numerals in population. Of the women of the town in England there is one Catholic to eleven Protestants; in Scotland, one to fifteen; in Ireland, one to twenty-six.—N. Y. Tablet.

Yellow Jack Horrors.

The following is an extract from a letter written by a Charleston lady to her brother in New York:

Strange to say, the fever has broken out in our own neighborhood. Last night I found not sleep because of the screams of a mother, whose only child died before midnight in the opposite house. He is the fourth of the family. The others were adults. Next door, a beautiful young lady also has the fever. On Sullivan's Island and Mount Pleasant, heretofore exempt in other epidemics, it is worse than in the city. The negroes say Mr. George W. Williams, our most prominent merchant, died on the island on Monday. After he was laid out a letter for him came from his betrothed, but it was too late, and at his mother's request I placed it unopened on his breast. He was the color of an orange. It is truly a fearful disease.

Nearly one and best from here is quarantined. Even the interior towns are closed against us. Truly, we can only trust in Providence. A pall overhangs, and God knows the end.

Our young men have to be out all night, and every night guard the city. Last Monday evening the regulars issued forth to the torchlight processions. Among the transparencies of which the negroes boasted in advance, was one representing a negro wife woman at the foot of a negro, supplanted and debased by the other a white woman saving a negro baby.

Think of this! Would such a sight as this be tolerated in a Northern State? Never! Where I came from the negro would have made for the woods, never to return. Here he will wear his head as high as the highest, and I'll warrant he will never walk contented. Old grey haired men and women, who have been the property of negro who dared to display this horrible insignia. Troops are stationed all over the State. Only yesterday a negro was hung down in the cane brakes. Some of the ringleaders, Tronps are stationed all over the State. Only yesterday a negro was hung down in the cane brakes. Some of the ringleaders, it is said, have been executed. Many of the negroes are leaving the city for the country. But in sleek young persons who have "spoiled" their mistress, and are ripe for any deviltry. It is getting high time to stop these attempts at insurrection and disembowelment after the fashion of Santo Domingo. Some negroes have been shot in the streets, and forked tail, and had given us some notion of his grimaces and manœuvres. We both also that the doctor had given us some account of the nature of his ailment. We both also that his pious cousin had informed us whether he was dying or not, as the devil made his appearance to him. We both also that he had given us the delicate conditions of body and mind, and snakes in the air, fat snakes in their boots, and strapped snakes with their noses on fire, perhaps the devil appeared to the colored people in the form of a negro, and to us in the form of a serpent. If we can get proper testimony on this point, we will further consider the case.—N. Y. Sun.

A Frog in Good Quarters.

At Worship street, London, a bright looking little boy, whose head only showed above the top of the witness-box, was summoned for wilfully destroying a quart of milk, value 4d., by putting a live frog into it. The complainant was Emma Hamerton, of Hoxton, and the defendant was Thomas Hamerton, and her evidence went to show that on the 31 inst., while she left her shop for a moment, the boy and some other young urchins went in and put the frog into the milk, which was to scan on the counter. The defendant was sent to his father's house in Hoxton. The latter said he was a "professional," and having, in consequence, no regular employment, was always active, depending to that fact. Tea can, she said, was open when left, and the boys, seeing the frog in the can, put it in the milk. Some about the shop, got on the counter, and looked about the shop, and finally discovered the can and let into the milk. Mr. Hamerton, who was present, said he had no idea his son had put the frog into the milk. He had been a teacher of languages in Scotland.

Liberty and Religion.

Every day we hear a bloated gush of words crying out for liberty. There is no word used oftener and less understood than the word liberty. We say America is the land of liberty, but do we mean by that that Americans can do as they please? No one can say this. What, then, is the meaning of liberty? We say, and without fear, that the Catholic Church produces and teaches the true idea of real liberty. This will seem strange to our non-Catholic brethren; but we will prove our assertion and afterwards show the Protestant idea of liberty. The Catholic Church holds that true liberty must be subject, and to true religion; and her reason is because, as true religion is the province of God, directing the actions of men, therefore to be antagonistic to it is to be in disharmony, to be, as it were, in a state of insanity, and whatever tends to the promotion of insanity is against that which belongs to God.

The Catholic Church binds me to obey the commandments of God, no matter how galling to liberty. The authority of the law and the civil power she also compels us to obey, notwithstanding that they often contradict the laws of God. Her principles also holds that all power is from God, and therefore is subjection to the profoundest of the heavenly mysteries, no matter how powerless to compreneend them we are. She binds us under pain of the most intuitive laws of morality, though corrupt nature would fain resist. And thus she has become a fortress around which all the truths which are fixed as a certainty on God's holy law is established, and where she tolerates even the shadow of a mis-ruled liberty to infringe pertaining to faith and morals. Outside of this she gives the widest possible scope of liberty to her children. Her doctors and her sciences study every thing, they dispute on everything, they revel in everything, they are like plastic to the firmament, hovering in their vast orbits to the midst of luminosity, but always drawn to the center by the mysterious attraction of unity and faith and morality—their center which allows no aberration and restrains only those planets which, from causes into them some light, while it gives to their motion a more majestic regularity.

Now, with regard to the Protestant idea of liberty, we do not accuse Protestants of the false idea of the freedom of conscience. Protestantism, for they are wiser than their fathers intended them to be, and far better than they should be taken them. It is a fundamental principle of Protestantism is to give to every individual the freedom of reason to think as he pleases about the most sublime and profound truths of God's law, and from this has resulted an immense variety of sects, the thought and opinions. "The Lord pardoned me," said Luther, in his book De Libertate Christiana, "the subject to no one," therefore he gave full liberty to defy all authority in matters of religion, and from this principle arose the different sects.

What the Devil Did.

The devil has lately presented himself to a colored man who lives not far from the White House, in Washington. This colored man had been a godless wretch before he saw the devil. He went so far, a short short time ago, as to indulge in blasphemy, and even cursed the Almighty in language described as most horrible. Soon afterward he was seized with illness, took to his bed, sicked like a man who was scared out of his wits, and told his pious colored cousin that the devil was in front of him, looking at him. He was naturally in a state of indescribable terror, uttered frenzied cries, asked like a deceased man, and when imploring the pious colored cousin to drive the devil away, sank into a semi-conscious state, in which he remained for about fourteen hours. On recovering his senses he prayed to the Almighty whom he had formerly blasphemed; the devil disappeared, and at last advices the reformed man was doing as well as could be expected. The truth of this narrative is sustained, not only by his pious colored cousin, but also by some in John Thompson, but by two Washington reporters, William C. Chase and Horace L. Smith, (whose names, we suppose), who visited the devil haunted victim, and have published an account of the case. Many will be inclined to regard the whole affair as well authenticated, and will see in it nothing but what the devil is still regarded by his old business of looking for souls, and disguising himself in the shape of the darkest color or their proximity to the White House. We must wish, however, that the devil had been a little more personal description of his devil, but he did not appear to be specially at home in the cane brakes of Dahlia, and forked tail, and had given us some notion of his grimaces and manœuvres. We both also that the doctor had given us some account of the nature of his ailment. We both also that his pious cousin had informed us whether he was dying or not, as the devil made his appearance to him. Irish Students in Rome.

The annual distribution of premiums and conferring of degrees took place at the Propaganda in Rome the other day, in presence of his Eminence Cardinal Franchi. As usual, many of the chief prizes were obtained by Irishmen. Among the five doctors of philosophy created were James Mullan and John Reading, both Irishmen; and Bartholomew Sullivan, of Springfield, Mass. The first prize in theology in the department of Sacred Scripture was obtained by Dionysius O'Connell, the second being drawn for by his uncle, Charles Macarthy, student at Propaganda, and Peter Campion, student at the Irish College. The first prize in law was MacCarthy.

In dogmatic theology Charles MacCarthy took the first prize, and the second fell to Dionysius O'Connell; Thomas Lane, Patrick Ward and J. Robinson, Irishmen, and C. Grannan, of New York, all students of the Propaganda, obtained honorable mention. Charles MacCarthy took the first prize also in moral theology, and he is followed by Robert Barry, Irishman and students of Propaganda, to whom Dr. Neligan, of North Carolina, and William O'Callaghan and Stephen Mullally, from the Irish College.

Dr. McNutt took the first prize Et Antiquities locorum Theologicum.

In philosophy Mr. Louis Lukow, a Belgian, obtained by lot the first and second prize respectively in moral theology, Thomas Lane, student being obtained Mullally, Jas. Grace and Edward Mackey, all of the Irish College.

The first prize in ecclesiastical history was gained by Charles McCarthy, and the second by Dionysius O'Connell and Denys Welsh, an Irish student of Propaganda, Dionysius O'Connell and James Mullally being equal to him in merit.

In canon law the second prize was won by Thos. Cummins, an Englishman and student of Propaganda.

James Murphy obtained the first prize in pastoral theology.

In the faculty of philosophy Michael O'Daniel, of the Irish College, took the first prize in ethics, and the second was gained by John MacIlhiney. Second O'Donnell obtained the first prize in physics, conclusively.

In logics and metaphysics Wm. Murphy and Thomas Tobin were equal in merit, and the first prize fell by lot to Thomas Tobin, who is second to W. Murphy.

In mathematics Hussel Connolly obtained the first prize.

In Hebrew Hugh McDevitt took the first prize, and Daniel Sheerin obtained by lot the second.

In Greek William Burke, of the Irish College, competed by lot with Thomas Lane, and obtained the first prize.

Mgr. Kirby, Rector of the Irish College, and Mgr. Kirby, Rector of the North American College, may well be content with the distinguished success of their students.

"Holy Orders and Matrimony" in the England States Church.

The following dalicious story about the way the State Church provides for its dealings will create some amusement in quarters which have not yet been visited by this piece of London gossip. Verily, it is a refreshing addition to public information to find that among the qualifications for the "priesthood" in the great Tory institution of the establishment must be included a knowledge of how to tie a neck tie in a manner agreeable daughters. St. Paul was evidently not of opinion that a man should be given to pretty arching conspicuous attention to his personal appearance, or a scandal in the Primitive Church. OFFICIOUS MEDDLING.

The newspapers are saying a good deal just now about Spanish interference. The theme is an old one, and has been hurried upon us inconsiderately, as we suppose, by the want of something new to say about. But, assuredly for their readers, the papers which pretend to be organs of public opinion and to instruct the world, never like of any subject which can be treated so as to be offensive to the feelings of Roman Catholics. Even modest like which have been denounced and cast away long ago, are periodically garnished and brought into general notice, as if they were new discoveries never heard of before. Spain and the Spaniards have furnished an unlimited number of opportunities for the foes of the Catholic Church for manifesting their prejudice and dislike, and appearances go to prove that the supply will not be diminished in the future if vocation journalism can help it. Some of the present theories upon Spain, as near as it can be made out, is the enforcement by municipal authorities in various parts of the country of the regulations which forbid exterior manifestations of any religious worship except the Catholic. We are not going now to discuss either the wisdom or the prudence of these regulations. But we may observe that the number of Protestants in Spain is indeed small, and of that number only a miserable percentage are of Spanish birth. We may also observe that the Protestants of Spain, the churches, schools, etc., such as they are, are simply proselyting agencies for entrapping the children of the poor and friendless, and as they may be obtained in this way, they become the converts of a contract just as little favorable to religion as it can be without exciting the hostility of the population—will be carried out in spite of all the protestations made by the proselytising "evangelizers."

THE PRINCIPLE OF MONARCHY.

While we are not revolutionists, and while we decry all attempts to overthrow the established order of affairs in any country or teaching to left as an injustice, or even as an insolvision, by any considerable proportion of the population. Yet a tremendous outcry has been raised about them, especially in England, and all the powers in Europe have been involved, one after the other, to step in and by main force put an end to this "persecution," as they are pleased to style it. Not long ago Lord DERBY received a deputation in London, who addressed him on the subject and besought his interference; and he graciously answered them by declaring that he had written to the British Minister at Madrid, telling him to urge the Spanish Government to cease this "persecution." The noble Lord, with that nobility which always characterizes the true English Tory, and which has, indeed, been a special characteristic of his own family, did not perceive that he was making a fool of himself. He ought to have remembered that the Spaniards are the best judges of how to manage their own domestic affairs, and, as a brave and high-spirited people, they were not likely to brook officious meddling from any power, and particularly from England, for whom they have but small cause for love. Moreover and even this there was a strange forthwithstone, or a wonderful effrontery in his reply. Lord DERBY is not a very old man, yet he can remember when in Catholic Ireland it was a crime to ring the bell of a Catholic church, and when a Catholic priest dare not officiate at the burial of one of his parishioners who was to be interred in the Protestant part of his in the enclosed Catholic cemetery. Other disabilities equally annoying and equally vindictive oppressed, in the interests of the noble Lord, and within the memory of most of the present generation who have past middle age, not a nation, not a profession, but the vast and overwhelming majority of the Irish people. And when would the Lord DERBY's feelings of Spain had offended England, and demanded that she should cease her persecution of unoffending Catholics, and permit them to enjoy the religious worship in accordance with their consciences? Certainly not. Certainly Spain would have a hundred fold more justification in that case than England can plead now. Yet we venture to assert that England's only answer would be an insolent one, and leave other people to look after their own business, and leave other people to look after theirs. Such, too, we are minded, will be the retort of the Madrid Government if the British Minister is foolish enough to present Lord DERBY's pharisaical remonstrance. The chamberlain regulations—which, by the way, were put framed by friends of the Catholic Church, nor for its protection, but for the maintenance of the present régime in Spain is

THE DECADENCE OF ENGLAND.

There can scarcely be any doubt now, at least in the minds of all well-informed people, that the strength and influence of England are decidedly on the wane. Indeed, it is evident to the most unobservant that her best days as a great political power have passed, and that she is no longer feared or respected as she used to be. Formerly, and not so very long ago, either, her voice was considered to be the most potent in Europe, and hardly a move could be made on the diplomatic chess board without her expressed or implied consent. Now, however, the most sweeping changes are made, and the map of the whole continent is remodelled, yet she is not so much as consulted, and her ideas upon the matter are not taken into account. She may remonstrate or she may threaten, just as Russia did when Austria and France took possession of Bosnia and Herzegovina, but the very nations that used formerly to listen eagerly for her word and receive her commands with submission, simply scoff at her and reproach her with weakness and cowardice. They tell her, in effect, that they own no message their affairs without any of her interference, that she is no longer a European, but an Eastern power, and that the progress of events has deprived her of the ability to harm any one, and that her only influence is that of a power which exists upon sufferance. For three years ago, when she entered upon the costly and ill-advised Crimean war, she forced on her certain pacts, although she still maintains her supremacy upon the ocean, she was utterly insignificant as a military power. If the French had not taken part in the fight the Russians, the Turks could not have withstood the onslaught of the Czar's hosts, and would have simply been driven into the sea. Since then the means for large armies has been gone on increasing rather than diminishing, so that a power which cannot put at least five hundred thousand men in the field is thought little or nothing about. England, when has no conscription, and which most therefore depend upon voluntary enlistment to fill up her ranks, is totally unable to enter into competition in this direction, and must be contented to see her self driven every year more hopelessly into the background. At the outside, she can now put a hundred thousand men upon a continental battle ground, and they would be no more than a mouthful for a corps d'armée on one of the great battle fields of Europe, or than a mere handful to Austria or Prussia. Hence the Times' frantic appeal to Prince BISMARCK to use his influence with the Sultan to prevent the dismemberment of the integrity of Turkey. Turkey is England's outpost for a large amount, and it evidently can never be paid if that country is broken out of existence. At the same time the destruction of Turkey opens the road to India, and the Russian armies can march to the fertile plains of Hindostan to try conclusions with the English troops.

CONFIRMATIONS.—His Grace the Archbishop is touring the city for a visitation and confirmation tour through the most populous districts of the State. THE COMING ELECTION.

It is well all honest Americans should know that the Radicals are playing a desperate game for the retention of power and will stop at nothing to accomplish their ends. If not by fair means, then by foul if possible, they will endeavor to elect their Presidential candidate and keep the country rushing on to the ruin and bankruptcy which must be the only conceivable results of their disastrous and dishonest policy. If they can deceive the people by raising false issues, by keeping alive old sectional animosities, by making inflammatory appeals to bigotry and passion, they will rest satisfied with those devices; but if they find they cannot thus dupe and hoodwink a sufficient number of citizens to insure the success of their ticket, they will be prepared to use violence and even to excite another civil war. Naturally the party in favor of extreme measures upon all occasions, and for whom the Constitution of the Republic has no sacredness, for whom the laws of morality have no binding force, they only look at one thing—their own advantage—and they regard as justifiable any means which they think calculated to gain it. They have a two-fold object in view—to procure another term of four years wherein to continue their plundering operations and to prevent the detection and exposure of their past delinquencies.

The Rational leaders are very well aware—know with absolute certainty, in fact—that if a Democratic administration gets into power there will be a sharp scrutiny made into their management, and public affairs during the last twelve years, and that revelations will be published to the world which must shock and astound every reputable and moral citizen. The frauds, the corruptions, the deeds and hatred of the Republican party, and its name would hardly ever again be heard in this country. The interests at stake, self preservation on the one side, and further pecuniary aggrandizement on the other, are too important, therefore, too vast, to be surrendered without a terrific struggle. It is plain and visible as the sun at noonday that the Republicans are preparing to, in the last emergency, override the will of the people by force and fraud, and maintain their ascendancy at all and every cost, even though civil war, mob law, and bloodshed and deliberate fashion, it must be admitted. While they are working very hard to secure the election of HAYES and WHEELER, they are preparing secondly in the one and of the country to the other, and endeavoring to create dissensions among the Democratic masses, they are not losing sight of what they have to do should they succeed and thus they happen to be successful. In those States which are least able to defend themselves from Federal coercion and dragooning they are preparing a course of action which will be at once high-handed, and so get up a pretext for rejecting a sufficient number of electoral votes to count in their favor. If they can scheme or bully enough to effect this they are unable to do that, they depend upon the Congress to do the work for them by refusing to count the electoral vote of certain States, which, in spite of all pressions, must have gone Democratic.

Senator HAMLIN, with a candor scarcely to be expected from him, distinctly fore shadowed this desperate, dangerous and unscrupulous policy in a recent interview with a representative of the press in this city. We have, therefore, been writing no imaginary alarm, raising no false alarm, but simply stating important facts which should be known to everybody, as they bear closely upon the future welfare, prosperity and happiness of our Republic.

However, in the present, lasting about forty years, which followed the battle of Waterloo, France, Prussia, Austria, Russia, Italy and other countries made rapid progress in the development of the people. Their populations, in one and all, increased by the passage of military glory, became economical and comparatively well off. In short, wealth was more equally distributed, and England no longer enjoyed a monopoly of it. Twenty five years ago, when she entered upon the costly and ill-advised Crimean war, she found on her certain pacts, although she still maintains her supremacy upon the ocean, she was utterly insignificant as a military power. If the French had not taken part in the fight the English and Turks could not have withstood the onslaught of the Czar's hosts, and would have simply been driven into the sea. Since then the means for large armies has been gone on increasing rather than diminishing, so that a power which cannot put at least five hundred thousand men in the field is thought little or nothing about. England, when has no conscription, and which most therefore depend upon voluntary enlistment to fill up her ranks, is totally unable to enter into competition in this direction, and must be contented to see herself driven every year more hopelessly into the background. At the outside, she can now put a hundred thousand men upon a continental battle ground, and they would be no more than a mouthful for a corps d'armée on one of the great battle fields of Europe, or than a mere handful to Austria or Prussia. Hence the Times' frantic appeal to Prince BISMARCK to use his influence with the Sultan to prevent the dismemberment of the integrity of Turkey. Turkey is England's outpost for a large amount, and it evidently can never be paid if that country is broken out of existence. At the same time the destruction of Turkey opens the road to India, and the Russian armies can march to the fertile plains of Hindostan to try conclusions with the English troops.

THE ANNUAL FAIR FOR THE ORPHANS.

The annual fair for the benefit of the Catholic Female Orphan and Foundling Asylums will open at Platt's Hall on the 8th of next month. In consideration of the great wants supplied by these institutions, the extent of which will probably never be realized by outsiders, great efforts should be made that the Orphans' Fair should be a complete success. It is hoped that the ladies who have kindly given their services to solicit subscriptions, will meet with kind and liberal patrons, who will cordially and generously enter into the spirit of the enterprise. The following facts will give some idea of the necessity of co-operating liberally in the good work. At the close of last year there were depending on the resources of the main asylum two hundred and thirty children, only thirty-two of whom were paid for by a trifling sum. In the branch, or Foundling Asylum, there were at the close of last year one hundred and fifty children, and one hundred and fifty were admitted during the year—making a total of over six hundred who enjoyed the benefits of a home in these institutions.

It can hardly be supposed that the regular income would be sufficient to defray the current expenses of such a large number of children; and when we reflect that the annual support is realized from the annual fairs in no more than $7,000 or $8,000, it is evident that the finances must be considerably deficient at the close of the year. Moreover, the Infant Asylum has been severely afflicted by sickness for the past few months, causing heavy additional expense for building, renovating, etc., which leaves that institution in a State of great embarrassment. Those who plead for themselves and fully prove that aid is solicited for a good and needy cause. We sincerely hope that it will not be in vain.

The following resolutions were passed:—That while we welcome the small measure of justice contained in the Land bill, we regard it as a purely measure, and that in addition to these some £16 000 has been borrowed from the National Bank. It was determined that although the corporation were bound to establish a working fund of £10 000, payment of the original loan of £10 000, nor a shilling of the savings of the concern has been applied to the purpose; 21, and most astonishing of all, that the accounts are not submitted to the auditor, the works being left under the sole management and control of Mr. Spillane. On Saturday last the unfortunate woman suffered the last misfortune having been made to the unfortunate beast, he caused it to be confined in a stable, and the day the old woman was attacked was the first day he was allowed to be at large for months. Catholicity in Scotland.

Fort Augustus is an unused fortification, built some century and a half ago, away in the Scottish Highland, and destined to be one of the defenses of the Caledonian rails to the Spanish Armada. It appeared in evidence that the prisoner resided with her grandfather on their farm, near Tramore, and that on Thursday week she broke open the money box and afterwards eloped with a laboring man, residing on an adjoining farm. THE RUN AT THE ALTAR.

She kneels in silence at the altar lonely;
With clasped hands and upturned face she seems fair!
Her lips are motionless—for there is only
Utterance in the deep content of prayer!

There is no passion in that heart's pulsation—
That quiet inspiration with questioning lets;
The white is earth with breathless adoration
Of her dear Lord throned in the skies above.

Wrath and a cold dud touched her with sweet sadness—
Grief—
The light of Heaven bent to open her heart—
She felt that—Christ! just bring pain and meekness,
And longed to give to us lonely, apart.

Pushion, and wealth, and the world's trashful glitter
Were to her valuer than the valuest dreams!
The very tone of its cited love seemed bitter!
In those she saw not it never's celestial gleam.

She gave her soul to God in its completeness!
She knew not Him in man, for Him in love!
Asked for no food but His Sermont sweetness!
And wept that she had nothing more to give.

And now her living breath is such devotion,
While wings of angels for the holy fill;
And spirits, with one intent and one emotion,
Are hidden as close to a shower of prayer.

O Christ! kneeling the angels whispered,
Of thy pure soul let God's sunbeam shine!
Thy Lord shall meet around thee all His brightness,
Shall bind thee with a celestial zone!

And with the regal garment of election
Shall robe thee, and crown thy angel throng
Shall place thy seat, O bride of His selection!
Where thou shalt sing for ayo the happy song!

— On Sunday, September 27, after vespers, the Right Rev. Bishop of Pittsburg blessed the new Cathedral Monastery in that city. The building is a brick one, 90 feet deep by 35 feet front, and is three stories high. It has been erected at a cost of $18,000.

— The new Catholic church at Concord, Contra Costa county, is approaching completion, and is now receiving its second coat of paint and putty. — Sister Mary, of the Seven Dolors, died on the 9th inst. at St. Joseph's Hospital, Victoria, B. C., after a protracted illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude, and was buried on the 7th, her remains being followed to the grave by the sorrowing members of the community, the subscribers attending the sisters' schools, and a large concourse of the reverend clergy and laity of Victoria.

Negro Reflection.

CHARLESTON (S. C.), October 16.—A joint caucus of Charleston county, by Democrats and Republicans, which has been in progress some days, resulted in a serious collision at Cainhoy, about nine miles from here. It had been agreed that both white and blacks should attend the meeting unarmed. During the speaking, an altercation arose between two individuals of opposite parties. A shot having been fired by one of them, negroes belonging to the State militia, and composing a large majority of the meeting, scented their master, which were secured near by, and a volley was fired into the crowd of whites from the bushes skirting the neighboring ravines. The whites being for the most part unarmed, and altogether unprepared for a fight, retreated to the steamer which had brought them from the city, but not before two of their number had been killed and fourteen wounded. The dead were left in possession of the negroes.

— The negroes, after driving the whites off the city, awaited the arrival of the Democratic bodies and to afford protection to the whites of that vicinity, who are in dread of being attacked or butchered.

LATER.

CHARLESTON (S. C.), October 17.—Extensive preparations were made during the day by the Cainhoy affair. The bodies of three white men who were killed outright and left upon the ground were removed to-day. They had been stripped of their clothing, and also beaten and mutilated in a shocking manner. One of the wounded whites died this evening, and it is feared that several others will die. One dead negro was found at the scene of attack. He is supposed to have been killed by the first volley fired from the black militia from the bushes. It is not thought that any other negroes were either killed or wounded. An armed force of whites is guarding white families in the village, and the blacks have disappeared from the neighborhood.

And here's the way our beautiful Administration rewards the murderers. Had the case been reversed, and whites had assaulted the blacks, there would be a howl from every Radical sheet in the country for vengeance on the Ku Klux. Instead of that Great trade down troops to protect and encourage their ruffianly designs!

WASHINGTON, October 17.—The following was issued this evening in pursuance of action taken at the Cabinet meeting for the carrying of South Carolina for Hayes and Wheeler:

General William T. Sherman: Sir—In view of the existing condition of affairs in South Carolina, there is a possibility that the proclamation of the President of this date may be necessary. To provide against such a contingency, you will immediately order all the available force in the military Division of the Atlantic to report to General Ruger, commanding at Columbia, South Carolina, and instruct that officer to station his troops in such a position that they may be most speedily and effectually used in case of resistance to the authority of the United States. It is hoped that collision may not be invoked; but you will instruct General Ruger to act if he knows that it is the fixed purpose of the Government to carry out the spirit of the proclamation and to sustain it by the military forces of the general Government, unprincipled, if necessary, by the military of the United States. Very respectfully,

D. C. CAMERON, Secretary of War.

WHAT SOME DEMOCRATS THINK OF DOING IN THE PREMISES.

CHICAGO, October 17.—The Times' Washington special says:

There was an informal meeting of leading Democrats at the Ebbitt House this evening to discuss what policy shall be best to adopt to meet the revolutionary move of Grant, inspired by Conkling. Gen. Jerry Black was the principal spokesman. A plan was broached and approved, which will be perfected to-morrow, to telegraph Wade Hampton and his followers to peacefully withdraw from the canvass, and leave the Republican ticket without any opposition in those two States. Democrats will not allow the vote of South Carolina to be counted next February, upon the ground of illegality.

Army officers here, familiar with Hampton's force, say that at the expiration of the three days mentioned in the proclamation, General Ruger will have 16,000 men at his disposal, and if this is not enough, more will be furnished, even if volunteers are required.

The Outrage at Manchester.

[From the Dublin Nation, September 30.]

It is with pain and shame that I have read in the Dublin Mail an account of the audacious interruption of the meeting assembled to hear Mr. O'Connor Power's lectures on "Irish Wit and Humor." Too aided result of two outrage in Queen's county is enough to condemn the chances of war. One word now about the parliamentary policy of the Home Rule League.

Copious arrives praised that it is worthless because it has not won Home Rule in three years and a half. I would remind them that Catholic Emancipation took fifty-one years to acquire from the time when, in 1778, the first parliamentary relaxation of the penal laws was made, to 1829, when the principle of Catholic exclusion was finally broken down by the Emancipation Act. It is folly in the power of the Home Rule representatives to make the Union so extremely inconvenient to Great Britain that foreign governmental policy, as well as the plain dictates of justice, must ultimately end in the restoration of the Irish Parliament; provided, of course, that the electors and the Irish public generally give that movement the continuous support which its vital importance demands.

THE MIDNIGHT MASS FOR PATRICK SARSFIELD.

Over the crests of the Keeper Mountains
Mellowly rose the harvest moon,
And lighted the faces of the laughing valley,
That lay as if sunk in a silent, rose swoon;
Lightly rustled the wood's dark banners
Saintly breathed the gentle gale,
Adding its chorus to the dreamy splendor
Of an autumn night in a harvest vale.

But what are these strange, swift gliding figures—
Of earth or of silence? unseen or seen?
Hurrying out of the woodland shadow,
Hastening into the lumen glen?
They follow no new, mountain pathway!
Whither or wherefore do they pass?
As rest must only their gentle brightness
Till round consent upon her own mass!"

And back there came, like an Alpine lamp-ray,
One wild, sea-reminiscent, Saxon "AMEN!"

WILL OF PETER THE GREAT.

Traditional Policy and Ambition of the Muscovite Empire.

The following, found in the Russian archives after the death of Peter the Great, outlines the all-absorbing ambition of the Czars, and will be read with interest in connection with the reports of the warlike movements now being made by the Russians:

1. The Russian nation must be constantly in a state of footing to keep the soldiers warlike and in good condition.

2. No opportunity must be lost of taking part in the affairs and disputes of Europe, especially in those of Germany.

3. Poland must be divided by keeping up constant jealousies and confusion there. The subjection must be continued by arms, money, and the assemblies corrupted so as to influence the election of the kings. We must get up a party in the senate, and by means of our ambassadors and money bring the Russian troops into the country and let them sojourn there so long that they may eventually find stable grounds of retreating there forever. Should the neighboring States make disturbance we must endeavor to keep the moment by allowing them a share of the territory until we can safely remove what we have then got away.

4. We must take away as much territory as possible from Sweden, and endeavor by every means to get peace, so as to give us a pretext for their subjugation.

5. The economy of the Russian princes must always be chosen from among the German princesses, in order to multiply our family alliances with the Germans and to unite our interests with theirs.

6. We must keep steadily standing our ground on the shores of the Baltic, and southward along the shores of the Black Sea.

7. We must progress as much as possible in the direction of Constantinople and India. He who can once get possession of those points is the real ruler of the world. With this view we must provoke occasional quarrel, at one time with Turkey and at another with Persia.

8. Moreover, we must take pains to establish and maintain an intimate union with Austria, apparently condescending to her schemes for the aggrandizement in Germany, and all the while secretly rousing the jealousy of the minor States against her.

9. We must make the house of Austria interested in the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, and we must neutralize its jealousy of the capture of Constantinople either by pre-occupying it with a war against the old European balance or by allowing it a share of the spoil, which we can afterward resume at our leisure.

10. We must collect around our house, as around a center, all the detached sections of Greeks which are scattered abroad in Hungary, Turkey and South Poland. We must make them look to us for support, and thus, by establishing beforehand a sort of ecclesiastical supremacy, we shall pave the way for universal sovereignty.

11. When Sweden is cure, Persia vanquished, Poland subjugated, Turkey conquered—when our armies are united and the Euxine and Baltic in the possession of our ships, then we can make separate and secret overtures, first to the Court of Versailles and then to that of Vienna, to share with them the dominion of the world.

12. Should the improbable case happen of both rejecting the propositions of Russia, then our policy will be to set one against the other and make them tear each other to pieces. Russia must then watch for and seize the favorable moment and pour her already assembled hosts into Germany, while two immense fleets, laden with Asiatic hordes, and conveyed by the armed squadrons of the Euxine and the Baltic, set sail simultaneously from the sea of Azoff and the harbor of Archangel, sweeping along the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, they will overrun France on the one side, while Germany is overpowered on the other. When these countries are thus fully conquered the rest of Europe must fall easily, and without a struggle, under our yoke. Thus Europe can and must be subjugated.

Incipient War.

It has come at last—and just as we predicted weeks ago. We then said, referring to the military orders of the Administration at Washington, that the action of the War Department in pouring troops into the South was but the forerunner of the declaration of martial law in certain Southern States on the eve of the Presidential election. And now, Governor Chamberlain of South Carolina, in the first to take the initiative step in this direction. He has just issued a proclamation commanding all the white companies and clubs of that State to surrender their arms and disband within three days, and he tells the people that in case of refusal to do this, he will next proclaim the State in a condition of domestic violence, inform President Grant to that effect, and call upon him to suppress it with the forces of the United States already quartered within the limits of South Carolina.

The ignominious act of the scalawag Governor of South Carolina is but the prelude to bloody massacre. He knows that the white people will not bend this humiliation, because by solemn constitutional guarantee they have the right to have arms in their own defense. The Constitution of the United States declares that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." Chamberlain, therefore, has no more authority to disarm the people peaceably bearing arms, and threatening no violence, to lay them down, than had the men in the moon, and we are satisfied that the white companies and clubs of South Carolina will not, as they ought not, do it save at the point of the bayonet. It is bank, who is, unfortunately, invested with the executive authority of the State.

It will be observed that this tyrannical Governor does not command the colored companies and clubs to surrender their arms, although it is well known they are all armed with weapons furnished by the State. If he sincerely desired to preserve the peace he would have done this, and made no discrimination in favor of the negroes and against the whites. But his purpose is not the maintenance of peace; on the contrary, to procure a pretext for bloodshed and strife, these overthrow is now threatened by the peaceful operation of the ballot, by the invincible Democratic spirit of 1876, he may seize upon it as the pretext for invoking the bloody spirit of war. Verily, Chamberlain is playing a bold and desperate game to keep in power, if possible, the scarring party of which he is the shining light. We shall look for the denouement with great anxiety, and not without some apprehensions for the continued peace and firmness of the Southern States. There are grave responsibilities and dangers in the people of South Carolina at this hour, and we trust they will be calm, but firm, patient, but heroic, and manifest a fortitude and courage equal to the emergence of the occasion. Not only the people of that one section, but liberty-loving and patriotic people in every section of the country will sympathize with and sustain them in their peaceful but determined resistance to the aggressive spirit of tyranny.—Louisville Catholic Advocate.

Childish Gambling.

Travelers bring back such strange news from the Continent that I hardly dare to stand as applied to the interpret in its sober work in his back counting-house, he listens. It seems that ever since the abolition of the public gaming tables of Baden and Homburg France has been in the habit of indulging some new method of excitement for the crowds of idlers who, no longer lured by the charms of rouge et noir to temptation, congregated at Trouville, Dieppe and Etretat. The latest craze was found at last—a harmless, childish, innocent game enough in all appearance, requiring no skill, no thought, no learning, and yet possessing all the fascination of excitement and gambling for hundreds of francs. The humble game is called Les Petits Chevaux. The console of a table filled with tin horses with some smooth groove all round the edge as in the child's game of "steam billiards." The balls, which are placed in the grooves, are replaced in this new game by little horses of different colors. The banker is thrown by the players, a fine buck with a heavy spring, away fly the little horses, and the one which halts first has the best of it, or red hole, as may have been agreed upon, is proclaimed the winner. Will it be believed that the most charming women, the best dressed, the most fashionable ladies of London and Paris are at the present moment passing whole days and nights as well in the pursuit of this senseless game? Crowds are betting their hundreds in the groove. One well-known London lady is at this moment prevented from leaving Trouville for want of money to acquit the debts of honor she has contracted at the Petits Chevaux. Her jewels have disappeared, her wardrobe has been sacrificed, her dresses have been disposed of one by one, until she actually shudders at her shadow in the mirror as she walks along from her lodging to the place where the Petits Chevaux are to roll every night and day. What is worse than all is the eager excitement of the English girls—to whom it is a pity to see the lovely countenance all aflame, the eyes flashing and the gracious longing as they weigh the rapid flight of the little horses retiring along the groove. The men seldom join in the game; they content themselves with exciting the ladies to bet, and enjoy the fun of their every gay discomfiture exemplarily. It is what do the scenes which take place round the tables where the Petits Chevaux are following their mad race differ from those which are behind round the wigwam of the Red Indian, where the squaws, seated on the ground, squabble and fight at their game of "red beans" while the braves stand round and urge them on to the fray; and the air resounds with the ferocious laughter which the eight provokes. Of course the scandalous stories which reach us all tend to prove the truth of Prince Talleyrand's saying, when asked to suppress the law for the abolition of the gaming-house in Paris: "With all your lawyers and your enthusiasm of virtue you can only displace it, but can never destroy it altogether."

Dr. Mulcahy in Dublin.

A large assemblage of our citizens welcomed Dr. Mulcahy back to his native land on Monday evening, and gave him the heartiest and most enthusiastic of greetings. He has suffered for his devotion to Ireland, and has consequently won the warm esteem and affection of his countrymen all over the world. It was only to be expected, then, that he should be received with words of welcome, and with open arms—and he was almost literally so received, for, his lenoore over, he was surrounded by a host of admirers, the most stalwart of whom seized him in their arms and elevated him on their shoulders, and so carried him, escorted by an immense crowd, through the streets to his hotel.

Dr. Mulcahy has frankly and courageously avowed that his principles remain unchanged; that his long years of imprisonment and exile have not in the least weakened his allegiance to his country's cause. British law condemned him to a felon's fate as an irreconcilable enemy to British misrule in Ireland, and the same irreconcilable enemy he still remains. That being so, it follows, as a matter of course, that he is an enemy to Home Rule, for the Home Rulers are no irreconcilable enemies of England. He declares complete and absolute self-government for his country; they only allow as large a measure as would not imperil the preservation of the "integrity of the British Empire." He declares that any compromise of Ireland's rights is an act of rank treason to Ireland's cause, and counsels that the Federal scheme proposed by the Home Rulers is of that character. They, on the other hand, boast that their plan will eventually lead to the full realization of the wishes of Dr. Mulcahy and of those who think with him.

The perfect and complete legislative independence of our country is the goal which all should struggle to reach. The path on which Dr. Mulcahy and his friends wish to lead the people lies broad and straight to that most desirable destination, but it is beset with obstacles and bristles with dangers, which, however, they assert can be overcome by courage and resolution. The way of the Home Rulers is by more pleasant to traverse, but it is so dark and circuitous that those who tread it risk losing their way and growing weary ere the wished-for goal is even in sight. But they are sure of heart and confident that though the way be long and tedious, their patience will outlast its greatest length. Dr. Mulcahy's contention is that the path of the Home Rulers can lead them only far away from their destination into a region of despond, in which they will be more than ever at the mercy of their enemies. They, however, insist that his highway to freedom is simply impassable.

Next, we think, are the differences between extreme Nationalists and Home Rulers are serious, but they are not irreconcilable. The country is beset on the one hand by a powerful and tyrannical Government, and on the other by a people so demoralized by which it is to be won must necessarily create differences of opinion. But these differences will no longer divide Ireland's people, and a plan be devised which will firmly unite the Irish people and enable them to present an unbroken front to the enemies of their country—meanwhile, there is one path, and one path only, in certain ways, do inconceivable good. Whether that plan shall be that of which Dr. Mulcahy is the apostle and advocate, and which has already attained a large measure of success," or whether it be that, in the sentence of which—although it has not yet achieved any—Mr. Butt has such abiding faith, we cannot say. That it is not for us to say is sufficient for the present is the cheering fact that our people are more than ever resolved to win their rights, and that their cause advances, with giant stride, "all along the line."

* We cannot see where it has obtained "a large" or "increased" measure of success, and to this respect Protestants has nothing to boast of over Home Rule. Both have failed so far, from the want of a certain unity for most practicable.—[Ed. Monitor.]

Anti-Christian Fraternization.

We rejoice to find, says the New York Tablet, that there is one subject on which we can completely agree with the Religious Telescope, one platform on which we can cordially cooperate with it. The following letter on the subject we transfer from its columns. Mr. Floyd scarcely gives the Masonic body their deserts. The rank and file, the members of the subordinate lodges, but the society itself, as revealed to the initiates of the thirty-third degree, is atheistical, as will find by referring to a valuable work on Freemasonry, recently published, entitled "Secret Warfare of Freemasonry."

Secret societies are anti-Christian because the conditions of fraternization are such as to place Christianity on a level with paganism, Mussumindaism, Buddhism and every other "ism" except deism; which is necessarily raised above Christianity, for it is the only common faith on which the whole fraternity can unite.

As a qualification for membership the candidate must believe in the existence of a Supreme Being; otherwise there would be no sense of responsibility, there being none greater than himself by whom to swear. Any oath, therefore, that might be administered to him in the name of the Supreme Being would of necessity be null and void, and as the oath is the key that unlocks the door of the "mystic sanctuary" of the Lodge, it would be useless to the proper moulds. One of the initial conditions of membership is that the candidate shall "submit to the conscience and judgment of the individuals to others. Upon this point Brosh, in his "Old Landmarks, Manual" (p. 239), says: the obligation of the candidate thus: "(I) admitted, I promise obedience to the regulations to be assented to by the candidate in an adjoining apartment previous to his initiation; (2) I will not make a secret upon my honor, before these gentlemen, that I have not been contrary to the wishes of the client established usages and customs of the fraternity." To which the candidate is required to say, "I do."

I submit the question to the candid reader whether he can, with a conscience that does not surrender his own conscience and judgment to others, and wretched such a surrender is not bringing him into fraternal relations with deists and pagans at too dear a rate? Can an intelligent Christian thus subject himself to the control and control of other men and be guiltless before God and his neighbor?

Not only are the conditions of the fraternization of secret societies in opposition to the teachings of Christ, but their practical social relations are in direct opposition to the maintenance of that holy spirituality that is the very essence of a Christian. How can a Christian "meet on the level and part on the square" with the brother who is a blasphemer, or with one who is an infidel? Can they kneel together at the same altar and receive from the same hand the bread and wine? Can they sing their way and growing weary are the wished-for goal is even in sight. But they are sure of heart and confident that though the way be long and tedious, their patience will outlast its greatest length. Dr. Mulcahy's contention is that the path of the Home Rulers can lead them only far away from their destination into a region of despond, in which they will be more than ever at the mercy of their enemies. They, however, insist that his highway to freedom is simply impassable.

Next, we think, are the differences between extreme Nationalists and Home Rulers are serious, but they are not irreconcilable. The country is beset on the one hand by a powerful and tyrannical Government, and on the other by a people so demoralized by which it is to be won must necessarily create differences of opinion. But these differences will no longer divide Ireland's people, and a plan be devised which will firmly unite the Irish people and enable them to present an unbroken front to the enemies of their country—meanwhile, there is one path, and one path only, in certain ways, do inconceivable good. Whether that plan shall be that of which Dr. Mulcahy is the apostle and advocate, and which has already attained a large measure of success," or whether it be that, in the sentence of which—although it has not yet achieved any—Mr. Butt has such abiding faith, we cannot say. That it is not for us to say is sufficient for the present is the cheering fact that our people are more than ever resolved to win their rights, and that their cause advances, with giant stride, "all along the line."

Anti Catholic Syracuse.

Almost every European nation to day has its prominent anti-Catholic party in Panelli, Giurlio and Trabucco; Germany in Dollinger and Reinkens; France in Michaud. The last, while attached to the Madeleine, in Paris, yet is trying to undermine the faith little by little advanced, until finally he apostatized, and then, as invariably occurs to such persons, he became imbued with such a spirit of hatred of the Pope and the Catholic Church that his whole life was devoted to the destruction of the Church, and that his people should take care to look at the political aspect of the question, and to see that it ought to be remembered, is as Englishmen, proudly accepted. On arriving at the depot she was placed on a bench before the clear of Our Lady, and began to recover from the fright in great confidence. Suddenly an indefinable sensation creeps over her, as of an electric current pervading all her members, and constrained by some invisible power, she falls on her knees. The person who was standing her and who had remained a few paces behind, on seeing her fall was much frightened, and ran with all speed to raise her up. The paralytic asserted her of her cure, and said: "It seems to me that I am cured, and that I am able to rise myself." She accordingly rose, walked without any difficulty, and crossing the hall in a transport of gratitude, knelt before the altar and recited her beads in thanksgiving for so signal a favor.

The fraternization of heathens and Christians of the heathens and the chaste, of semi-infidels and ministers of the Gospel, is in itself a most unnatural union, and in bringing the Gospel of Jesus into disrepute, and of placing a stigma upon the Christian name.

All this is in direct opposition to the plain teachings of Scripture. St. Paul, in his second epistle to the Corinthians, in the following language: "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

Demonstration in Wexford.

Wexford town was, onSunday, September 24, the scene of a demonstration of national feeling, held under the worthy auspices of the Independent Club and Home Rule Association of the county. The assemblage was addressed by both the county members, Sir Charles Bowyer and Chevalier O'Clery, and also by the representatives of the boroughs of Wexford and New Rose, and by Mr. Shea.

Fay, the excellent weather for the occasion, the day-long rain was firmly struck by the chairman, Mr. Pierce R. Rowe, who declared that the county had established its independence, and that "the days of the plank, and as to the Whigs, they had been given the go-by forever."

After a splendid speech in Parliament, urging steady adhesion to the movement for native rule, and laying down the principles of a broad and fair rents as needful for due protection of the Irish tenant farmer, Sir George Bowyer referred to the question of the atrocities in Bulgaria. While executing the crimes committed by the Turks, he said, should the Irish people, much as they must detest those crimes, should not let themselves be carried away by their feelings," but should take care to look at the political aspect of the question. Do not, he said, do so,

SENATOR MORTON'S SPEECH.

On Monday evening, at Union Hall, the Senator of the "Bloody Shirt" invention, he who was the "great war Governor" of Indiana, made one of his characteristic speeches. A multitude gathered to hear him and yet only a comparatively few of the huge number present heard him because his voice could not reach them. But the Chief of Tuesday gave a generally accurate report of it, and that assures all who did not hear the speaker to learn what it was that he said. Accepting that report as fair in statement and expression, we propose to compare and contrast the utterances of the Senator with the facts and the truth of history.

He started out by saying that "when the rebellion was first threatened, and it was evident that we were upon the eve of a great civil war, my (his) chief apprehension was in regard to the Pacific Coast." This must have been, of course, in 1860, and so Damon's next will render all Senator MORTON'S feelings at the time he mentions—although it is a severe arraignment of the Republicans of that day—when we come to consider them as late as February, 1861, the then acknowledged leader of the Republican party in Congress, WILLIAM H. SEWARD, spoke of the withdrawal or secession of the Pacific States as a contingency not only likely to occur, but as one which would involve no wrong on the part of the Pacific States and Territories. How many other Republican leaders and followers held to a similar opinion we are not prepared to say, but inasmuch as the very foremost and most influential of the Republican organs throughout the country at that time—from the New York Tribune down to FRANK FERGUS'S News and the Alta California in this city—all joined in saying that the Southern States had the right to secede if they desired to do so, and even expressed the hope that they would secede, so as to leave a Union free from slavery, it is not too much to assume that the party which held such ideas concerning the secession of the States South could not have decried the States of the Pacific Coast a similar right. But it is notorious that on this coast the most active and outspoken in antagonism to the separation of the Pacific Coast States and Territories from the United States were Democrats, and consequently if Senator MORTON'S remarks on the subject hit or hurt any of his audience, or any others in this State, they are the men and the representatives of their own party who are first to be ushered among the killed and wounded.

But he strikes at nobler game—at the highest in the Republican roll—all of the living or the dead—as ABRAHAM LINCOLN said, in Congress, on January 12, 1848, that,

> Any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up, and shake off the existing government and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable, a most sacred right—a right which lies at the foundation of all our political rights—a right which the people of us inhabiting our territory inherited from our fathers, and which we have always exercised, and which we, hope, our children and our children's children, may exercise in like manner, to the end of time. Any portion of such a people that can may rightfully do this, any portion that can not, must conform to and submit to the existing government. Any other rule would be a dangerous one indeed. Suppose a bare majority, say a majority of any portion of such a people, should choose to throw off the government altogether, or to divide it into two governments, would a majority of the whole have a right to prevent them? Would they have a right to shoot them for doing it? Would they have a right to declare that the majority should govern, and that they should not? Would they have a right to kill the majority, if they refused to govern themselves, unless the majority would govern as they thought they ought to govern? Would they have a right to do anything but to leave them alone, and let them govern themselves? Certainly they would not have any right to do anything else, unless they could show that they were themselves a majority.

To show the inconsistency and audacity of the theory now advanced by Senator MORTON on this particular point, as a Republican leader, it is only necessary to refer back to the platforms and utterances of that party, from its first Presidential Convention in 1852 to its Chicago Convention in 1860, at which LINCOLN was nominated. In each of those platforms the State sovereignty theory is conspicuously set forth and solemnly affirmed. And if further testimony were required to prove that the Republican party, as its origin and sum it of the Government, was the especial and most vehement champion of the State sovereignty doctrine, it can be found in the acts of those eleven Republican States of the North which passed laws to nullify and defeat the fugitive slave laws of Congress passed in 1793, under WASHINGTON'S Administration, and in 1850, during MR. FILLMORE'S term; in the open defiance to the Federal authority of every Republican State; in the declaration of the Republican Governors and Republican Legislatures in every State under their rule that the rights of the States were paramount to the rights of the General Government, and in the many instances in which the Republican State authorities maintained their theory of State sovereignty in violent demonstrations against the Federal authority.

The Mr. MORTON went on to say: "In coming to California I am not coming to a sovereign and independent State." Were he to go to Massachusetts—and it is so with other of the old thirteen States—in New England particularly—he would there find himself confronted in his utterances by the State Constitution which declares that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is, and of right ought to be a free, sovereign and independent State;" and for proof that she has always maintained that she is "free, sovereign and independent," Massachusetts has, on every important occasion, when it was her interest or caprice to do so, defied and opposed the authority of the Federal Government, the Federal Constitution and the laws of Congress. Mr. MORTON, himself, when he was the "great war Governor" of Indiana, did the same thing, and paid no more attention or respect to the Constitution of the United States than he does now to the truth of history, and we cannot call to mind a more apt simile by which to show his bold and unscrupulous suppression of facts and his deliberate misstatements. And when he says that Mr. TILDEN wrote a letter in advocacy of State Rights in October, 1860, to a person in New Orleans, and accuse him of wrong in so doing, he cannot escape from the charge of being himself a Republican party—of which he was then and is still a member himself—of a similar wrong, because the very Republican Convention which nominated Mr. LINCOLN for President in May of that same year declared that "the rights of the States must and shall be preserved."

But where does MR. MORTON find warrant for the theory that we are considering, one people, subdivided into States? At what time and in what manner were the original thirteen Colonies or States subdivided? No history known to the people gives any such information; nor does it appear does the Indiana Senator derive it? The fact is the foundation of his assertion and the theory he has built on it, and if he cannot—as we all know the thing to be impossible—adduce proof to establish his first position—the primary, why, of course, his whole frail and flimsy superstructure falls at once to the ground. But what must his hearers or the public think of either the integrity or veracity of a man, high up in station as he is, who seriously utters such monstrous perversions and falsifications of historical and recorded principles and truths? One anything like it from any orator, what we now have heard or known him to state, be accepted as either sound or truthful?

But we are not yet done with him. His sophistry and temporization in reference to BELKNAP'S case proved alike dishonesty and the subservient of THOMAS H. PENDLETON in the same, were apparent to all who listened to him. He very well knows that BELKNAP'S act was a crime, and that he disgraced the public service while he robbed or swindled the poor soldiers who were the helpless and bleeding victims of his bribe-giving post-traders. And he also knows that, through many years of public life, that Mr. MORTON'S name was never stained in the slightest particular. All that he did was to take a fee as a professional attorney, and the parties from whom he received it are still the first ones to express their full satisfaction of the transaction. Thus he wronged nobody, nor did he commit any act of which any professional brother need feel ashamed. But BELKNAP committed several crimes, and dishonored the country at home and abroad. And yet MR. MORTON seeks to divert the popular condemnation from BELKNAP, the corrupt Cabinet Minister of his party, and to direct the popular wrath against PENDLETON, the private citizen, whose official record is at once brilliant and undimmed. Why? Because BELKNAP is a Republican and PENDLETON is a Democrat—and for no other reason. He asserts that BELKNAP was at first a Democrat, as he also says, GRANT himself was. Very well; then if he condemns the evil ways of BELKNAP on this ground, he cannot refuse to praise all that is good in GRANT from the same cause. And, as it happens the Senator himself was a strong Murder, Love and Piety.

We not long ago said that a brother of House, the divorce lawyer who was killed by his wife, was trying to get the homicidal widow to marry him. Two of the brothers of the dead man afterward wrote to the Sun denying that they had any desire to enter into matrimonial bonds with the woman who had so violently disgraced those by which she was held to the slaughtered House. Our information regarding the peculiar love-making was derived from a well-informed and trustworthy source. It is now confirmed by the letters of the disconsolate widow, by the words of one of the brothers, and inferentially by the letters of the brother who went a-wooing his daughter-in-law. The World has obtained these letters from Gerrit W. House, who "died" House, and the widow House were "mighty sweet on each other" after the killing, but who also seems to have been himself enthused by the charms of the fair homicide. The letters written by Mrs. House—"Irene," Gerrit calls her, with the familiarity of a brother-in-law—and by Brad House, the tender suitor for her unsurpassed hand, are remarkable in epistolatory literature.

The House family seems to be a strange one, and, from the letters before us, very pious. When Brad House got the news of the killing of his brother JAMES, he was in Boston, hastened to New Jersey from Keuka, breathing vengeance against the homicidal Irene. Reaching Trenton, he put up with "Times" office and peremptorily ordered all visitors away. He was in a state of "awful excitement," for, fewer than twenty-six, and a half hours after the murder, Irene and family had left, it is believed for Union Springs, N. Y.

An official note has been published in Madrid denouncing the social conspiracy and attempts at insurrection in Catalonia, and declaring that the ex-Queen Isabella and Queen, who have been arrested, will be sent to Paris. A London dispatch from San Sebastian says the Carlists have now advices that the Republican party has received much excitement there, and has resolved to proclaim a Republic on the abdication of Queen Isabella and Don Carlos. Marshal Serrano, Lieutenant Jovellar, Admiral Topete, and Generals Concha, Hidalgo and Manzanedo. It is reported that Don Carlos has left Bayonne for the Prussian frontier.

Brad Standard's dispatch from Belgrade says: The Turkish forces in Servia resumed the offensive on the 23d, and after a severe battle captured three forts. It consisted of two distinct operations, one of which was successful, and the other the positions commanding Delignol. In the latter movement the Turks lost 2,000 men and abandoned large quantities of arms and many prisoners. The fight lasted from 6 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The Turks then withdrew to their former positions. The Servians opened fire before the Turks had time to entrench themselves. Servian forces at Ivanis, under Hrouvoratcvitch, were also successful.

A dispatch from Berlin states that a financial crisis of the most serious character is threatening Austria-Hungary. The Austrian Minister of Finance, Herr Ritter von Ploener, has resigned, and the Austrian Government and Ministry seem to be in a state of confusion. The Bourse at Vienna is panic-stricken. The Hungarian Government has declared a moratorium of six months, and has issued a circular to the effect that the Austrian Government has violated the Austro-Hungarian Bank Act, and has consequently withdrawn from the Austro-Hungarian Bank the right to issue notes. The Austrian Government

SONG.

Oh sing to me that lovel old strain
We sang together long ago,
And let me hear thy voice again
Like angel music sweetly flow.
We sat and sang together here)
Through many a foreign scene I've passed
Since thy sweet music charmed my ear.
Then sing to me that sweet old strain
We used to sing long, long ago,
And let me hear thy voice sage,
Like angel music sweetly flow.

I've been beyond the seas after,
And many a pleasant strain have heard
On Italia and sweet gultar
That echoed on my bosom stirred;
But ever, as their measures fell,
The sweetest, in this ear of mine,
Remembrance cast he fairy spell
And bore me back those strains of thine.
Then sing to me that loved old strain
We sang together long ago,
And let me hear thy voice again
Like angel music sweetly flow.

Again, together, side by side,
We sit, as in the days of yore;
The ocean's stormy wave divide
Our fond and loving hearts no more.
The weather's beauties fresh and green,
The birds sing out a joyous lay,
And nature smiles in love serene,
As though 'twere our joy today.
Then sing to me that loved old strain
We used to sing long, long ago,
And let me hear thy voice again
Like angel music sweetly flow.

Mr. Gladstone—Sir Thomas More.

What Mr. Gladstone wrote of the Turks: "No Government ever has so sinned; none has so proved itself incorrigible in sin, or, which is the same, so impotent for reformation," can receive corroboration from an authority running back over three centuries, and under the head of Sir Thomas More. A passage from the saintly Chancellor's "Dialogue of Comfort," written in the Tower in 1534, printed at Antwerp in 1573, contains a description of what the Turk was known to the world then to be, and could be applied now to the atrocities of Nadjib Effendi, Achmet Agha or of Dospat, Mahommed Agha of Dorkova, and the other lieutenants feeds whom Mr. Bering's reputation holds up to execration. In it Mr. Gladstone refers to "those heaps on heaps of dead, the visioned pretty althe of maiden, of maiden, and of child, the cruelties which hee been effronted and shamed." It reads best as an iteration of what Sir Thomas More had penned. "And now since these tidings have come hither so brim of the great Turk's enterprise into these parts here we can almost neither lair nor think of any other thing else than of his might and our mischief; there hilleth so continually before the eyes of our heart a fearful image of the ire of the terrible king his mighty strength and power, his high malice and hatred, and his incomparable cruelty, with robbing, spoiling, burning, and laying waste all the way that he army marcheth. Then killing or carrying away the people for thence, far from home, and there sever the couples and the kindred asunder, every one far from other. Some kept in thraldom and some kept in prison, and some for a triumph tormented and killed in his presence." Truly the Turk is incorrigible. What Mr. Pears wrote for the Daily News in June, 1876, and Mr. Schuyler reported to the American Government a little later, all were confirmed by Mr. Baring, is neither more nor less than what Engiand's great Chancellor's wrote of the Turk in the sixteenth century. Will sixteenth century "civilization" endure the stated gue, or "as you were," policy of Lords Derby and Beaconsfield?

The Pope—Cardinal Antonelli—Father Beckx.

Once again the revolutionary journals of the Roman occupation have been at their lying work with reference to the health of the Sovereign Pontiff and his Historical Prime Minister. The Roman correspondent of the Paris Univers thus disposes of the most recent of the calumnies uttered by the Italian portion of "the reptile press." "The revolutionary organ," says the correspondent, "are once more busy about the health of the Pope and that of Cardinal Antonelli. As regards the Pope, the Nazione has written from Rome that his Government, desiring to know what to say precisely about him, has consulted Dr. Consoli, a physician of great skill, who is in attendance on the Pontiff. It gives a report of a consultation with the doctor, which is at once a memo of impertinence and an insult to the excellent and faithful physician. As regards the Cardinal, the Gazzetta d'Italia pretends that it has received certain confidential disclosures from Dr. Mazzoni. Now, the fact is that Dr. Mazzoni has not been a professional attendance for a very long time upon the Cardinal, who is now being treated by a more capable physician." With reference to a ridiculous assertion, gravely furbished anew a few days since from the Jewish telegraphic agencies of the Continent, with regard to the Very Rev. Father Beckx, the distinguished Superior-General of the Jesuits, the correspondent writes: "Another journal announces that the Pope is about to create the Cardinalate the Rev. Father Beckx, in order to give assistance to the Ultramontane party, which is desirous to elect the General of the Jesuits at the next conclave for the election of a Pope. All this is perfectly absurd. I do not suppose even that Father Beckx wishes good-naturedly, but somewhat contemptuously, when he reads such stuff."

The Only Way to get Reform.

Hon. Charles Francis Adams has used some of the stiest and most statesmanlike words which the caarsen has called out. They are not the utterances of a shallow observer or a self seeking politician, but of a man long in public life, of varied political service, and accustomed to discern the meaning of events and weigh the professions of parties. Mr. Adams, however, has said nothing truer or more pregnant with suggestion than the following, contained in a letter addressed by him to the Young Men's Democratic Club of this city. These are Mr. Ad-m's words:

"The people of the last eight years of shameful prof gacy to the direction of public affairs, beginning with the history of the Credit Mobilier and concluding with the appointments made during the last session of Congress, appear to but one safe result to be arrived at in the present election. That result is a thorough change of administration. I, for one, am tired of some promises with exception and pledges of future amendment, while the service itself is foreseen that have brought us to degrees sositions in the secondant. Unless the people speak this year in an unequivocal manner, there will be no thorough reform possible hereafter."

We hope all young men, to whom Mr. Adams especially addresses the above language, and old men, too, will think upon these sentiments. It is indeed true that unless the people seize the present opportunity to cleanse the Government by driving out of its places the corrupt party now entrenched in them, the hopes of reform in the future will be few, poor and illusory. Now is the time to do the work, and such a time may not come again for years. If the Republicans again in office, further fortify them in their present places in spite of their shortcomings and low practices, and four years from now it may be impossible to remedy their mismanagement of the Government and expose and prevent their longer plundering of the people.—*N. HOW ABOUT ELIJAH!

A Methodist minister was on his travels through the west of Illinois twenty years ago. Illinois was a wild place then. He arrived at a village one day before coming to a farm-house; but there he was received with hospitality. Chicken pot pie and corn dodgers composed his supper; but as a hungry man these are as good as stuffed turkey.

A fine old grandmother of the house was most profuse in her hospitality. She pressed the pot pie and the dodgers upon her guest, and could eat no more. And then, when the family was gathered around the great log chimney and its blazing fire, the venerable dame thus spake:

"Well, well, to-day! it's a grand comfort to have a minister of the gospel in these parts. It's twenty years agone since I have seen a preacher. Yes, sir, I've been a reader of my Bible all that time, and a waitin' to see a minister to set his gospel plain about subjects I don't rightly understand."

"Madame," answered the onctious minister, "I am so tired with my long ride that I could not enter into a serious question till I have slept; but if you will ask me to-morrow morning, before I set out, I will answer it to the best of my ability."

The old lady appeared herself satisfied, and the cunning minister secured a soft couch for the night. The next morning Grandma was up early and hard at work frying the slapjacks for the minister's breakfast. The family, indeed, the old lady was still in a nervous fidget about her question, while the holy man's bones was comfortably stuffed and rested to the door.

After adjusting his saddle-bags and shabby, he stands with all the family to mounted his horse, and turned to her and asked:

"And now, madame, what is your question?"

"Weal, minister," she, "yar know now it ees in the Bible that our friar Elishas was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, and the heavens opened and Elijah was taken up to heaven in a chariot and horses of fire. Now, for twenty years sie' I read that 'ere in the Bible, and I have pounded over it ever since; and there ain't a soul round these parts that knows anything about it, and I've studied over it more nor I. But you're a minister o' the Gospel, an' ought to know all them things. Now, what I want to know is this: Did the Lord take Elijah right slick to heaven, or didn't he go kinder stavin-ridiculous?"

History has not recorded the minister's reply.

RUSSIAN INTRIGUERY.

Russia has for a long time past tried to do to Poland what England attempted to do to Ireland and signally failed to. So little has been the success of the endeavors to pervert the Catholic peasants of the Polish provinces to Greek error, that further attempts have been stopped throughout Poland, and at present the persecutors are concentrating all their energies on the introduction of the Russian language and public worship by way of a preliminary step towards the extinction of the Catholic faith. The way in which this is managed is very simple in appearance. The priests of the whole country have been "invited" to use nothing but Russian in their sermons, no matter whether they and their congregations understood it or not. Disobedience to this order, they who refrain from among the most zealous members of the Russian clergy. They get a stipend over £90 and four post horses over and above their ordinary stipends. Twice a year they have to visit each church or chapel of the district, to take stock of the church property, to preach sermons in Russian, and enforce the use of the language by all possible means. One of the sections of their "instructions" says:

"The visitor may propose rewards in favor of ecclesiastical persons who distinguish themselves by their zeal in the use of Russian in their services or sermons, and to bring about the punishment of all priests who do not favor the introduction of Russian, or who oppose it."

The effect of these measures will be the same as in Prussia. The clergy will do exactly as they are told if there were no distinctions of nations, and unless it be intended to send all the priests of Poland to Siberia, the laborers and their agents will be all fools for their pains.—London Universe.

A CAREER FOR CATHOLIC YOUNG MEN.

There is no denying that the mass of Catholic young men fail to appreciate their opportunities. After their first Communion they many of them neglect their religious duties one after another, with the necessarily damaging result of a life dragged out under the shadow of God's curse.

Here one instance out of scores as a blasphemer—there another passes down step by step into a drunkard's grave. This one suffers the mental and bodily blight wrought by impure excesses; that one loses his hope in God and then his faith. On them the knowledge of God's revelation, the grace of Baptism, of Confirmation, of the Holy Eucharist, and the whole supernatural life for which the martyrs were willing to give their blood, are lost. This is a solemn fact, attested by nearly every pastor's experience. How shall do these terrible fools, who get in exchange for these graces they squander? Darkness of understanding, remorse of conscience and the contempt of the world they foolishly turn upon in abandoning the practice of their faith. This and many more. They lived in the King's palace, had the son of God for their brother—Mary for their Mother; prayed for their companions.—God for their inheritance. Neglecting their religious duties—despising as so many and mere without understanding, they abandon their proud and secure position, and enter into competition with those who are "without hope and without God in the world." Nero, emperor of the world, accused the contempt of history because he had the ambition to compete with the horse jockeys. Every Christian youth will earn the world's contempt, his own self-reproach and the scorn of the very demons, by postponing the goods of faith to the delusions of sense.

The career for Catholic young men is to be Catholics. Life is short. Eternity is all that is worth aiming at. Eternity alone will unravel mysteries, satiate longings, cool heartburning, pay for sufferings, refute calumnies, adjust all wrongs, and bring perfect and enduring peace.—Cohansey News.

THE CROSS AND THE CRESCENT—SCENES IN BULGARIA.

A letter in the London Daily Telegraph of September 19th contains details of some shocking events that occurred in the province of Bogdan, which neither Mr. Baring nor Mr. Schuyler visited. Things took place there even more fearful, though perhaps on a smaller scale, than those described in the province of Philippopolis. Men were brutally beaten, girls were made to walk bare-footed on thorns, and to carry their persecutors on their shoulders. When a sapieh arrived in a village and did not find the master of the house at home he would beat his wife, violate her, and afterwards burn her cruelly with a red-hot iron. Villages were plundered and burned, and the inhabitants murdered or else taken to prison as insurgents. In one case, ten prisoners were packed iiist, fastened to a chain, they were obliged to sleep one on top of another, and suffered terribly from hunger and from the filth of the place. Two priests were arrested, and after being beaten and undressed, were guarded by being hung up in chains by an iron collar round the neck, with their arms stretched out and tied to the wall so as to form a cross. They were also taken down, and one of them was afterward subjected to fiendish tortures until he expired in great agony. Churches and monasteries were not spared; bodies of headless villagers were found in the fields, and men died on the road from the brutal treatment they received from the soldiery. At Mitrovitza, a locality where it might have been supposed that civilization had penetrated, there is the greatest terror. Many refugees from Salonica, every house was pillaged for the benefit of the Mussulmans, and in one place a hundred bodies lay dead on the sun, all in a state of putrefaction. The heads of both men and of all ages were separated from the trunks. At a little church not far away the same spectacle presented itself, but it was worse, as the number of victims was greater. A French officer in this village had his house pillaged, and, wishing to bid adieu to Mitrovitza some days after, he went to the tomb of his two daughters he had lost there, only to find that there was no longer a grave, the ground having been dug and the coffin broken into a hundred pieces.

THE POLITICAL PRISONERS.

The London correspondent of the Dublin Freeman, telegraphing on the 20th ult., says:

Some of the political prisoners were visited yesterday at Chatham, and the details of the visit as they reach me disclose a shocking state of affairs. It is as well to mention at once that the unfortunate sufferers made no complaint against the present Government, and they are not at all to charge of harshness against him; on the contrary the prisoners say there seems to be a disposition on the part of the authorities to let the full law visit paid them, but their wretched appearance was painful in the extreme.

A DETECTED SPIRITUALIST.

Spiritualists will be sorry to learn that Mr. Slade, the latest and greatest of the mediums, has been discovered, found out, babbed upon, and generally squelched. Sergeant Cox, Recorder for Middlesex, has for many years made himself ridiculous by taking and writing down evidence on the promptings of spirits from one of the other worlds. Some time since he was bamboozled by Dr. Slade, who, it is needless to remark, came from America. Sergeant Cox was delighted to find that the vulgar system of rapping was discarded by Dr. Slade, whose friends in the spirit world were good enough to take a pencil and write their opinions on a slate in the plainest English. The method was simple. Slade set at a table, put a slate under and across the centre, with all their God-like beauties of color, sound, symmetry, usefulness, progress and development, and to which it would be a curse to add. The highest aspiration and resolutions of the brain are brought to light through the hand, and the tenderest love and charity of the heart make the hand their ministrant. Yet how many of the ministers of comfort and peace, yet as cruel as the sword, have dipped in blood! Ah! And with all their power, with their chemistries, their cruelties, their tender touches, their wonderful mechanism, they have left those who speak of or, tell of the closing of the book and the rolling of hands as the part of her going away.

WORTH THINKING OVER.

There are in life, in human life and in the life of nations, coincidences which, if they are fortuitous, would make a man incline to think that there is more in fortune than he has ever been willing to admit. Among such let our readers ponder on the following, which has been collated by the gallant General du Temple. They must needs be struck with the parallel to all, but to the Catholic mind of course they will be perfectly intelligible:

1. On the very day (not on the eve or on the morrow, but on the day itself) that the French troops left Rome, France experienced her first defeat, that of Wissembourg.

2. France lost in that catastrophe men precisely to the number of 666, the number assigned by the Church to the Beast.

3. The very day that the last French soldier quitted Italy was that also upon which Victor Emanuel put on for the last time the fatal sash.

4. The 4th of September, 1870, was the very day of the last entry of the King of Naples' troops into Rome, but it was likewise the tenth anniversary of the day when, according to the Napoleon, plotting with the infamous traitor Cavour, resolved on the downfall of the Papal Government.

5. The very morning that the Italians appeared before Rome the Emperor Napoleon departed before Paris, and the two cities were invested by their enemies the same day.

HAYES KNOW-NOTHINGISM.

Demoralization in the Republican ranks throughout the State of Ohio is plainly visible, and all efforts to conceal the effects of alarm only serves to render the panic more apparent. The Germans are deserting them by hundreds and falling into line under the standard of sovereign liberty, while the perfect proof of Hayes' sympathy with the Know-Nothing organization called the American Alliance has denuded his proposals in Ohio to an extent that he little dreamed of when he drafted his letter accepting the nomination of that order and approving of its proscriptive principles. In a speech delivered in Geauga at Archer Hall, in Cincinnati, on the 7th October, Governor Hayes declared that he had personal knowledge of Hayes' membership in the American Alliance, and advises from persons that he considered perfectly reliable that the acceptance of their nomination for President was in perfect accordance with the principles of the Alliance, and in defiance of the principles of the foreign population of America. The old know-Nothing motto was "Native Americans should rule America," and been his until it became profitable for him to have his secretly denounced by Dr. Slade, who is the mark, came from America. Sergeant Cox was delighted to find that the vulgar system of rapping was discarded by Dr. Slade, whose friends in the spirit world were good enough to take a pencil and write their opinions on a slate in the plainest English. The method was simple. Slade set at a table, put a slate under and across the centre, with all their God-like beauties of color, sound, symmetry, usefulness, progress and development, and to which it would be a curse to add. The highest aspiration and resolutions of the brain are brought to light through the hand, and the tenderest love and charity of the heart make the hand their ministrant. Yet how many of the ministers of comfort and peace, yet as cruel as the sword, have dipped in blood! Ah! THE ENCHANTED LAND.

Once a child, an innocent child, playing
In pain, deep meadows, sweet with clover bloom—
I was but a child beside my mother straying,
And that fact left everything a new home.
Then in the west, flamed the tall golden fountains,
Into I call were a fairer sky expanded—
Beyond the hills, beyond those, rugged mountains
Lay
Is so far-off as land?

Ah me! Yes the lofty mountains guarding
Its place beneath were its imperial walls;
Still my wistful, wondering gaze rewarding,
By the radiance from its fairy halls.
On the mountain mountain's play in splendor;
Still my heart beyond those, still does it wander
Across the rocks, oh, how I longed to wander
Across so wondrous fair!

Many castles in the meadows twinkling
Many castles in the meadows, and did my brave knock said,
Who else fairy is only fitfully thinking
Upon the fairest, about the inhabitants on the cliff,
Jubilee, birds or trees, once precious treasures—
Seemed to be among that happy band,
Where life is one of those magic pleasures
Of the enchanted land.

Ah, there came a time when to the mountain
My gaze was from one clear daylight more—
A clear cliff and meadow, grave and fountain,
A manner made their lone sinuding here.
And all the cliffs, the cliffs, the cliffs,
Of the mountain top at length to stand,
Where, from the mountain, the expected vision
Of the enchanted land.

Bare bright castles and brave knights swarmed,
Queens pacing in the stately way—
Ah, me! Ah, me! I was charmed,
Into kind immortal powers with mortal played!
Ah, me! Ah, me! I was charmed,
Bed and harem bills on every hand,
Used to mock my sight! and this, this only,
My recognition!

Not a boy, an adept boy behind
Possessions of the living world
Not a maiden, not a girl, not a soldier,
Or fascinating circles whirled
Ages and powers, its beauty and its pleasures,
Its vaster longing for the vast beyond,
Its pillars, with all the heart's most needed treasures,
Its enchanted land.

Lost! Yes, with the light from fairy faces
And its borders playing all the while,
Lost! Yes, with the light from fairy faces
Its wonderful, its ravishing graces:
I have hallowed every haunting saille,
Its grief of spirit and confession,
Its every word of heart and hand,
All I trusted in the fond illusion
Of the enchanted land.

Lost! Yes, with the light from fairy faces
And its borders playing all the while,
Lost! Yes, with the light from fairy faces
Its wonderful, its ravishing graces:
I have hallowed every haunting saille,
Its grief of spirit and confession,
Its every word of heart and hand,
All I trusted in the fond illusion
Of the enchanted land.

Communistic Nunsense.

Newspapers seem to have dull times just now, and can only regale their readers with extracts from the speeches of bishops given in many parts of France on the old revolutionary anniversaries of the 21st September. My own opinion is that it is the worthy estate of the sacrifice of the Church, whose duty it is to preach up the virtues of resignation and submission to the powers that be, and to point out to the poor that their lot is not so bad after all, and that they have no reason to complain. Now, I am not a Communist myself, but I am not afraid of the word, and I am not afraid of the thing, and I am not afraid of the consequences that would follow if the poor were to take the law into their own hands. Let them do so, and they will find that they have only changed masters, and that the new ones are not so easy to deal with as the old ones

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—Rev. John Moore, R. C. C., Grenagh, Blarney, has been appointed to the curacy of Freemount, Charleville.

—Rev. William B. Dougherty, a native of Donoughmore, Ireland, and for many years pastor of Kenosha, Wis., died in that city on the 23d ult.

—The Weekly Visitor, of Providence, R. I., announces that nearly one hundred Protestants have become Catholics in that city since January.

—Rev. Father E. J. Durbin, of Princeton, Ky., the oldest priest in Kentucky, celebrated the fifty-fourth anniversary of his ordination at St. Joseph's Cathedral in that city recently.

—Rev. Dr. Cochrane, of Cuper, has joined the Church of Rome, and was presented at the recent laying of the foundation-stone of the Benedictine Monastery at Fort Augustus in Scotland.

—The National Zeitung of Berlin states that Herr Von Keudell, the German Ambassador at Rome, has received at Varzin an order to demand that Cardinal Lavigerie should be expelled from Italy.

—On Sunday, September 7th, the Right Rev. Bishop Wadhame dedicated the beautiful Gothic church of the Sacred Heart, at Masonville, N. Y., to the service of Almighty God.

—On the 21st ult. Rev. E. J. Durbin, the oldest Catholic priest in Kentucky, celebrated the fifty-fourth anniversary of his elevation to the priesthood at St. Joseph's church, Bardstown, where he was ordained.

—At the request of the Cuban ladies of New York, Father McGlynn, of St. Stephen's church, on the 10th inst., celebrated a High Mass for the repose of the souls of the Cuban patriots who have given their lives for the liberty of their country.

—Sister Mary Magdalen Shelley, of the Tipperary Convent, died recently. She had made her vows a year before, and was only twenty-one years of age. The good sister was born in Kilkenny, and was the third of her family who had devoted herself to religion.

—On dit at Washington, D. C., that Father Keane of St. Patrick's Church in that city is to be appointed Bishop of Richmond, vice Bishop Gibbons, now coadjutor to the archdiocese of Baltimore. Father Keane is greatly endeared to his congregation in Washington.

—The much loved and venerable priest, Rev. Patrick Dunne, G.C.C., died on Monday, October 23, at the Convent of the Order, Kinsale, at the advanced age of ninety-eighteen years of age, and had entered on the eleventh year of her novitiate. Her name in the world was Miss Kate Lynaugh; in Christ she is present, one sit Sisters rich with the prevailing epidemic. Too much praise cannot be given to Sister Cecilia for her unwearied attention and devotion to the sick at the Hospital. It is owing to her superior abilities and untiring energy that the comforts and wants of the sick are so well attended. We hope, in due time, her services and her talents will be fully recognized.

—Sisters of Charity are again sighed for in Germany, which is already beginning to feel, so the Catholic Review intends, that in expelling the religious orders from their borders it was more than she has injured them. In the hospitals, which for many years attended by Sisters, the rule of mercy has been increased perceptibly since their departure. It is impossible to preserve the religious character and tendency of public schools. Numerous advertisements for such have been inserted in the newspapers by the Governments, and opposite mode to the protests of previous years, but in vain, notwithstanding that a high rate of salary—three hundred thalers more than the Sisters required—have been offered, besides many other advantages.

—The Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle of October 18 says: One of the most successful and numerously attended missions ever prosecuted in this city was that concluded yesterday at the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, in North Sixth street, of which Rev. Martin Carroll is parish priest. Very Rev. Father Damen and six Jesuit Fathers conducted the mission, which was in progress two weeks, and the attendant ceremonies were impressive in character. It required the constant and strenuous labors of the officiating clergy from the beginning to end to complete the gratifying results effected, and during the mission more than a hundred thousand communicants were in attendance.

It becomes our painful duty to record the death of a venerable priest, who, from his position and from his great personal piety, was known and esteemed by clerical friends throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. One of the oldest among the alumni of Maynooth College—a man of ardent yet unostentatious zeal, simple in the grace of his refined manners, lavish, while his health and means permitted, of his time his health and means permitted, of his time his health and his money, in the service of the poor and of the ignorant. Very few among the priests of the archdiocese of Tuam who passed through the fiery ordeal of the famine years will fail to remember some generous contributions which came at that time from his benevolent hand. Nor was his charity confined to his native diocese. Wherever want—corporal or spiritual—in Ireland, England, or Scotland was to be relieved there was his seasonable aid and his colossian influence felt. Father Tully was a native of Mount Bellew, county Galway. His early studies were pursued in the Diocesan College, St. Jarlath's, Tuam. In 1810 he entered Maynooth College, where, after a distinguished course, he passed from half a century's meritorious labors in the priesthood of Irish, to which he was appointed in 1825. The survivors of those who during nearly half a century passed through the Irish close will, we feel confident, not be unmindful of the virtues of their old and amiable professor.—Dublin Freeman, Oct. 2.

The Spiritualistic Fraud.

Slade, the so-called spiritualistic medium was brought up before the Bow street Police Court, London, on the charge of conspiracy to defraud and obtaining money under false pretences. The groundwork of the charge was that he pretended to do so by the aid of "spirits" which are really personified by sleight-of-hand, and thus cheated Professor Lankester and other gentlemen. At the conclusion of the preliminary examination he was committed, upon stating two sureties for two hundred and fifty dollars each. The following is Professor Lankester's evidence in the case:

Professor Edwin Ray Lankester deposed that he was a professor of zoology. He said, in answer to Mr Lewis: I have seen the defendants Slade and Simmonds before; on the 4th of September they came to a house in Upper Bedford place, and I was ushered into a room on the ground floor. I saw Simmonds there, accompanied by a dark, and I told him I had an appointment with him; he then said in answer, "There is Dr. Slade," pointing to another gentleman; there were two or three other persons in the room, and after shaking hands with them he said to me, "Will you come into the next room?" We went into the next room, which was behind; in which the slate was brought directly on that table, and Simmonds began writing on the slate next the table; there were two names of those persons who were dead, and one of those names was Wilkes. Simmonds were read out to me, and I was asked if I had any deceased relatives of those names. I said, "Dear me, that must be my uncle John;" he inquired whether I knew the name of William, and I said I had cousins of the name of William.

Mr. Lewis—Had you an uncle named John?

Witness—No.

Mr. Slade then said the spirits would answer a question if I would write, but before that he had settled me to write my question, and the spirit would answer it; so I wrote, "Where was I on Saturday afternoon?" Mr. Slade said, "Don't let me see the slate," and he took it in his left hand and began the same manipulations with the pencil; the slate was soon out of my sight, and I saw him moving; he said: "They are a long time coming!" I felt convinced before the slate went under the table the answer was written; however, the scratching noise was heard, and the following answer was given—"We did not see you on Saturday afternoon."

Mr. Flowers—Perhaps you were in a place where the spirits would not be likely to go.

Witness—I was in a place where there were a great many good people, and I should have thought that probably my deceased relatives would have been there; I was at Mr. Bladatsky's meeting at Blackheath: he wished the slate again, and this time the message was, "You can become a very good medium;" I said nun I was glad to hear that; he then cleaned the slate again; I should say with regard to that last message that he invited me to hold the slate with my left hand, while he held it with his right; I thought I would snatch the slate away, but did not; the next message he pretended to produce or to have written while the slate was behind my head; I had previously heard him write on the slate while it was in his lap; when he put the slate behind my head I heard the same scratching noises, and ultimately a message was produced.—"We will come and visit you in your room;" the slate was again cleaned, and Slade then said—"Some persons have accused me of being unable to produce messages with a long piece of pencil;" he produced a long piece, and said, "You see here a long piece of pencil," he then placed the slate under the table again, but lower down than before, so as to admit of the greater length of pencil; the same manifestations were again gone through, and Slade endeavored to distract attention with kicks and noise; he said to me, "There is a light on your elbow;" I glanced round at my elbow, but saw no light.

After he had full time to write another message, and after I had heard the same sounds and he had made the same guttural noises in his throat, the pencil was suddenly shot up on to the table; Slade then produced the slate, and there was a written message upon it.—"We can write more; we are tired;" that message was written in a different hand from the others—it was written in a flowing hand; the spirits appeared to have left off writing with the fingers, and moving a chair close to the opposite corner of where he was sitting; he asked me to look under the table to see that he could not reach the chair with his toe, then he said, "Join your hands to mine," and he leaned forward in a constrained attitude, and the chair was moved immediately raised perpendicularly at the corner of the table, and remained there for a second, and then dropped to the ground.

Mr. Lewis—When he reached forward could his leg reach the chair? Yes, in my judgment it could; a similar feat was then performed with the table, which was raised; I expressed great admiration at what I had seen, and Slade told me if I came again privately I should be rewarded; things still would be seen, as the phenomena developed as the attention of the sitter was given to them; then I went into the front room, and said to Simmonds, "What is there to pay?" He said, "The fee is one gui nea," which I gave him, and told him and Slade again that I should probably come and see them again at the end of the week.

The Bible Before the Reformation.

In England, in the year 706, Adhelm, Bishop of Sherborn, translated the Psalter into Saxon. Egbert, Bishop of Lindisfarn, translated the four Gospels into the same Saxon; and after these the Venerable Bede, who died in 735, translated the whole Bible into the vulgate into the same language. In this reign of Alfred, who died in the year 700, a new translation of the Psalter was commenced, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, in 995, translated the five books of Moses, Joshua, Job, Judges, Ruth, pair of Kings, Esther and Maccabees. In England the whole Bible appeared, according to Usher, in 1270. In the reign of Edward III. (1327) was issued a second Bible. Wharton, Usher and Wood, is the Antiquities of Oxford, speak of two editions of the oldest. In 1382 the New Testament was published at Rheims, reprinted at Antwerp in 1600, and at Douay, in Douay, in 1609; revised in 1750, and is now the Catholic English version throughout the world. After the art of printing was discovered—which was little used until 1642, and before 1535, the date of Luther's Germ man Bible—there were in the vernacular languages of Europe more than seventy editions of the Bible. In Italy, 14 editions; in France, 19; in Germany, 15; in Holland, 9; in Spain, 2; in Bohemia, 2. Now it appears that the existence of the Bible in the vernacular languages of Europe is a great fact more than two years before Luther was born or the Reformation started in Germany.—Catholic Opinion.

A subscription paper, circulated for some charitable purpose, in a manufactory, who subscribed twenty francs. The "forewoman" said she had not the money, but would pay it on Saturday. "Why, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Your son has a thousand francs!" "That is all very well," replied the manufacturer; "my son has a rich father, who can afford to give more than I, who shall not inherit anything."

"LINKED LIVES." By Lady Gertrude Douglas. Lady Gertrude Douglas' story has real merits of conception and execution. It belongs to Lady Georgiana Fullerton's school; but is more vivacious, pointed, and dramatic than that accomplished writer has been able to achieve.—London Academy.

The report received Saturday from Fort Peck, Upper Missouri, that Stuling Bull and his warriors had crossed to the north of the Yellowstone, at the mouth of the Big Horn, en route for Fort Peck to make peace, is good news.

From Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, of Boston, formerly Editor of the "Christian Freeman."

DEAR SIR: It may be some satisfaction to you to be informed of the result of my experience in the use of your Hop Bitters. My daughter was brought low by a typoid fever last Spring, and after using the usual remedies without benefit, was reduced to a mere form discharged her. For months the regular form discharged her. For months the regular physicians continued their attendance, but at the close of September last, when the disease had reached the third stage, they gave her up entirely, and she steadily gained strength and vitality, and now, after using three bottles, is restored to a good state of health; indeed, she says herself that she never felt so well in all her years past. I am of opinion that the "Proprietor of Hop Bitters" is entitled to the gratitude of every person in the land, and that no other known medicine could have saved my child. S. COBB.

A Browning Man will clutch at a Straw if he catch it, it will do him no good. Thousands of poors, who have been deceived by worthless remedies, are now become dangerous, will rush for almost every nostrum for relief. Let them be warned by our experience we tried Dr. Browning's Balsam of to your druggist, buy a bottle of Dr. Browning's Balsam of Wild Cherry, and use it according to directions. It will benefit at once, and ultimately cure. Let no one be deceived by a cheap and worthless imitation.

To Shaky, or not to Shake?

Ayr, that is the question. Is it better to quiver from head to foot in the paroxysms of fever and ague, or to banish the atrocious disease by a course of that standard anti-febrile remedy, Hostetter's Bitters. There cannot be much doubt as to the response of the malaria-stricken to the inquiry. From every locality in this country whose inhabitants are tormented with the shivering plague comes an increasing demand for this only genuine preventive and eradicator of malarial contagion and atmosphere. The demoness of fever and ague distracts well know how effectually it disposes of its more than grim ally, a brief respite are the so-called remedies of the facility. Quinine, arsenic, blemish—what are these but poisonous pretenders, which cease after a time to produce any beneficial effect whatever, and if persisted in, frequently partake somewhat upon the system they were designed to benefit? Hostetter's Bitters, a vegetable compound, and that genuine vegetable specific for impoverished blood, constipation, liver disease, Hostetter Bitters, substituted in their place.

BULGARIA.

Deep and deeper swells the murmur, high and higher
Mounts the wail,
Rising o'er the Sacred hear it, children of the Greek!
Hear it, listen, and Protest! brothers,
Europe, stand not by!
Behold the wasted hamlet smoulder to the crowded city.

By the wrongs of outraged maidens! by the tears of widowed brides!
By the blood of lisping infants streaming in a purple tide!
By the midnight of slaughtered manhood! by the moan of grandsire gray!
Sons of Christendom, awaken! the hath need of ye to-day!

Who will protect the jealous Moslem, and the grudge that he hates?
Who will protect the Christian but the grave opposite the cradle?
Who will protect the weak but in turn them from that image of despair—
Woe is he! a throne of bloodshed—bleeds the throne where wrong is there?
Shame upon the insight that speaks ill cursed be such covenant here.

Have ye heard the bloodhounds baying while the unarmed country reeks?
Have ye seen the gratified ravenging on the ringdoves of the Balkan?
Know ye not the Moslem victor is the hunter in the chase?
Know ye not ye may not range breathing from his fold embrace?

Oh! the days of Solferino! Oh! the battle-fields of old!
When the Dorders waved war crimson with the ink-blood of the land,
Eyes no back the record of Marie, which so well the Sacred could!
Under that to be the Moslem's navy deep in kind Lombard Sea!

Hush! shorbengbit it was a whisper, like the sighing of the wind,
When the Powers' words are praising softly by the Council Hall.
It is growing, it is spreading, it is bursting forth on high.

And the voice of freedom kindled in a loud and long reply!
Shame, last, onward, none that, westward, bend their banners of God!
North and South, like flame ascending, like the lightning from the East!
In the solemn face of battle, 'neath the wails of the Crescent's woe!
Shout the red avenger back west! strike the infamous Ottoman Horde.

THE POLITICAL PRISONERS AT CHATHAM.

[Correspondence of the Dublin Freeman.]

London, October 5.—As already stated, two Irishmen of London, Messrs. Collins and Ryan, were enabled to pay a visit to Sergeant McCarthy at Chatham Prison. Four times only in the twelve months, for twenty minutes at a time, is the unfortunate condemned to penal servitude permitted to see any home but those of his fell-fellows and the warders and officials. As the reader will know, the meaning attached to a "visit" enables so much as the clasp of a hand, even it even a brother's. A "friend" also is interposed in the narrowest sense, and nothing but the claim of kinship is allowed to afford a reason for admitting a visitor, except in extraordinary cases. As a consequence of the existing harshness of these restrictions, which indeed render the power of visiting almost illusory, most of the Fenians in prison have never been cheered by one friendly voice from the beginning of their terrible doom to the present day. Mr. Martin, by the way, is not the penal servitude prisoners Chambers and O'Meagher Condon, subject to the incongruous punishment of hard labor. Messrs. Barry, McCarthy, the formidable and exasperating Sergeant, and Mulcahy are now undergoing the ordinary sentence of penal servitude.

The gentlemen of Messrs. Collins and Ryan's party were walks and collect Hall of the Sergeant's quarters, where they were brought up to observe what they can of the prisoner and his personal appearance.

Mr. Collins and Ryan were ushered into the room, and the "visit" began. Messrs. Collins and Ryan saw a man of slight build, of medium height, with a pleasant face, and a quiet, gentlemanly manner. Their first impression was that he looked much younger than his years. Mr. Collins and Ryan were told they "will right," and that they were to cross the yard to the visiting-room. Free of all, however, they must keep their hats on, and are not subject to the indignities which the ordinary visiting-room of Chatham prison. A few minutes more, and a single figure in convict dress, but without the broad arrow which prisoners are married, appeared in the court between guards and entered the cage of the visiting room next door. It was Sergeant McCarthy and Messrs. Collins and Ryan were now

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

As they are well aware that the solution of the Chinese Immigration and Cooly Labor question is one of the most important —if, indeed, it is not the one of paramount interest to the working classes—on this coast, and to all in its broad bearings, the Republicans are now endeavoring not only to prove upon it a clear record for themselves, but also to show that it is the Democratic party who have not a good record on it. A few material facts and citations from the acts and utterances of the Democratic party and its representatives and leaders, and from the leaders and representative men also of the Republican party, or the party in opposition to the Democracy, will suffice to convince the reader that the Democratic party has since and exclusively a fair or acceptable record on this and every most question of the campaign—so far as California and this whole coast is involved —and that the Republican party is in accord with those who would invite and welcome Chinese immigration, and extend to the Coolies the franchise of suffrage.

In his speech in Platt's Hall, in this city, the chief Republican stumpspeech of the campaign excitingly referred to the action of the California Legislature of 1853, in which it was proposed to introduce Chinese labor in this State on account of its cheapness. He did not mention the fact that that Legislature was composed of a round majority of Whigs as well as Democrats, and that the Chairman of the Committee which reported favorably on the proposition, R. N. Wood, was a Whig. But he was obliged to admit that it was at least a Democratic authority which defeated it. But there are other facts in connection with the legislation of that day which are of first importance to a true understanding of the whole subject, viz.: Mr. FITCH was very careful not to refer to the first place, the bill contemplated only "our present supply of coolies," for specific stated purposes, and by the continuance of coolie labor in California, and not to any permanent policy. Second, the bill was not passed by the Legislature, but was defeated by the Democratic majority in the Senate, and the Democrats and Republicans took strong stand upon the latter in opposing the great instance of Coolie slavery, laboring hands were scarce, and daily wages so high that the illiage of the coolies in the cultivation of tea or rice, or in the silk culture. They, or it is easy to see, the bill of 1853 was in no sense of a character to interfere with or affect white labor on the coast, or to reduce the wages of the kind of labor that white men performed.

But we shall now go on to show that not only did not the Democratic party favor Chinese immigration and labor, but that it was the party which opposed both, and that the party in opposition to it was responsible for the further influx of Chinese to this coast after 1853. In that year the Democratic Legislature passed a bill by which Chinese were compelled to pay a license of $1, per month to work in the mines. It was intended to exclude them from the mines altogether, while foreigners from every European nation or from any of the ocean islands, or colonies of every European power were allowed to mine on equal footing with native born citizens. Again, in 1855, the Democratic Legislature passed a bill by which a head tax of $50 was imposed on every Chinaman who came into this State. This Act and the one passed in 1853 had the effect to materially decrease the influx of Chinese. But in 1856 the Know-Nothing Legislature repealed the Acts of 1853 and 1855, and the effect of that repeal was soon made apparent. The Chinese merchants and those in favor of Chinese immigration and coolie labor had thousands of copies of the Repealing Act printed in the Chinese language and circulated in China, and in a few months commenced that numerous immigration of Chinese which has ever since continued under anti-Democratic and Republican legislation, State and national, with such potential objects as the BURLINGAME treaty and the naturalization of Chinese in Republican States, and the favorable consideration of Chinese citizenship by the Republicans in Congress.

And now we will proceed to show the character of the Republican and sympathy in behalf of the Chinese by the leading Republican statesmen in Congress, February 6, 1869. During a debate on the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, and amendment to it was offered in the United States Senate, as follows:

But Chinamen are not born in the United States, and Indians not taxed, shall not be deemed or made citizens.

The debate on this amendment was protracted, and the Democrats and Republicans took strong stand upon the latter in opposition to it. Senator TURPIE of Illinois (Rep.) said:

I wish to inform the Senator [Doolittle] that it is not a question on this very day. By a vote of twenty-five to nineteen, we have declared that there shall be no restriction upon the elective franchise, that intelligence, patriotism or property is not that party is committed to universal suffrage, pure and simple.

Senator CAMERON of Pennsylvania (Rep.), declared himself thus:

I am in favor of the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it invites here not every every body—the negro, Irishman, Scotchman, Englishman and Chinaman. We might just as well say that the Irishmen who came into Pennsylvania and New York and Indiana and Illinois, and Iowa, and made the canals and railroads which have carried those States, should be prevented from becoming citizens.

And Senator MORTON of Indiana, who is now here as Chairman of the Chinese Immigration Commission, expressed his sentiments in these words:

As the naturalization laws now stand, Chinamen cannot be naturalized; but I believe the word "white" will be stricken from the naturalization laws. I believe that it will be consistent, and it will be humane, and the time is coming when it will be necessary after the adoption of this amendment for impartial suffrage to carry out that principle, and years ago that will be added [to] [illegible] against the negro nationality.

There can be no other fair interpretation given to the language of Senator MORTON than that he favored the admission of the Chinese to full citizenship by regular process of naturalization, just as the alien-born from Europe are admitted to the sacred right. And on the final vote every Republican Senator, with a single exception, voted in favor of the Chinese, and every Democratic Senator voted against their admission to citizenship.

If what we have already presented, of a Legislature, State, Congressional and National character, is not enough to demonstrate that the Democratic party oppose and the Republican party favor Chinese emigration, coolie labor, and the naturalization of the Chinese, we will add here a few extracts from the utterances of distinguished Republican leaders and the influential organs of that party to the same purpose.

Ben Wade of Ohio, ex-Senator, during his visit to California a few years ago, made a speech in which he advised our people to remove all restrictions on the Chinese laborers. He had, he said, conferred with the heads of the Six Companies in the city, and would soon thereafter offer suggestions to them and to the people East as to the best way to accomplish the immigration of Chinese, who were, he declared, the best operatives he ever saw.

While on his tour as Ambassador of the Emperor of China, ANSON BURLINGAME, in a speech in New York City, said:

I never shall there be an open ear on earth where there has been the most prosperous welcome for the past few years than in the Empire of China.

The Atlantic Monthly, in a review of the late speech of Brace, the noted Republican Chinese philanthropist of New York (who is the bitter foe of the Germans, because they dislike the arrogant Sabbath laws, and of the [illegible] general principles in relation to the Chinese), [illegible] interest-

POLITICAL PROSCRIPTION.

Under this head the Chronicle a few days ago published the following:

The Tilden clubs of Orangeburg and Barnwell counties, South Carolina, have adopted the following resolutions, which have received many compliments and indorsed by the Charleston "News and Courier" and other reputable Tilden organs:

Resolved, That we will not vote land to any Radical candidate for Governor, or for Congress, or for Senator, or for any subordinate office.

Resolved, That we will not patronize any such leader, or any member of his family, or any of his friends, or any person who votes for the present Radical Governor, or who contracts for the present year.

That we will not purchase anything any Radical leader, or any of his family, may offer for sale, or any thing any merchant, or of any business any Radical may be engaged in whatever.

That the names of such persons who may be one or more of them be furnished to this club at the early date as may be, and that a list of the same be furnished to each club in the county.

That the names of such persons or persons who shall in the opinion of this club violate the spirit of these resolutions shall become known to the public, and such resolutions shall become null and void so far as such leader or leaders, or any member of his or their families, are concerned.

And then the Chronicle asked and replied as follows:

What will candid American citizens, whether affiliating with the Democratic or the Republican party, say to this mode of political "persuasion?" Of this there are the rights of the citizen to freedom of speech and the privilege of voting for the candidate "of his choice," if the species of political terrorism is to be tolerated? Are the men who approve of such a way of conducting a campaign to be regarded as the honest friends of free popular institutions? Do they respect the individual rights of citizens and the liberty of the ballot? These inhuman resolutions would be a disgrace to the barbarous tribes of Central Africa, and a foreign correspondent cannot find a parallel for individual citizens. Persecution for honest political opinions is to be sustained by social proscription and men are to be intimidated to forego their right to exercise the franchise "under the penalty of social peace and pecuniary ruin. Wrath into wizard of the north! Is there no statesman in the land who has a hollow monkery to rise about reconciliation, a nation's healing and the Constitution's defence?

There is nothing which sooner or more effectually discovers and proves the quack or charlatan, and distinguishes him from a genuine professional, than the manner in which he receives his own advice to others, or takes for his own the dose he prescribes for another. We will make a parody of this infallible process. The originator of the kind of proscription of which the above is a feeble imitation, was ROWAN HELPER, and here is his catalogue of proscription:

Thorough organization and independent political action on the part of the non-slaveholding whites of the South.

Ineligibility of proslavery slaveholders; never an other to represent the non-slaveholding whites in the legislative or executive departments of the State.

No co-operation with proslavery; no fellowship with the slaveholding aristocracy; no affiliation with its members in proslavery parties.

No partronage to proslavery merchants; no partnership in proslavery hotels; no fees to proslavery lawyers; no employment of proslavery physicians; no audience in proslavery parsons.

No more hiring of slaves by non-slaveholders.

Prompt discontinuance of subscription to proslavery newspapers.

Now, here we have not only political but personal proscription also; and another very important thing to be considered is, that whereas no Democrat or no good citizen has yet been found—in the North at least, if even in the South—to approve, or to do otherwise than condemn the action of the Orangeburg (significant name) and Barnwell Clubs in South Carolina, to Mr. HELPER'S catalogue proscription was signed such authorities as Governor SEWARD, Senator WADE, Senator JOHN SHERMAN of Ohio, N. P. BANKS, and sixty more of the Senate and Representatives in Congress, the State Governors, and other representative men and leaders of the Republican party.

We perfectly agree with the Chronicle, and we will every good Democrat and worthy citizen, that the "political proscription" of the South Carolina Orangeburg faction is infamous and outrageous; but so proscriptional and political and religious approved, and which was more infamous, more outrageous, more infamous and wicked, and more ferocious than that in which the Chronicle is so much enraged and so very indignant. Therefore, now that it has so fully expressed its opinion of the South Carolina resolutions, let it also give its readers the benefit of its ideas as to the anti-religious, and the action of the leading Republicans who applauded the spirit while they censured the practice of that "atrocious crime against the rights of the intelligent citizen." Proscription is proscription, let who will engage in it. But we await to see whether the Chronicle so views it, and whether it is the charitan to denounce a few fanatics of the party it does not like in the South, while it has no word of censure for the great number of the most prominent leaders of its own party in the North who have accepted in the "kindred and kind spirit" of which it speaks anything that ever emanated from the Democracy of any portion of the Union. It is the Chronicle's time to show its hand. Will it do so?

The San Rafael Orphanage.

It will, we are sure, interest the public to learn that very extensive additions and alterations are being made at the San Rafael Orphan Asylum. Last year there were in the institution two hundred and ninety-nine boys, while at the most there was accommodation for two hundred and forty. This necessitated a crowding which was highly inconvenient. To remedy the defect an extension, 100 feet long and 30 wide, is being built on one of the wings of the building, and when this is completed there will be ample accommodation for all. The dining-room also is being enlarged and excavated. Besides these important changes a large balcony is being erected, running the length of the main building between the wings, with wide doors opening from the dormitories, so that in case of fire or alarm the whole house could be cleared of the inmates in very few minutes, and no danger can be apprehended on that score. The debt on the institution has been greatly reduced lately, thanks to the generosity of the public; but the alterations and improvements we have described, which were absolutely necessary for the health and comfort of the orphans, will cost about $12,000, and that, of course, will be an addition to the monetary burden. The inmates of the orphanage are in excellent health, and the institution altogether is in admirable condition.

Mass will be celebrated hereafter at 7½ o'clock every Sunday morning in Father Gleeson's church, Brooklyn.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.

The individuals who gather up our telegraphic intelligence for us and transmit it across the continent, and who are known to the world as a body corporate under the title of the Associated Press, are testing the patience and forbearance of the American public pretty severely. While professing to be impartial, to ignore all political differences, and to give the news from all quarters of the globe fairly and honestly, they are now acting as Radical propagandists, and behaving as though they were in the pay of the Republican party. They never take the trouble of telegraphing anything favorable to the Democratic party; but have to come to us by the ordinary means of communication, the mail, or else we do not get it at all; but every speech of a Republican stump orator, every rabid article in the columns of the Republican newspapers, every lie or misrepresentation coined in the East to help HAYES and WHEELER, is telegraphed hither and spread out in the pages of our daily journals. And the papers even which have no sympathy with this partisan policy, which do not believe all these slanders and inventions, have got to print them or seem to go without telegraphic intelligence.

There is not a campaign lie that ventilated about TILDEN in the East but what finds its way here as quickly as the wires can bring it, while the refutation or denial travels quite at its leisure, as if it were not at all in a hurry to reach the Pacific Coast. Our election news in the main consists in quotations from the columns of the New York Tribune, the Chicago Tribune, the New York Times, and the newspapers of their stamp, all, of course denouncing TILDEN, decrying his chance of success and abusing his supporters. The existence of Democratic journals, and how it is with the Democracy of New York and other States, seems to be altogether forgotten, and no notice is taken of what they say. If they are quoted, their opinions are simply availed of as a text for some Radical diatribe. This is plainly an imposition upon the public. What the people want in their telegraphic intelligence is a fair and tolerable summary of the ideas of the representative element of both parties, and not a one-sided and unjust report in the interest of Radicalism and in favor of HAYES and WHEELER. The time for this conduct going unnoticed is past, because all rational men have discovered the fraud, but it is still a nuisance grievous enough to call for a protest.

Rects and Public Office.

The bigoted fanatics among the Republicans, who usually manage to rule the party, try to make great capital for their cause by crying that they give their public offices to individuals that are Catholic—or "Popist," as they prefer to say—should be elected or appointed to office. It is a fair-play doctrine, and one that ought not appeal to the American people more than any other—because they are always bragging about their spirit of equal rights to all—that, if there are to be distinctions and discriminations in the appointment of public benefits (while all are made to bear the burdens of government equally) on account of condition or religious belief, the disposition should conform to the facts either of persons or votes. The Catholics are a large minority of the population, and of the whole number full 6,000,000 are Catholics. This would give them, say, at least 1,000,000 voters. Now, there in the Federal Government above 60,000 officeholders, to say nothing of the 76 Senators and 293 Representatives in Congress. A fair-play proportion of these, on the sectarian score, would give the Catholics over 10,000 of the public offices, at least 15 of the Senators, and nearly 50 of the Representatives. So ought they to have one member of the Cabinet. But what have they got instead? It is safe to say there are not 1,000 Catholics in office under the United States Government; there are three Senators who are Catholics, and less than a dozen Representatives belong to that faith. Faithful to the powerful Methodist influence President Grant is under, at home and abroad, to invariably ignore any candidate or applicant who has any of the taint as his conduct in the appointment of the Indian Commissioners demonstrated. His knows as well as any that of the Indians under the charge of the Government more than three-fourths are and have been for many years more or less believers in the Catholic religion, yet he has never appointed a Catholic on the Board of Commissioners. When Secretary Taft took possession of the War Department he dismissed from subordinate positions twenty-six Irish Catholics. And, notwithstanding the great and manifest injustice to the Irish and the Catholics, the fanatics to whom we allude clamor for still worse proscription against them, and say out that the election or appointment to office of any of that nativity or that faith is dangerous to the safety of the Government! With what grace or conscience, with all these facts plain before them, any intelligent Republican can set any Irishman or Catholic to vote that ticket, or how any of those proscribed classes can vote it, is something beyond our comprehension.

INSANIATE FOR BLOOD.

A few weeks ago in Chicago a man named HANFORD wrote a most malignant attack against the wife of a gentleman named SULLIVAN, in which he sought to impair her virtuous reputation and subject her to the popular scorn. He at first denied, but at last, when denial or concealment of the fact was no longer of avail, admitted that he was the writer of the infamous paper. Yet for refused to retract or to atone for his malicious slander of the lady. Her husband, stung to frenzy by the matter, sought HANFORD. Mrs. SULLIVAN and SULLIVAN'S own brother were with him at the time he met the maligner of his wife. The two finally came in personal contact, and after they were separated HANFORD struck Mr. SULLIVAN in the face. Fired with indignation at this violent assault upon his wife, SULLIVAN drew a pistol and shot the assailant. It proved a mortal shot, and SULLIVAN surrendered himself to the officers of the law to undergo the consequences. It happens that he and his wife are Catholics and Irish, and HANFORD was a native of New England and a Methodist, who was very active in the school question agitation in Chicago, against the Catholics particularly. At once the Republican press of Chicago and elsewhere for the head of SULLIVAN, and the Tribune and Inter Ocean, the two leading organs of that party, went to the extremity of more than counseling a vigilance organization to take the law into their own hands and hang SULLIVAN at short notice.

But better counsels prevailed, and it is one was permitted to take the due course of law. It was always believed in the Court, however, by the prosecution, in order to have the defendant tried while the popular feeling was wild and strong against him. His case was accordingly indicted and arraigned for trial. The prosecution were detected and exposed by one of the officers of the Court in the work of packing a panel out of which to pick a jury which would be sure to convict SULLIVAN, no matter what the testimony might be. Foiled in this, the public prosecutor had recourse to other improper and vindictive means to force a conviction for murder. But, not withstanding his efforts to the contrary, a fair and impartial jury, with a single exception, was at length obtained, and the case proceeded to trial. The jury were out a few minutes when it was known that they stood eleven for acquittal and one for conviction. They remained in the same opinion until they were dismissed, because they could not agree. It is also known that the stubborn juror was one of the picked men of the prosecution, who was resolved under any and all circumstances to have a victim.

And now that SULLIVAN has thus been pronounced innocent of the crime of murder, in effect, by the court and jury, the Republican papers of Chicago are trying to have the Judge before whom he was tried driven from the Bench, and the eleven jurors are vehemently denounced, while the press and people are clamorous for conviction on an innocent man is made a popular favorite by them. These papers think SULLIVAN ought to be hanged anyhow, because he is a Catholic and an Irishman, and hence they

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The great victory won over the Servians by the Turks last Sunday had the effect of stimulating Russia to energetic action. It was certainly high time to interfere. If interference was intended at all, because the Servians were completely at the mercy of their Mahometan enemies and were in no condition to continue the fighting. It must be very humiliating to Turkey to find herself brought to a standstill by a peremptory demand for an armistice of two months' duration just at the moment when she had secured a brilliant triumph and was on the point of extinguishing the rebellion against her authority. Interference by a third power is usually resorted to when neither of the contending parties is able to gain a decided advantage, and is generally based upon the humanitarian plea of a desire to put a stop to bloodshed; but it is rarely, if ever, used when one party is in a condition to force its terms upon the other and put an end to the war, because the law of nations, as universally interpreted, does not justify it under these circumstances. The usual proceeding is to wait until the terms imposed by the conqueror are made public, and then to act as prudence and humanity may dictate. Russia breaks through the general custom in this instance, and snatches from Turkey the fruits of her hard-earned victory, for the evident reason that she will not permit the Servians to be crushed under the Mahometan heel of Turkey, unless with ample guarantees for the preservation of their rights and religious liberty. Russia even goes so far in her highhanded dealing with her unseen neighbor that she actually proposes to exclude Turkey from the conference of powers at which it is designed to decide upon what conditions peace shall be restored, no longer as a European Government. This is as bad as trying and condemning an accused person in his absence and without giving him a chance to hear the evidence against him. Any fair-minded person must admit that Turkey has undoubtedly to thank England. As long as she thought there was a probability of getting up a coalition against Russia, and of gaining other people to do the fighting for her, England maintained an apparently resolute attitude, and encouraged Turkey in her opposition to Russian demands; but when she found that she could not get allies, and would have to bear the brunt of the battle herself, she quietly drew back, declared herself neutral, and left unfortunate Turkey in the hands of her deadly foe. It is the old story that England has played the same trick.

The Logic of Fanaticism.

The Chicago Tribune admits that the "American Alliance" held a National Convention in Philadelphia, and that among their proceedings was the following:

The American Alliance opposes the formation of political parties based upon religious faith, and declares that no man should be voted for because of his religion.

The American school system, as hereto fore established by the founders of the Republic, must and shall be perpetual.

The Public is the bulwark of our liberties, and it has given way to a standing among nations, and we, as a people, have become the envy of the world.

Whereas, The Roman Catholic Church, as a political power, is the open enemy of our free institutions, and is the avowed enemy of the public school system, and is the only religious organization in this country which is unfriendly to the same; therefore

Resolved, That we are opposed to the election to office of any man who is a member of the Roman Catholic Church, or who is in favor of the appointment of any member of that church to any office, civil or military, State or National.

The Tribune says that "the Alliance does not represent the Republican party," and that "it is composed largely of Democrats." But it is evident that the Democrats who have joined it have become fanatics, and have adopted the principles of the Republican party. The Alliance is the logical outcome of the teachings of the Republican party, and the Democrats who have joined it have become Republicans. The Alliance opposes the formation of political parties based upon religious faith, and declares that no man should be voted for because of his religion. Yet it declares that the American school system, as heretofore established, must and shall be perpetual. That is the foundation of the Republican party, and every man who opposes it is a traitor to the Republic. The Alliance declares that the Public is the bulwark of our liberties, and it has given way to a standing among nations, and we, as a people, have become the envy of the world. That is the Republican idea of liberty. The Alliance declares that the Roman Catholic Church, as a political power, is the open enemy of our free institutions, and is the avowed enemy of the public school system, and is the only religious organization in this country which is unfriendly to the same. That is the Republican idea of liberty. The Alliance declares that no man should be voted for because of his religion. That is the Republican idea of liberty. The Alliance declares that the American school system, as heretofore established, must and shall be perpetual. That is the Republican idea of liberty. The Alliance declares that the Public is the bulwark of our liberties, and it has given way to a standing among nations, and we, as a people, have become the envy of the world. That is the Republican idea of liberty. The Alliance declares that the Roman Catholic Church, as a political power, is the open enemy of our free institutions, and is the avowed enemy of the public school system, and is the only religious organization in this country which is unfriendly to the same; therefore

Resolved, That we are opposed to the election to office of any man who is a member of the Roman Catholic Church, or who is in favor of the appointment of any member of that church to any office, civil or military, State or National.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

As they are well aware that the solution of the Chinese Immigration and Coolie Labor question is one of the most important —if, indeed, it is not the one of paramount interest to the working classes—on this coast, and to all in its broad bearings, the Republicans are now endeavoring not only to prove upon it a clear record for themselves, but also to show that it is the Democratic party which has not a good record on it. A few extracts from the platforms from the acts and utterances of the Democratic party and its representatives and leaders, and from the leaders and representative men also of the Republican party, or the party in opposition to the Democracy, will suffice to convince the reader that the Democratic party has alone and exclusively a fair or sound record on this vital and foremost question of the campaign—so far as California and this whole coast is involved —and that the Republican party is in accord with those who would invite and welcome Chinese immigration and extend to the Coolies the franchise of suffrage.

In his speech in Platt's Hall, in this city, the chief Republican mouthpiece of the campaign excitingly referred to the action of the Democratic Legislature of 1852, in which it was proposed to introduce Chinese labor in this State on account of its cheapness. He did not mention the fact that that Legislature was composed of a round number of Whigs as well as Democrats, and that the Chairman of the Committee which reported favorably on the proposition, R. N. Woon, was a Whig. But he was compelled to admit that it was at last a Democratic authority which decided it. But there are other facts in connection with the legislation of that day which are of no less importance to a true understanding of the whole subject. Mr. FITCH was very careful not to refer to it. In the first place, the bill contained nothing—nor for specific stated purposes—looking to the cultivation of rice, as it must be known to all that day it was not a staple agricultural State; and, besides, the conspicuous problem was then a new issue to the whole Coast people—a problem yet to be solved. We then got our broadminded views and ideas of the Pacific Slope; gold mining was the great interest of California, laboring hands were scarce, and daily wages so high that the tillage of the soil was almost, if not actually, impracticable, except for vegetables and fruits, which commanded extravagant prices. Nor could white labor be utilized in cultivating rice, mining silk, or planting tea"—pursuits in which the Chinese are adapted to and are skilled in. Even to this day, no portion of the world, can white men equal the coolies in the cultivation of tea or rice, or in the silk cultures. Then, as it is easy to see, the bill of 1852 was in no sense of a character to interfere with or affect white labor on the coast, or to reduce the wages of the kind of labor then white men performed.

But we shall now go on to show that not only did not the Democratic party favor Chinese immigration and labor, but that it was the party which opposed both, and that the party in opposition to it was responsible for the further influx of Chinese to this point after 1853. In that year the Democratic Legislature passed a bill by which Chinese were compelled to pay a license of $1 per month to work in the mines. It was intended to exclude them from the mines altogether, while foreigners from every European nation or from any of the ocean islands, or colonies of every European power were allowed to mine on equal footing with native born citizens. Again, in 1855, the Democratic Legislature passed a bill by which a head tax of $50 was imposed on every Chinaman who came into this State. This Act and the one passed in 1852 had the effect to materially decrease the influx of Chinese. But in 1856 the Know-Nothing Legislature repealed the Acts of 1852 and 1855, and the effect of that repeal was soon made apparent. The Chinese merchants and those in favor of Chinese immigration and coolie labor had thousands of copies of the Repealing Act printed in the Chinese language and circulated in China, and in a few months commenced that numerous immigration of Chinese which has ever since continued under anti-Democratic and Republican legislation, State and national, with such potential adjuncts as the BURLINGAME treaty and the naturalization of Chinese in Republican States, and the favorable consideration of Chinese citizenship by the Republicans in Congress.

And now we will proceed to show the character of the Republican and sympathy in behalf of the Chinese by the leading Republican statesmen in Congress, February 8, 1869. During a debate on the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, an amendment to it was offered in the United States Senate, as follows:

Provided, That no State shall exclude any native born Chinaman, not taxed or untaxed, from the right to vote.

The debate on this amendment was protracted, and the Democrats and Republicans took a strong stand upon it—the latter in opposition to it. Senator YATES of Illinois (Rep.) said:

I wish to inform the Senator [Doolittle] that it would have no one the next day, by a vote of seventy-five to seventeen, we have declared that there shall be no distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, excepting as proposed in the law, or from whatever right it is saying that the party is committed to universal suffrage, pure and simple.

Senator CAMERON of Pennsylvania (Rep.) declared himself thus:

I am in favor of the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, because I believe the vote of every every body—the negro, Irishman, Scotchman, Englishman and Chinaman. We might limit as well say that the Irishman who comes into Pennsylvania and New York and Indiana and Illinois, and Iowa, and Minnesota, and makes the canals and railroads which have carried those States, should be prevented from becoming citizens.

And Senator MORTON of Indiana, who is now here as Chairman of the Chinese Immigration Commission, expressed his sentiments in these words:

As the naturalization laws now stand, Chinamen cannot be naturalized; but I believe the word "white" will be stricken from the naturalization laws; I believe that it will be consistent, and it will be harmonious with the condition of things that will be produced by the adoption of the amendment for imperial and I think that the word "white" shall be stricken from our naturalization laws.

There can be no other fair interpretation given to the language of Senator MORTON than that he favored the admission of the Chinese to citizenship by regular process of naturalization, just as the subjects from Europe are admitted to the sacred right. And on the final vote every Republican Senator, with a single exception, voted in favor of the amendment, and every Democratic Senator voted against their admission to citizenship.

If what we have already presented, of a Legislature, State, Congressional and National character, is not sufficient to demonstrate that the Democratic party oppose and the Republican party favor Chinese emigration, coolie labor and the naturalization of the Chinese, we will add here a few extracts from the utterances of distinguished Republican leaders and the influential organs of that party to the same purpose.

Ben Wade of Ohio, ex Senator, during his visit to California a few years ago, made a speech in which he advised our people to remove all restrictions on the Chinese laborers. He had, he said, conferred with the heads of the Six Companies of this city and would soon thereafter offer suggestions to them and to the people East as to the best way to encourage the emigration of Chinese, who were, he declared, the best operatives he ever saw.

While on his tour as Ambassador of the Emperor of China, ANSON BURLINGAME, in a speech in New York, said:

I never that there is no spot on earth where there has been greater progress made within the past few years than in the Empire of China.

The Atlantic Monthly, in a review of the "Chinese War," of Bruce, the noted Republican Chinese philanthropist of New York, (who is the bitter foe of the Germans, because they dislike the stringent Sabbath laws, and of the general public plan) in relation to the Chinese:

In account of the Chinese is peculiarly interesting at the present time, as in the not distant future it will be one of the first questions that will engage the attention of our statesmen. Many of the Chinese are already to be found in the Pacific States, and the tendency is for them to increase in large numbers. The good-will of the Chinese Government in regard to the Chinese, and it is, of course, the wisest policy to treat them with the same.

The Chronicle is now much enraged and so very indignant. Therefore, now that it has so flagrantly exposed its opinion of the South Carolina resolutions, let it now speak to the readers the benefit of its ideas as to the HAYES-TILDEN colloquy, and the action of the leading Republicans who applauded the spirit while they concealed the practice of that "fraudulent proceeding against the rights of the individual citizen." Proscription is proscription, let who will engage in it. But we await to see how the Chronicle will view it, and whether it is the charitable to denounce a few fanatics of the party it does not like in the South, while it has no word of censure for the great number of the most prominent leaders of the party in the North who have exceeded in the "wicked and hateful spirit" of which it speaks anything that ever emanated from the Democracy of any portion of the Union. Perhaps the Chronicle's time to show its hand. Will it do so?

The San Rafael Orphanage.

It will, we are sure, interest the public to learn that very extensive additions and alterations are being made at the San Rafael Orphan Asylum. Last year there were in the institution two hundred and ninety-one boys, while at the most there was accommodation for two hundred and forty. This necessitated a crowding which was highly unadvisable. To remedy the defect an extension, 100 feet long and 36 wide, is being made to one of the wings of the building, and when this is completed there will be ample accommodation for all. The dining-room also is being enlarged and renovated. Besides these important changes a large balcony is being erected, running the length of the main building between the wings, with wide doors opening from the dormitories, so that in case of fire or alarm the whole house could be cleared of its inmates in a very few minutes, and no danger can be apprehended on that score. The debt on the institution has been greatly reduced lately, thanks to the generosity of the public but the alterations and improvements we have described, which were absolutely necessary for the health and comfort of the orphans, will cost about $18,000, and that, of course, will be an addition to the monetary burden. The inmates of the orphanage are in excellent health, and the institution altogether is in admirable condition.

Mass will be celebrated hereafter at 7½ o'clock every Sunday morning in Father Gleeson's church, Brooklyn.

POLITICAL PROSCRIPTION.

Under this head the Chronicle a few days ago published the following:

The Tilden clubs of Orangeburg and Barnwell counties, South Carolina, have adopted the following resolution, which have received much publicity, and are indorsed by the Charleston "News and Courier" as a reasonable Tilden rule:

Resolved, That we will not rent land to any Radical or vote for any Radical, or buy anything from any Radical merchant, or give employment to any such Radical, and will not associate with any such leader, or employ any such leader, or speak to any such leader, or have any social, farm or business intercourse with any such leader, or contribute for the present year one cent.

That we will not purchase or rent any farm from any leader, or any of his family, may offer for sale, or any land any such leader, or any member of his family may be negotiating unknown.

That the names of such persons who may be considered leaders be furnished to club club at the earliest date, and that a list of the names be furnished to each member of the club.

That any member of any person or persons who shall be considered a leader who shall violate any of this rule shall cease at once to be a member of the club, and shall not hold so far as such leader or leaders, or any member of his or their families, are concerned.

And then the Chronicle asked and it is asked as follows:

What will readers American citizens, whether affiliating with the Democratic or Republican party, say to this mode of political proscription? Do not these rules set the rights of the political to freedom of speech and the privileges of voting for the candidates of their choice, if that speech or political action displeases? Are the men who approve of such and of conducting a campaign to be regarded as the truest friends of free popular institutions? Do the people uphold the individual rights of citizens and the freedom of the ballot? These inflammatory resolutions to the parties, the native prejudices and the passions of the people, and a ferocious crusade against the rights of the individual citizen. Such proscription is not to be tolerated in this country, and we are to be intimidated by the fear of losing our business, or the privilege of purchasing from such merchants, or those engaged in such business. It is a cowardly threat, and one which we trust will be condemned by every honest man, and more so

AN ANCIENT IRISH POEM.

NEW FIRST REGULATOR BY T. C. A.

The following story was composed in 1851 by Phillip O'Sullivan, professor of « The Catholic History of Ireland," 1651—1850), in Lisle, on the death of his parents:

Yet those we love in their last sleep are borne,
Their memory sample the frequent tear;
Mine the sad lot my parents both to mourn,
Brothers by every tie of friendship dear,
Through Time a long correlcave the plaintive tone
Of mute's bereavement mingles with my own.

The lamentation of Achilles bravo
By Priam' tomb Homerio verse has sung;
Sirens, swelling at the beagey grave,
Bonne that himself from Jove immortal sprung;
The mourning mother Hector dead bemoan—
His wife his virtue'sMemorm with her groans.

Beside his father's eyre, with modest grace,
Julius, the first to war, by sisters wins,
Soon was the blushless sorrows of their race,
Her chaips as great a glory as disguise;
Camillus exiled in long his brother's doom—
The widow Cecil by his young widow's tomb.

Mid sylvine glades, in melancholy mood,
Statius exhalmed in verse his parent-zeal;
With Pastoral lorch the Roman consul stood,
And told the world what his great sire had done—
Mine blindfold, sister, brother, all might claim
The well-earned laurels heaped upon their name.

But if so may aught of human prize
May seem for as of lowly faith avail,
Where love or even wonts plead for all men died,
To me first parents trusted in Holy Writ.
Our mee corpmorous with its mortal breath,
Restored in life in me through his death.

Maddox passing with the stars world mate
His soul; my Simon, priest of Macedoine!
His teaching Isaiah! Gregory the Greek,
Who sadly bore with noble dead ostion,
His pious pridge to his father's manes,
Or his magnet brother, still remains.

When solvion fate St. Ambrose brother bereaved,
His compel in fraternal sorrow share;
Augustine tells us how his eyes were bleared
For Monica Severi, as pure as fair;
From pagis moved to habitant thomas
How sparkling Nebridius heard and paid.

But why should I such instances relate?
To: masonly this is by and though in one pot;
What! should I mention Jerome's bitter fate
Those sad sense prostrate memories to dwell;
The dying sense to sadnesse chills in tears;
I chant the dirge of all that I loved best.

Of sevenfold pledges to their wedded life,
But four my parents' sable lived to share;
When Heaven felt their relief prolonged the strife
Three sons inclosed in Tyrconnel's sure.
The wintry sons are back to heaven born;
Kind friends, mourn not for me to share;

Another parent, famed the world around,
Lored Campo Santo, trained my writing mind,
Bisset, than whom no sot nior more profound,
In Logic, no casuists, ever kind,
Taught me life rules, which severe a precious boon:
Alas! a friend in power is seldom true.

Nor must Yes dear them, with stable skill,
Unfolded all that science had in toil;
That sweet theologian, famed Merrill,
Taught me philosophy, to leave as well.
My manhood proven, I pledged my angel to Spain,
And served in monarch's both on land and main.

Two sons of arms, the fervor in his blood,
My brother Daniel charmed from learned pursuits,
He's joined the fleet, which, towering o'er the flood,
The memory to storm and war disputes.
Swept through the billowy seas with sails wide spread,
Crossing the hostile squadrons 'neath its tread.

I in battle with the Turks, at fortune turned,
A ball like that from heaven sped,
His opinions spirit to the God——

His lifeless form the ocean discovered not.
The mournful search and fear of war the probe,
In youth's first bloom, in all its fragrance, died.

Not Hector's self was more robust in form,
Nor Paris his intrepid breast could daunt;
He scaled the lofty deck, he led the storm,
Glad to achieve, but all too proud to vaunt.
If those we die for duty never die,
As Plutarch says, he lives and lives on high.

If virtue was mine, to love the Muse above,
Time to devote to Heaven a watery sea,
My fair speech, of some truth, devout,
With her life had some promise, soon withered.

Of ancient sires, from many a noble line,
Collateral of honour, noble prizes of Rome,
His mother of that well-known: Geraldine,
Hence, my father of the great Kinsdom,
Alone, or with other chiefs recovered in war,
One father triumphed both on sea and shore.

On many a well-contested field of fame,
Where blood flowed free to loose the tyrant's hold,
Where Ireland's sword Saxon wrenched his name,
Which O'Sullivan! The prompt and bold,
His country's cause with Desmond long sustained,
Nor left his own great chief while hope remained.

The shores of Shannon gazed with pleased amazement
As on he hastened down its course to save
Its little republic, of their echoes tired.
When twice or even wanes passed, on the night
Leaving the walls of Temple, his troops rested,
He stormed the city, nor refused the spoil.

The exulting Saxon where Connaught's bonnes fought
Had to the Pale of yore, in hour of fear,
Subdued his triumph, and too dearly bought
The bliss Loughlyhyle; where, to his country's cause,
The sons of Niall their prowess birthright said
To whom Ireland's hopes her head had paid.

At last he did for prince I need not tell,
Much is recorded on the historic page.
Whatever life to do, he did it well,
From early manhood to extreme old age.
His hundred years on earth in honor clone,
And wretched misery sought in me vain.

The exiled Gaelicans on Dalkey's shore,
Received his boon that pious hands bear,
But who the Christ his sacred answer were,
Surely, his in Moore, from the opposite,
Both may reserve the body it has given,
His imployed trust on earth, his dust in heaven.

Thus ran died, too, my father's life, what pain,
Too, too, were of the noblest, here-born,
Deadlift the brother, relative and of friends,
His mother and close sisters and the hope fathers!
Donald and Margaret of Dunmoyle line,
Two friend not mentored your parents, as I mine.

We laid her gently by our father's side,
The worthy wife of one both great and good,
Wellesley's own glory, manhood's noblest pride,
The sheltering power of numerous womanhood.
With them we buried all we knew of home,
Hearth, love, or comfort, all that life had given.

Parents and brothers are beneath the sod,
My sister Leonora lies first on!
She early gave her blameless youth to God,
Heaven's calming rest by pious saints wept!
Alone survivors of a happy host,
Our children's misery to mourn the last.

But what can profit it to sigh or mourn?
Years since those we loved again reveal;
Inscrutable Death empires on bourne,
For Hope is purple, for the banished Shall!
Our arms bury life golden fast away,
A power awaits in an silent course to stay,

Time does he pause for by on rapid wing,
Old men and youth yield to the dorm scattered,
That he supreme's to sentence terror bring!
Let us, or most it by our fifth sentenced,
Remember that in mystic realms are shared
By those who — shared in not unprepared.

Perhaps [illegible] the memories may move
Those [illegible] that we cherished here!

Our Public Schools.

[From the Indianapolis (Ind.) Herald.]

While the political issues of the day are agitating America to its very foundation, and while the rival parties are talking loss and taxes, and free blood and anti-free school discussions going on, let us for a moment see what the free schools have done for the Irish people in particular and for mankind in general. It is a historical fact that from the invasion of Cromwell into Ireland education has been on the wane. Prior to that date no people were more enlightened than the Irish. The rulers, prelates and knights were men of the most profound learning, and, to secure a classical as well as ornamental education, the youth of Ireland were sent to France, as that a more elegant people never had existence in the old land than her very own nobility. When the stern Puritan invaded the Emerald Isle, exiles were declared, the nobility were butchered, the karns captured and enslaved, and the lands given to the masters. Many poor, miserable, illiterate families of to-day can trace back their genealogy until it brings up at the lodge of some great old Irish prince, or noble of less degree, and although the exiled may possess as much possessions on the part of his wood-sawyer or laundress, yet it is a blister, bluer fact that the ancestor of that poor, degraded beggar was derived from a kingly root. Education, music, poetry, painting and war were the the arts of Ireland before the Saxon yoke throttled the life out of her nobility. Every prince had his bards, artists and scholars. Every knight was a warrior, and every warrior a defender of the true faith (Catholic), shedding his blood in the cause of Christ and liege loyal to the Virgin Mary. Science was the minister of comforts, and genius wrabbed rank had a seat at every royal board. Hospitality was the god of the stranger, and love ruled the land of the Red Hand and his peers.

This was Ireland before the chains of British tyranny were forged upon her shrinking limbs—before the curse of foreign ignorance and Protestant Parliament stripped her of all she held dear—education, liberty of thought and speech even the right to worship as she saw fit. Oh ye preachers of Roman Catholic tyranny! when you read the history of Ireland you have yo compounded the just Protestant, Cobbett, say, a hundred other impartial historians, through the mists of the bitter oppressions, bloody wars, that mark the progress of English rule, how can you our country? What did that beautiful Great Britain do for us? Lisson. She deprived us of the right of worship and drove us to the mountains of Connaught, that we might seal our prayers to Heaven, and the slaw our priests on their altars, and seat our women, med and dishonored, through the privileges of the Saxon. What more, she robbed us of our land, our chattels, our homes, our lives, but not our souls. This was the work she had to accomplish, yet she tried her best to do so.

At last, after centuries of misery and oppression, the system of government schools was adopted. Ireland by stalwarting in harmony and superstition. Her priests could not help this state of affairs, because it was a penal offense for them to officiate at the altar of Almighty God; hence the utter benightedness of poor Ireland. The priesthood took their flocks, and never knows one letter Catholic children. This was the condition of affairs when the free schools were established. Now, what do we hear the Premier of England disclosing the same tune, and declaring that so widespread and powerful had the secret schools become that they were able to circumvent and overthrow the united diplomacy of Europe. The statement was made before those of them which have their headquarters at St. Petersburg, Berlin, Vienna, Pesth and Bucharest—have been confounding their work in Bulgaria for some years; and it was they who fomented the insurrection there and in Herzegovina; while no doubt it was they who induced Servia and Montenegro to declare war.

Now, come touch of nature makes the whole world kin," says Shakespeare, and according to observe how the institute of all the foes of the Church have led them, everywhere, to give the schemes of them revolutionaries their active support, while, on the other hand, the friends of the Church have been the ones to establish them in every town see through these designs. The Freemasons have been prominent in the affairs of Wales and all his brothers are Freemasons, and he may have thought it probable that the Irish would not deal with him, as the inimate action of the English Government may have been suspected, and hence his "dismembling Lappeend," said he, "which was not expected; Servia declared war on Turkey. In the attempt to conduct the government of the Irish schools there are elements to be considered which our gods cousins had not to deal with. We have not only to deal with paupers and prisons and ministers—those societies are an element we can take into consideration; but there is the last moment may baffle all your arrangements, which, have such reckless agents, which consciences accommodation, and which, if necessary, can produce any measure. There was an end, of course, of all our negotiations." The world may now believe what it has been told before and by a high authority.

The Story that the N. Y. Evening Post Set Afloat about the Syndicate.

WASHINGTON, October 19.—The most transparent of all the Republican election roorbacks was the story telegraphed from here to day about the payments have informed the Secretary of the Treasury that they would discontinue operations until after the election, and, if Tilden was elected, until his financial policy was made known. It would not be possible for the Father of Lies himself to concoct a greater falsehood than this story, which the correspondent of the New York Evening Post telegraphed from Washington this afternoon. In the first place, the Syndicate have bound themselves to take so many bonds within a specified time, and they have not the option to discontinue for a time. They can probably refuse to take more bonds than their contract calls for, but they are bound to take that amount, and pay for them, and it is not likely that they are going to hold them for any length of time. Moreover, they have just received a large quantity, and they certainly are not such fools as to deliberately break down the market.

There is a reason, however, to believe that the Secretary of the Treasury was cognizant of the selling afloat of this canard by the correspondent of the Evening Post, because he had a long interview with that correspondent to-day. It is be true that Secretary Morrill was a party to the story, he should be held to a strict accountability, because it is a direct effort to break down the market and thus injure the Syndicate. The European bankers who are engaged in negotiating our four and a half per cent. loan are not politicians, and will not relish such treatment from the financial officer of the American Government.

At the meeting of the Cork Harbor Commissioners, last week, a memorial was received from seventy-one of the Queenstown pilots, asking for £200 out of the funds belonging to them in the hands of the Board, their object being to give the amount as a contribution to the Queenstown cathedral. The whole number of pilots interested in the fund is ninety-five. Father Ashlin, who was present, stated that the request was purely spontaneous, and that the pilots were anxious to make the contribution larger, but that he considered £200 sufficient. The matter was referred to the Piles Committee, as the trustees of the fund.

The store and county Inspector's offices connected with the Union quay constabulary depot, Cork, have been destroyed by fire. They were burning from half-past three o'clock till about half past five o'clock, and a large portion of the contents of the buildings were consumed.

KILDARE COUNTY.

The beautiful demesne of Birr Castle, which for years has been thrown open to the inhabitants on each evening, has been ordered by the Earl of Rosse to be closed on Sundays. The misconduct of some visitors is said to be the cause of an act which deprives the people of Birr of a great boon. It is said a deputation will wait on Lord Rosse, asking him to reconsider his decision.

LONGFORD.

A rather curious and interesting marriage, says the Freeman, took place during the past week in the village of Lanesboro', situated on the banks of the Shannon, the united ages of the happy pair forming an aggregate of 144 years, Thomas Corcoran (the groom) being 70, and Mary McNally (the blushing bride) 74 years of age. The interesting ceremony was witnessed by a large concourse of the villagers, who wished every joy to the happy pair.

LIMERICK.

The Limerick Town Council received last week an invitation from the Central Tenants' Defence Association to send a representative to the conference on the land question in Dublin on the 23d inst. The mayor was requested to go, but his worship declined the duty on the ground that he did not wish to mix in politics. Mr. Cronin was next invited to represent the city on the occasion, but he also made excuses, and finally the matter was allowed to drop.

LONDONDERRY.

The clerk of the Coleraine Town Commissioners has received a letter from Sir Michael Hicks Beach in reference to a memorial forwarded by that body to him, asking a loan of £60,000 from the Government, to enable them to complete the navigation of the river Bann from Coleraine to the sea, to which object the Honorable Irish Society, London, have granted a sum of £1,000 yearly for twenty five years. Sir Michael Hicks Beach, writing from Williamstrip Park, Gloucester, expresses regret that his absence from Ireland prevents him receiving a deputation on the subject at present, but states that he hopes to be able to do so early in November, and will communicate with him again, when he can fix a day for that purpose.

LOUTH.

At the meeting of the Dundalk Board of Guardians a circular was read from the Secretary of the Central Tenants' Defence Association, requesting the Board to send a deputation to represent them at the Land Conference to be held in the Rotundo on the 23d and 24th inst. The chairman initialed the document, and no further notice was taken of it.

MAYO.

At the courthouse, Castlebar, the interest in the farm of Lakefield, the property of Norman Bole, Esq., solicitor, containing forty Irish acres prime pasture land, together with dwelling house, out-offices and garden, was sold, after a spirited competition, to Henry Brewster, Esq., Castlebar, for £800. The entire property was held under lease for two lives and thirty-seven years since, at the low head rent of £23 per annum and £3 drainage charge.

The readers of the Connaught Telegraph, says a correspondent of that journal, will doubtless recollect reading in its pages, some two or three months ago, the joyful intelligence that Claremount—that once great stronghold of Protestantism—had been purchased by his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, mainly through the instrumentality of his nephew, Rev. R. MacHale, F.P., Claremorris, with a view of converting it into a nunnery. For the purpose of soliciting subscriptions for the above object a large and respectable meeting of the town was held on Sunday last in the male National School. Mr. Barrett, manager of the National Bank, occupied the chair. Our deservedly popular and respected townsman, P. W. Raftery, ever foremost in any good cause at all, with his characteristic liberality, led the van with his very fine subscription of £50. Too extensive a one, was I am happy to say, followed, and at the conclusion of the meeting the aggregate donations amounted to nearly £600. I have heard that Mrs. B. Burke, Ardroe, has given the munificent sum of £100 towards the same object.

MONAGHAN.

On Sunday, at 11 o'clock, the foundation stone of the new church of St. Joseph was laid at Knocknatallon. His Lordship the Most Rev. Dr. Donnelly performed the ceremony of laying the stone, after which High Mass was celebrated. Rev. William Portmore, S. J., preached an eloquent sermon, at the conclusion of which a collection was taken up, and the very handsome sum of £402 was subscribed.

The quarterly meeting of the committee of the Fenagy Tenants' Defence Association was held on Tuesday last, Canon Hoey, Vice-President, in the chair. After disposing of matters of a formal nature the secretary read a communication from the Central Tenants' Defence Association, requesting the attendance of this branch at the Land Conference, to be held in the Rotundo, Dublin, on the 23d and the 24th insts. Canon Hoey, Rev. Father Bartley, Mr. Phelan and Mr. Overend were deputed to attend.

QUEEN'S COUNTY.

On the arrival at Maryborough, one evening last week, of the 7:15 train from Dublin, Mr. Obbins, an extensive cattle owner, reported to the station-master that, when the train had gone something between half and three-quarters of a mile from the the Portarlington station, a respectable young man who was in the carriage with him, and quite sober, asked if that was the right train for Athlone, but being told that it was not, that was going to Maryborough, he suddenly opened the carriage door (an act which he was doing), and jumped out into the darkness of the night. The horror-stricken passengers in the compartment at once rushed to the windows, but could not ascertain his fate, or see anything save what appeared to be a high slope of the railway going downwards. The station-master at once telegraphed the affair back to Portarlington, but, singular to say, the young man was comparatively uninjured after his rash jump, and able to proceed on the next train for Athlone.

SLIGO.

An election of Conservators for the Sligo district was held in the Record Court, Town Hall, last week, in compliance with the order of the Inspector of Irish Fisheries. There was a small attendance. Francis W. Shaw, Esq., of Mountshannon, was moved to the chair. The following gentlemen were proposed by Mr. Hepburn, and seconded by Mr. Petrie, to act as conservators during the year: For A District—Henry W. Gore Booth, J. P.; William Pollock, Esq. For B District—D. L'Estrange, J.P.; Mr. Moore, Mr. Hepburn, Mr. C. O'Brien. For C District—Thomas M. Wood, Esq.; Mr. Sim, Mr. Petrie, Jr.; Mr. Kerrigan. For D District—Manley M. Palmer, J. P.; Captain Wood Martin, R. St. G. Robinson, J.P., and M. Shaw.

WATERFORD.

A resolution was passed on Monday at the annual conference of the South of Ireland Temperance League in Waterford, calling on the local magistrates to refuse the granting of new licences and transfers of licenses to publicans.

A special meeting of the Dungarvan Total Abstinence Association was held in the Town Hall a few days ago, for the purpose of hearing an address from the Very Rev. Dr. Cleary, P.P., who has consented to use his influence as parish priest towards the society. The hall was crowded to overflowing. On the very reverend gentleman entering he was greeted by a perfect storm of applause.

WEXFORD.

At a meeting, last week, of the Oulart dispensary district, held in the dispensary house, Ballaghkeen, for the purpose of electing a medical officer in the room of Dr. Mahan, resigned, Dr. Robert D. Kenny was elected, without opposition, medical officer to that dispensary, and also as the attendant to the fever hospital, subject to the approval of the Enniscorthy Board of Guardians.

At the weekly meeting of the New Ross Town Commissioners, held at the Town Hall on Thursday for the purpose of transacting ordinary business, electing a commissioner to supply a vacancy, and making arrangements for the forthcoming municipal election, Mr. Kelly proposed and Mr. Magee seconded the election of W. John Williams, which was passed unanimously.

WESTMEATH.

On Sunday, the 1st inst., the Right Rev. Dr. Nulty, Lord Bishop of Meath, held his visitation in the parish church of Delvin. There were between three and four hundred children and a few adults confirmed. The Bishop expressed himself highly pleased with the answering of the children in the catechism, and awarded to the teachers and the priests of the parish the highest praise.

Conway, of the diocese of Baltimore, and Edward Wm. Dullea, of the diocese of Brooklyn. On the following morning the same praise conferred sub-deaconship upon Messrs. Anthony Farley and James P. McCafferty, and promoted Rev. John J. Conway to the diaconate.

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has sent down a rescript in the case of the Chelsea National Bank vs. Richmond. The was a suit to recover on on a note for $1000, made by Lorius W. Pond, of Worcester. It appears that in August, 1875, Pond applied to the defendant to indorse the note, being a note for $500, and the defendant indorsed it for Pond's accommodation. Pond thereupon, by the use of chemicals, rendered invisible the words "five hundred" and the figures "500," and wrote over them the words "two thousand," and the figures "2000." Pond then procured the plaintiff bank, in the ordinary course of business, to discount the note, and the bank did so, being entirely innocent of the fraud. Before the note became due Pond was arrested and imprisoned for a large number of similar transactions. The plaintiff bank, after the maturity of the note, applied to the writing which set forth the amount for which the note was given a solution of aqua regalis, and this application revealed that the change had been made from $500 to $2000 The defendant was present and did not object when the aqua regalis was applied. The note was demanded and protested as a note for $500 and for $2,000, and the defendant was duly notified as an indorser by two notices, one treating the note as $500 and another as a note for $2,000.

The case was tried in the Superior Court for Worcester county, and the court ruled that the plaintiff could not recover, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions. The Supreme Court has given judgment for the defendant, holding that "the defendant never made the note for $2,000, which was the only one that the plaintiff accepted."

An Unanswerable Argument.

The strongest argument which can be urged against the advisability of establishing such stores of the nerve destroying poisons as opium and quinine for intermittent and remittent fevers is the vastly superior success in the preventive and cure of such diseases of a medicine which is the very antipode of the above named drugs, both in respect of its composition and the results wrought by it. Such a medicine is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a purely vegetable preparation, which not only overcomes with wonderful promptness every form of fever and ague, and kindred types of malarious ease, from its system, but is a certain preventive of all malarious troubles when taken as tonic and safeguard against miasmatic atmospheres. Dyspepsia, constipation, rheumatism, kidney complaint and debility also suffer with certainty, and their continued use in this connection is highly pernicious to the system. The Bitters, on the contrary, not only afford speedy relief, but establish health on a permanent basis.

Irish talent is making itself felt in Brussels. It is mentioned that two new songs, which are highly spoken of, have recently been published by M. Kuito, Galerie du Roi: "Si j'etais-petit oiseau," by Miss Augusta O'Brien, and "L'invocation a Dieu," by her sister, Miss Lavinia O'Brien. It may be added that a short time ago another member of the same family, Miss Josete O'Brien, distinguished herself by the well-known composition, "L'Hirondelle du Troubadour." The editor of the Belgian News says that the works of the younger branches of the O'Brien family are "worthy of the standard musical reputation of the land of their birth, the country of Hells and Arthur Sullivan."

DEAR SIR: It may be some satisfaction to you to be informed of the result of the trial of the Peruvian Syrup in my family. My daughter was brought low by a typhoid fever last spring, and after the fever left her the continued very weak, and the simplest food distressed her. For months she remained in the same debilitated condition; but from the first of September last, when she commenced taking the Syrup, the digestive functions improved, and she steadily gained strength and vitality; and now, after taking two bottles she is restored to a good state of health; indeed, she appears more really healthy than she has for several years past. I am of opinion that the Peruvian Syrup is the best tonic that I have ever known, and as a physician I should not know what to other give to anyone could have of—relief. Yours truly, S. COBB.

A Drowning Man will Catch at a Straw.

If he catch it, it will do him no good. Thousands of people, who have neglected colds and coughs until they have become dangerous, will read for almost every specimen for relief. This is why so many experiments are tried by the sufferers. Do not waste your time and money in this way. Take Wild Cherry, and use it with confidence. It has brought to many, and ultimately cure. It is no novelty, it is a well tried, and should be in all be tested. Sold by all druggists.

WHAT IS GOD?

When King Hiero asked the philosopher Simonides what he thought of God, the latter required a day to think upon the subject. When the day assigned thereunto was repeated, and the philosopher asked for two days more, and as the end of these he asked for another day. The King asked why he so often withdrew in this way, and the wise philosopher answered: Verily, the more I think on the nature of God, the less I know about Him."

Oh! thou sublime and glorious God,
Author of all, oh! what art Thou?
Within, invisible at Thy nod
And millions at thy footstool bow.

Kingdoms and empires are dear to thee;
A thousand thrones before Thee fall;
Pow'rs, Thy might and majesty,
Thou reignest sovereign o'er them all.

In each and everything thou art
The source center and the soul
Of the whole universal heart,
The hub of the beauteous system roll.

We kneel astonished at Thy power,
When gazing on the sky at night,
We think Thee in a fly or flower,
Ask the glittering globes of night.

Who buy Thee in the awful heat,
Arches Thee in the brilliant bow;
The chaos speaks of Thee, where, rare
Up mists, its boiling silicon flow.

We find Thee in the silver sand,
Chalky in lime, but sodden mud;
With reason asks without control,
Of man how monarch of the mind.

The human soul! how strange it seems,
With angel natures highly blessed;
Yet a vain world of useless dreams,
And knows no peace, that knows no rest.

Reason in ruins! What! convulse
A simple skeleton as the mind!
Call the disease of the pulse
Of that which implied our search can find?

Philosophy becomes a fool
When grasping at a thought so high;
Less than an virgin of the school
Is that which teaches how to die.

Oh, philosophy a'n't teach
What Christ delights with the mind!
Unsophisticate proudly preach
How soul with curious is combined.

With Thee, O God! the secret lies;
As well might man attempt to go
To the recesses of the skies
As measure to know.

Business the Pope on Politics.

Some weeks ago the Holy Father gave audience to a distinguished Belgian gentleman with whom he was well acquainted. During the course of their conversation, the question of the legitimacy of governments, and the general opinion formed thereon by the majority of Catholics, were discussed. The Belgian gentleman having stated his views in this connection, the Holy Father, in his usual benignant and affable manner, made the following remarks:

"I am happy that on this occasion an opportunity is afforded to me to explain to you upon this theme the opinion of the Holy See. It is the wish of the Holy See that the governors of all nations should sincerely believe themselves installed by the will of Almighty God into their position of high authority. The Holy See has never framed a dogma upon the subject of legitimacy. The Holy See desires all nations to submit at all times to the dictates of the secular laws of their respective governments, provided their conscience and religious convictions should approve of the same, and urges non-obedience to authorities. The Holy See does not extend any preference to any particular form of government. It rests content so long as religious education is imparted to the children, where no attempts are made in abolishing the holy sacraments, where no interference in dogmatical matters are caused; it desires that the rights of the Church be respected, and ecclesiastical authority be supported, in order to stimulate and strengthen in the hearts of men a veneration of Almighty God.

"Regents as well as Presidents of republics can bring this to pass; it is therefore upon these grounds that the Holy See continued to the recognition of both these forms of government, and has so acted, not from any selfish motive, but convinced of discharging thereby an important duty. Reigning families are just as likely to die out as any other family; in such an event it would depend entirely upon chances and circumstances as to who may be placed upon the throne as successor. Those events most assuredly do best occur without the permission of the King of Kings, and it is then for His vicar on earth to defend the righteous.

"How many legitimate reigning families have not lost, by the dispensation of Providence, their claim to their throne! The principle of legitimacy is not an all to be considered; but are we not falling into an error in supposing its vindication, under any circumstances, upon the Pope, even then, when it was forfeited by reason of the wrongs done by such families; or, is it presumed that the functions of the bishops and priests differ in one state—whether monarchy or republic—from another?"

This is a clear answer to those calumniators and fanatics who are perpetually pointing out the Pope as the enemy of republicanism and free institutions. The Pope or the Church interferes with no form of government, but respects and commands obedience to all when legitimate. It is Protestantism that champions the political doctrines of absolutism and the "right divine" to rule, and the immediate result of the Lutheran revolt—foolishly called a reformation—was the strengthening of kingly absolutism all over Europe.—N. Y. Tablet.

The Catholic who modifies his faith to suit the company he is in, or moulds it to the fashions of the community in which he lives, has already betrayed his faith. Our faith, is not of our making; is not ours to modify, to mould or to lessen.

MIXED MARRIAGES—A SERIES OF BLUNDERS.

We regret that the New York Sun has given wide publicity to a stupid paragraph that, else might have slumbered peacefully in the columns of the Baltimore American. It affects the peace of an old and respectable family. The paragraph is full of errors. It says:

"In the Archdiocese of Baltimore for the last few months the most stringent measures have been enforced to prevent these mixed marriages. These measures include the refusal of absolution to any Catholic young man who visits a Protestant lady with a view to matrimony, and to any Catholic lady who receives the visits of a Protestant with the same end in view, and also the refusal of the Catholic clergy to officiate at the marriage of a Catholic and Protestant."

In this there is not one particle of truth. As stated, in a part of the paragraph we have not quoted, the Ecclesiastical authorities in Baltimore, obedient to the Catholic Church, disapprove, and try to prevent, marriages of Catholics with non-Catholics. Marriage, for Catholics, is a Sacrament—a holy thing. Marriage of a Catholic with a non-Catholic is, therefore, "a degrateful communion in a Divine Sacrament."—(Papal Instruction to all Prelates, November 15, 1858.) And the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866), says: "The Church has ever striven against the marriage of Catholics with heretics." (Num. 334.) The Church in Baltimore has not gone beyond the line of obligatory duty. After some further romancing, the paragraph says, about a marriage certain to be unhappy:

"It so happened that the new regulations regarding mixed marriages went into effect before the day on which the marriage of the lady and gentleman was to take place. The lady was very much annoyed and applied to a number of Catholic priests, who all refused to officiate at the ceremony. The intimation that in case of their persistent refusal, the marriages would be performed by a Protestant clergymen, had no effect, as it might have done had."

"Now negotiations," etc. [illegible] refused, hoping none was asked, to "... that at the ceremony."

The plain story is as follows: The young woman was the daughter of a respectable family of old Maryland Catholics.

Her parents did not object to her making the acquaintance and receiving the attentions, looking to marriage, of the Protestant who is now her husband. That Protestant is said to have pledged himself to them that he would never interfere with her free will in regard to religion. The young woman has, for years, been an invalid.

If, as her parents are said to plead, she was not strong-minded—but, whether or not, they were to suppose that she was very likely, if she liked the man well enough to marry him, to observe, or have him observe, with her, and with him, think as he thought, do as he did.

And so the young woman did! She accepted the "religious" direction of the man her parents were willing for her to marry. Poor child!

She went with him to a Protestant preacher to be married—desiring no Sacrament. An absurd story is stated that her parents discarded her. That is not possible. That would be against justice, as against nature. The fault is, irresponsibly, theirs, rather than hers. Take back your daughter to your affectionate care. If she lives one year as she will have died. Put your pride in your pocket, and become missionaries against the evil habit of promoting attachments of young people between Catholics and non-Catholics.—N. Y. Freeman's Journal.

The St. James Mission Claim.

The passage of the bill directing the issue of a patent to Mission St. James for six hundred and forty acres of land was preceded by a very spirited debate on Saturday last, 20th instant, between Delegate Jacobs and Buckner of Missouri, Chairman of the Committee reporting the bill. Jacobs, after showing that the Land Department and Attorney-General have repeatedly decided against the claim, informed the House that it covers the whole town of Vancouver and the military reservation, estimated to be worth a million dollars. He therefore argued that all parties should be left to fight out their contest in the Courts. Buckner rejoined that the Government had given missions or other religious denominations patents for six hundred and forty acres each, and argued that the issuance of the patent in this case would facilitate the judicial settlement of the controversy without infuriating any party, as the bill merely authorizes the issue and expressly prohibits that in the event of a final confirmation of the title to the Catholic Church, the United States may remove all Government property. Jacobs then showed that the effect of the bill's enactment would be to immediately compel the citizens of Vancouver to pay rent to the mission. But despite his strenuous opposition, the House passed the bill by a vote of two to one. All the Pacific Coast members present voted in the affirmative.

Leonard Harper Johnson of Virginia has devised a new religion, based on a new Bible of his own composition. This pretended revelation of Divine will constituted him a high priest, with a right to claim one-tenth of the income of his followers, and to have as many wives as he can get. He has secured three wives, but no other followers as yet, although he preaches his doctrines eloquently.

A most extraordinary scene took place on the 31st December at the church of St. James Hatcham, London, the vicar of which, the Rev. Mr. Tooth, has been inhibited from ministration by Lord Penzance, on account of so called Ritualistic practices. Mr. Tooth last Sunday effectually resisted the entry of Canon Hoe, who was delegated by the bishop of the diocese to take charge of the services, and it was expected that some force would be used to eject the reverend gentleman, or that the Bishop of Rochester himself would come to use his authority in person. It appears, however, that the bishop leaves the onus of ejecting the recalcitrant clergyman on the shoulders of the Dean of Arches, and neither he nor any of his representatives put in an appearance at the church. An immense congregation crowded the church at an early hour, and long before the service commenced there was no standing room in it. At 11 o'clock candles were lit on the altar, the vases filled with choice flowers, giving a highly decorative aspect to the Communion table, and the Rev. Mr. Tooth, in silk and white chasuble, with gold embroidery, came to the front of the altar and proceeded with the devotions. At the accustomed stop in the service Mr. Tooth divested himself of the silver of his chasuble, and, preceded by a cross bearer, went into the pulpit and preached a sermon, in which, as on Christmas Day, he dwelt upon the self-restraint exercised by the Blessed Virgin Mary; preaching also of the virtue practised by St. Joseph, and admonishing his hearers to take the lesson to themselves. It was when he put on again his chasuble and resumed the service that a real and serious disturbance took place. Far down in the church, when the choir commenced singing a Christmas hymn in the well-known Cherubim air of Adeste Fideles, a serious row took place, and from time to time in the end of the service the lower part of the church was [illegible] into a battle ground.

[illegible] vice, and he was immediately mobbed and hustled towards the doors. Tale gets rise to free fights. Umbrellas and sticks were flourished and used effectually upon the heads of Ritualists and anti-Ritualists. A large portion of the congregation jumped upon the forms and put on their hats and prepared to defend themselves. Ladies fainted, some of them being carried to the vestry, and in the midst of all this riot cries of various kinds were heard above the din. A police sergeant arrived, and his presence put an end for the time to the fight, but when he left the church it was renewed, the combatants striking right and left with sticks and umbrellas. In the melee many hats were hopelessly crushed, and the bonnet of more than one lady came to grief. All this time, although there was great excitement and much hissing and groaning, the service was continued with its choral accompaniments. The policeman was again sent for by the churchwardens, and again his appearance had a pacifying effect. But still there were cries. Matters were gaining serious close to the entrance to the church, and a few men, conspicuous by their violent conduct, were seized by the churchwardens and ejected. Outside the Ritualists and anti-Ritualists got mixed, and a short pugilistic encounter was the result.

The temporary lull inside was broken by a gentleman asking in a loud voice, "Where is the bishop?" and this was followed by groans for his Lordship. A positive panic among the congregation was afterward created by some quaint riotous proceedings. Ladies in a fainting condition were carried out of the church, hats were crushed, and umbrellas and sticks used on people and [illegible] and again the police appeared upon the scene, but really took no action in the matter. In the meantime a reinforcement of a sergeant and a dozen constables arrived from the Deptford police station, and their services were required to control the disorderly crowd outside the st brob. During the remaining portion of the concluding service groups of men argued as to Ritualistic doctrines at the bottom of the church. The discussions were carried on with the utmost levity, and amid jokes and laughter at the solemn moment of the consecration. The service, in which incense was copiously used, came to an end with the benediction. In the choir during the service were the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie and others. A number of men remained in the church close to the street, and feeling unrelieved to the clear decorations we must, the choristers formed a cordon around the altar for its protection. Outside the congregation were hooted by the mob and the clergymen were hissed.—Dublin Freeman.

The Royal Agricultural Society, at its last meeting in Leicester, England, awarded the prize for making butter to the Monks of Mt. St. Bernard. A farmer in Kent, who had hitherto always carried off the prize, was so indignant that he dashed, in his fury, his fragrant butter to the ground. The butter made in the Cistercian Abbey is not unknown in London. It rivals almost in purity and flavor the far famed butter of Milan, a delicious dish on the table of the London epicure.

A curious series of experiments made in France show approximately that the best [illegible] load a strong man can carry for a short distance is 310 pounds; all a man can carry habitually, as, for example a soldier in his knapsack, walking on level ground, is 132 pounds—or an aggregate of 1,518 pounds over 2,200 feet as a day's work. If he ascends ladders or stairs, as do hod-carriers, he can carry but 121 pounds continuously, and his day's work cannot exceed 1,328 pounds raised 3,200 feet high.

HON. J. C. ALVARADO.

It is pretty well understood among those who keep well posted to political gossip that should Governor Tilden be inaugurated President of the United States on the 4th of March, he will confer upon the Hon. J. C. Alvarado the appointment as Minister of the United States to one of the South American Republics, Chili or Peru, in recognition of his valuable services to the party. That such an appointment would be eminently fit done, and that it would meet with general satisfaction, especially in California, there can be no doubt.

Mr. Alvarado is a native of Monterey, in this State, and 33 years of age. His father is the distinguished and much esteemed Don Juan B. Alvarado, Governor of California under Mexico. Young Alvarado received a liberal education, graduating with high honors in the College of California, now the University of California. In 1865 he commenced the study of the law, and in January, 1870, he applied to the Supreme Court of this State for admission to the bar, and, after a highly creditable examination, was admitted as an attorney and counselor of all the Courts of the State. He and Judge Sepulveda, District Judge of Los Angeles, are the only two native Californians of Spanish descent who have adopted the law as a profession.

Mr. Alvarado is now engaged in the practice of his profession in this city. His appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate as United States Minister to Chili or Peru would be hailed with great satisfaction by all classes, and more particularly by the native population, his family being [illegible] as one of the leading [illegible] and ability.

It is [illegible] to us that there are spacious regions where one need run no risk of being either frozen or sun-struck, and Santa Barbara county is undoubtedly one of them. Its reputation has, in fact, already gone abroad, and it is now one of the resorts and retreats of the United States. It can readily support twenty times its present population, so there is no danger of overcrowding for years to come.

Death of Rev. Father Farrelly, Red Bluff.

It is our painful duty to chronicle the death of Rev. Father Farrelly, of Red Bluff, diocese of Grass Valley. The deceased, a highly esteemed clergyman, one of the pioneer priests of the above diocese, departed this life at the parochial residence on Tuesday, January 17, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. Assiduously and ever employed in the discharge of his duty in catechising little children, the first favorites of Christ, or in ministering to the dying of mature years, we find him going forth a few days previous to his death, in opposition to his medical adviser, to administer the last rites of the Church to one of his people who, like himself, has been cerried to that home whence no traveler returns. The terribly retribution in the exercise of his ministry was death—his eternal reward, let us pray and hope, are the blessings of a never-ending eternity.

Relapse of pneumonia, that insidious disease, terminated the young and buoyant life of this "good shepherd," whose amiability, simplicity of character, love of his people, and especially of children, endeared him to all and placed his name high among those of his co-laborers who have gone to receive their reward. In the death of Father Farrelly there is added another to the noble band of martyrs whose life, employed in the service of charity and the sacred duties of the priesthood, has been sacrificed and "spent for his people." Charity and humility, concordant virtues of the minister of Christ, whom as desired even though at a distance, he imitate, were especially cultivated by him, and the epitaph,

[illegible]

Rev. Father Farrelly was born at Oldcastle, in the county Meath, Ireland, of the choice of beautiful, picturesque and historic Loch-Sheelin, about the year 1832. His early education was received at the Seminary of Navan, the preparatory school for the ecclesiastics of that diocese, of which he was a member. While the associates of his studies was received for the College of All Hallows—the Alma Mater of distinguished Irish priests—Archbishop Kenrick, among the latter his own dearly attached Bishop of Grass Valley, whose years of continuance in clerical training bear abundant fruits in the devoted labors of members of his spiritual children scattered through every stone from pole to pole.

We are not strangers to the brilliant career which has and still shades its undimmed halo over the College of All Hallows—the nursery of the clergy for foreign missions), from the days of its venerable and venerated founder, the Very Rev. Father Hand, to the present learned and universally esteemed rector, Dr. Fortune. Not during that period have we any difficulty in saying that there is not one of the numerous alumni who passed through those classic halls, whose memory is more revered, and whose early death will be more universally regretted, than the Rev. Father Farrelly. "Peace to his ashes."

In memory returning to the past, "the vision only of a day," now will do we remember the genial, generous and affable deceased, devoting himself to study, that his well-stored mind and extensive theological knowledge might one day burn brightly on the distant coast of the Pacific. And, however, the faithful sentinel on the watch-tower, the good shepherd, has been called to his last summons in the day of his useful-ness. Well may we say, "Who hath known the wisdom of the Lord, or who shall be His counselor?" but he whose reposition as a worthy gardener had devoted himself to the pruning and fostering beneath the subjects of regular economies, whom effects were not [illegible] to the cultivation of the virtues and duties of his sacred calling; but he who was the accomplished gentlemen, who suffered little children to come unto him, either the example of his heavenly Master, [illegible]

Birds of each firefarer quality
As could afford to come together
In up top fashionable feather.

The Owl her smiles did freely lend,
And vowed each bird was her "dear friend."
Wise chaffing, eating, singing, dress,
The party was a grand success.
Only the Daws cared such complaint:
"But where made her poor mate hide?
Has often they herself long sailing,
Or else her children would go starving."

"No sorry!" said the Owl. "But, Love,
We all do know your Mistress Dove
And her domestic ways and cares.
Here comes Miss Magpie with her airs!"
Miss Magpie was discreetly grieved,
But had a message just received
Whose purport, hardly worth the mention,
Will needed strict and prompt attention!

"And so good-bye." All were concerned;
But, when her back was fairly turned,
Said Madame Owl: "I do declare,
No thief can with that bird compare;
She's busy stealing all the day,
And what she steals she hides away.
Meet and that! There's no denying,
To steal her virtue was trying."

Miss Parrot first "must go away,
For her French master came that day."
Then said the Owl, we missed the dove!
"Good riddance of a prating bore!
She hates the daylight in and out,
And knows on what she talks about;
And as for lying—See us'er fail her—
Besides, she never has any sense!"

Peacock said next: "Good afternoon."
The Owl answered: "it's more too soon,
For every bird in this our house,
Knows not an hour to her clothes.
If you could see your legs! Poor creature!
But come, for fools there be no teacher."

Then went the Goose. "Well, go, my dear!
I don't see how you got in here,
A stupid, vulgar, awkward bird.
That cannot fly and cannot sing.
One of the coarsest class. Poor sister!
I will make sure of a decent dinner."

The Kite was off without "good-day."
She had her reasons, I dare say:
At least the Owl said: "Where she goes,
The vilest wretch the whole world knows.
Shall eat her mother any time
Before she'd want whatever is done;
And, sure as I'm an owl and lady,
I've known her up breast to her baby!"

And then, as each bird went away,
The Owl had something bad to say!
Until the Dove alone remained
To hear her late companions blamed.
—"Why, how is this?" the Owl inquired,
"I thought your mate was sick and tired!
And that your children were depending
Entirely on your own attending."

"Well, that is so," the Dove replied;
But I have heard, while at your side,
My neighbors covered so with blame,
I judged it better to remain.
"I thought of me? I shall not fear it,
Now there is no one left to hear it."

But bitter words have many wings,
As in a hive of bees are stings;
And soon from tree top and from spire
Was heard the buzzing of "Backbiter's Liar!"
And, telling from the sea and light,
Became a filthy bird of night.

Prof. Smyth, M. P., on National Union.

A very largely attended tenant-right demonstration took place in the Market House, Ballyclare, county Antrim, on the night of Friday, 15th December. Among the speakers was Prof. Smyth, M. P., who concluded a most able address to the following patriotic strain:

"I have always observed that a time comes when the ranks close, a policy is agreed upon, the people are the gainers, and the country makes another great stride towards the goal of universal justice. It will be so on the land question. There will always be a contingent in the Liberal ranks a good deal in advance of the rest. . . . Myself remember a time when Mr. John Bright was considered by the staid old politicians of England as a sort of runaway horse who would not obey bit or bridle, and now he finds that the opinions which he advocated thirty years ago are but average opinions of to-day, and a great many have shot ahead of him. What I humbly recommend you tenant-farmers to do is to give your support to all who are going in the right direction; and I say, without mincing the matter, that opinion on the Government side of the House of Commons is wholly and, I am afraid, hopelessly wrong on the land question. Until our rulers are changed, or converted, there is no chance of passing a good tenant-right bill. Your property is impounded within a fortress which is garrisoned by the present governments, and the tenants of Ulster never allowed themselves to be swayed by a more miserable intimation than when they oppose that they can recover the property without storming the fortress. You must release the fire of the garrison—you must compel or induce Lord Beaconsfield to give up the keys, and then, but not till then, you may recover the Ulster custom of tenant-right which is now hidden away behind the fortifications of self-interest, prejudice and power. I rejoice to think that there is a better understanding between North and South on the land question than there ever was before. This political friendship is one that ought to be cultivated. I read with intense gratification lately the eloquent remarks of the O'Donoghue on the subject, and I desire, standing amongst Protestants, in this great Protestant county, to reciprocate the kind sentiments of the honorable member for Tralee, though I cannot attempt to rival his eloquence.

"It is high time for North and South to lay aside old jealousies of religion and race which, in politics, are as much out of date as tube-prayers and penal laws. Let us have done with childish resentimentsm, and brace ourselves for some nobler struggle than the struggle for ascendancy. I, as an Ulsterman, would be sorry to think but generosity done on grass on the shores of Lough Neagh or Lough Derg as besides the Lakes of Killarney, or under the shady oaks of Innisfallen. The voices of peace which come from Munster will be echoed back from Ulster. We, too, are for peace, but we want the guarantees of a righteous land tenure. Our agitation is one of argument and reason alone, and all Irishmen—yes, Englishmen and Scotchmen—are our friends who have an argument to advance on the side of justice. Derry will raise no captious questions with Clare, nor will Cork be on the sharps with Antrim or Down. We are Irishmen—let us love one another wisely and love it well—that is enough. Threads of orange and threads of green cross and recross one another on the banner of tenant right. The North can carry on this war without crossing the Boyne, and the South does not need to beleaguer the walls of Derry. Sarsfield and Schomberg are asleep at last. The scattered shreds of the Treaty of Limerick will be gathered up again, and will be pieced together once more by the hands of Northern men, while the men of Kerry and Cork will come and speak kindly to the descendants, and walk lightly over the dust of the gallant Britons who fell under the swords of Puslim O'Neill and Sorley Boy Macdonnell, of the Glens. It will be one of the happiest incidents in the tenant-right movement if it should be the occasion of putting an end to those unreasoning divisions which have been the bane of our unnational life. At all events, as we aim at no league of class against class, but a combination of landlord and tenant, Ulsterman and Munsterman, Protestant and Roman Catholic, Saxon and Celt, that they may unitedly prosecute a splendid work for the social advancement of the whole people, and the political salvation of the country. If we can bring about that consummation, it will be little short of a national resurrection—the harp of Tara may no longer be silent, and the voice of Ely may again be heard in a decent dialect."

The Kite was off without "good-day."
She had her reasons, I dare say:
At least the Owl said: "Where she goes,
The vilest wretch the whole world knows.
Shall eat her mother any time
Before she'd want whatever is done;
And, sure as I'm an owl and lady,
I've known her up breast to her baby!"

And then, as each bird went away,
The Owl had something bad to say!
Until the Dove alone remained
To hear her late companions blamed.
—"Why, how is this?" the Owl inquired,
"I thought your mate was sick and tired!
And that your children were depending
Entirely on your own attending."

A Christian Republic

To narrate here the history of the miserable state of Paraguay, to describe the admirable organization of the Reductions, would require more time and space than are given to a newspaper article. For that we would refer our readers to the pages of Chateaubriand, and of all travelers who have visited America. We will confine ourselves to the selecting at random from the testimonies of philosophers, historians and celebrated navigators a few extracts calculated to convince the gentlemen of the Republique française that it is very impudent to talk of things they know nothing about. D'Azara amongst, who cannot be suspected of partiality to the Jesuits, wrote:

"The Jesuits have acquired a monarchial power without a single battalion, and have made themselves masters of a country, which, perhaps contains Gibraltar, if not, what is more true, that other barbarous countries where the people are oppressed and unhappy should have the Jesuits for apostles and masters."

Raynal writes in his "Histoire Philosophique:"

"Nothing equals the purity of morals, the mild and tender zeal, the paternal care of the Jesuits of Paraguay. Each Jesuit is at once the father and the friend of his parishioners. This authority is not felt because the people are communists, forbids nor punishes anything save what is commanded, forbidden, or punished by the religious law; all adore and cherish as he does himself."

Buffon writes:

"The Jesuits have made more, more among these barbarous nations than the victorious armies of the princes who subjugated them; they conquered Paraguay, mildness, good example, charity, and the constant practice of virtue opened up the missionaries a path to the heart of the savage; they possessed their confidence after having tamed them; and now, Nothing profounds more to the honor of religion than to see these people, who were to-day and to-morrow the terror of their neighbors, to-day and to-morrow the terror of their neighbors, to-day and to-morrow the terror of their neighbors,

ANNOUNCEMENT.

TO OUR READERS.

The last week of the Old Year witnessed a change in the proprietorship of THE MONITOR, a fact of which it is necessary that we should inform our friends and readers. On Saturday, December 30th, the interest of Mr. JOHN T. BARRY in this Journal, and his office, was bought out by Mr. RICHARD O'SULLIVAN, who now for nearly seven years has had charge of the editorial department. Mr. DANIEL LYONS will retire from all connection with the paper and his position of business manager, which he has held uninterruptedly for a period of more than eleven years. The new joint proprietorship will be known, we will trust, hereafter, under the name of LYONS & O'SULLIVAN.

Communications for MR JOHN T. BARRY, late of this Journal, will be more promptly attended to if addressed in care of Mr. John S. Barrett, 826 Pine street, San Francisco.

It is a fact which cannot be disputed by any well-informed person that the two countries in which Catholicity is making the surest and steadiest progress are precisely those two which most fondly claim to be in the van of progress and enlighten men—namely, England and America. We can scarcely take up a Catholic paper in this country without reading on account of several conversions in some one or other of the States, and the same thing is observable to even a greater extent in the English newspapers, although there seems to be a sort of dislike on the part of the English priests and bishops to direct public attention to the progress making by the Church. It is to be noticed, too, that these converstions take place chiefly among the better classes of society—among those whose is well educated and possess a high degree of culture. This, certainly, would indicate to an honest and impartial observer that the Catholic faith recommended itself to their judgment, to their intelligence and to their conscience; but fools and bigots will still cling to the old nonsense about "ignorance," and "superstition," and "unscriptural-ness." The Archbishop of Canterbury, in a recent visitation at Dover, thus spoke: "The number of converts to the Roman faith on a section which have taken place to our lifetime has far exceeded that which has taken place from the Church of England in any other period of its existence, except, perhaps, under the Stuarts, when, as we know, things at last came to a climax, and there was a deliberate attempt to Romanize the whole Church of England."

SPAIN is by no means so backward in the matter of popular education as England and American writers would have us believe. On the contrary, she is showing great energy in erecting schools and promoting enlightenment. If she can only realize the blessings of domestic tranquility, she need not be a few years her superiors with any European country. The most recent statistics show that there are in Spain 23,711 public schools of every grade, of which 16,446 are for boys and 6,876 are for girls. To complete the number required by law 3,224 more schools are needed, and they are being built as fast as possible. The number of primary schools is 2,466, of which an attendance of 1,200,720 pupils. In private schools not supported by the State there were 309,784 pupils of both sexes. In the public colleges 15,606 students were employed, and 4,060 in the private. This is certainly not a bad showing for a country with a population of about sixteen millions. Yet the talk of "ignorant Spain" is still to be continued in the sneer and especially in the "evangelical" papers of this country and of England, simply because it answers as a basis for such an amount of nonsense about the "superstition" of Catholicity to progress, obsolete and enlightenment. But when those who talk in this way are brought down to figures and statistics, to solid facts based on evidence, they have not a single word to say for themselves.

A MISSIONER man, called J. G. White, has been making a nuisance of himself in Ohio and elsewhere, by delivering what he imagines to be controversial lectures against the Catholic Church. He has the audacity to challenge any Catholic priest or layman to disprove his assertions, relying, of course, upon the well known unwillingness of Catholics to take notice of attacks proceeding from irresponsible and disreputable individuals like him. Sometimes he gets disappointed, for now and then a priest gets a little irritated at his harrangues, and, thinking to do good by it, inserts a few impressive, scorpia his challenge and confronts him upon the platform. Then Mr. White writhes and wriggles and tries as far away as possible from the points in dispute. But he is grand in sweeping accusations and fierce denunciations, and such rhetorical artifices as will entrap the unwary and win applause from the ignorant. Facts, names, dates and authorities are things he has an invincible repugnance to, and, indeed, the same may be said of all anti-Catholic controversialists. Only let them rave about the "abominations of Rome," or "the tyranny of priestcraft," or "the horrors of the Inquisition," and they get on splendidly; but bring them down to the sober and practical regions of logical argument, and they immediately get lost in a maze. So it happened to poor White when a priest humored him by accepting him as an adversary. He floundered about helplessly, and did not even seem to know what he was talking of. His worst condemnation did not come from Catholic sources, but from persons who would have been glad to applaud him if they dared. Said Rev. J. P. Lacroix, of Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, speaking of him: "His arguments are based upon false statements, incorrect translations, and downright misrepresentations." But fools and fanatics will crowd to listen to him still.

TO a Catholic nothing can be more laughable or absurd than the accounts which are published in the Protestant press of the "missions" which the sects maintain in various countries for the "evangelization" of the inhabitants. These stories are false, and that is the best we can say of them. Their preposterous exaggerations are quite unfounded; yet they cling to it, will not leave it, and will not even be kicked out of it, for the sake of the loaves and fishes it so generously furnishes out of the confiscated revenues of Catholic churches, convents and monasteries. We print elsewhere an edifying account of a row in the Ritualistic church of St. James, Hatcham, London, the vicar of which is a gentleman rejoicing in the name of Tooth. His bishop is trying to draw him, but can't do it.

OF course Russia pretends that the sole cause of her quarrel with Turkey is the bad treatment inflicted by the latter upon its Christian subjects. She would not, for the world, allow that she is impelled thereto by a desire to seize upon portions of Turkish possessions, or by an anxiety to own the Dardanelles, or by an anxiety to own Constantinople. This pretense is a very old one, and is worn so much that it ought now be incapable of deceiving anybody. We know that the Crimean war is said to have had its origin in a determination to defend the rights of the Greek monks to worship in the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, but before the war was ended it became apparent there was something more tangible and less creditable behind. Now, the very best proof that Russia does not really care about the Christians, whether they are persecuted or not, is found in the fact that her own conduct towards her Catholic subjects is quite as bad as that of the Turks towards the Servians or Bulgarians. There is not a sadder chapter in history than the story of the persecutions of the gallant Poles. The way they were "converted" from Catholicism to the Greek schism by the strong arguments of bayonets and whips has earned the execration of all Europe. The following list of Bishops and priests transported to Siberia, for merely doing their duty to their flocks, may throw some light upon the genuineness of the Russian protestations of tenderness for the welfare of the Christian subjects of Turkey: 1, Monsignor Felinski, Archbishop of Warsaw, transported to Jaroslaw; 2, Monsignor Kraslouki, Bishop of of Wilna, transported to Wiatk; 3, Monsignor Kuliuski, Bishop of Chelm, who died while on his way to exile; 4, Monsignor Lubinski, Bishop of Augustowo, who died while on his way to exile; 5, Monsignor Pupel, Bishop of Podzk, transported to Novgorod; 6, Monsignor Horowski, Bishop of Zyjomir, transported to Perm; 7, Monsignor Reyswski, administrator of the diocese of Kaminiec, transported to Astrakan; 8, Monsignor Seriggelski, administrator of the diocese of Warsaw, transported to Siberia; 9, Monsignor Krassynski, administrator of the diocese of Zytomir, transported to Simbirsk; 10, Canon Dmagelski, of Warsaw, transported to Siberia.

THE Emperor of Austria is not quite so liberal in his opinions as his anti-Catholic ministry would desire. He apparently believes that the Church has some rights which a government acting in the name of the Christian people is bound to respect. For this reason he has refused his assent to the new convent law recently passed by both Houses of the Austrian Parliament. This law contained a provision that no new convent could be established without the consent of the Legislature, and another that the representative of the Crown had the power of suppressing any convent if they thought fit to do so. The Ministry declared that the privilege of permitting new monastic foundations, and of suppressing old ones, belonged by right to the Executive, and they refused to sanction the law passed by the Legislature, and they intend to bring it to a test of their own to that effect. Whether the Emperor will reject this, as he did the bill of the Legislature, remains to be seen. We trust he will remain firm by the principles of right and justice, and not allow sectarian intermeddling of any kind. The right of association is recognized by all enlightened Governments. If people are to be left free to combine for any purpose—social, commercial, benevolent, or scientific—why should they not be left free to associate together for the glory of God and the salvation of souls? Governments run no risks from any of these associations or societies, because their inmates trouble themselves very little about political movements in the outside world. It is, therefore, absurd in the highest degree to pretend that they are conducted either by or for political purposes. Their members are occupied with matters of a very different character, and they are not likely to be disturbed in their pursuits by any Government which has not lost its senses.

THE Catholic population of the county Waterford have taken a very praiseworthy step in the management of their political affairs. The Lismore Farmers' Club recently held a meeting, under the Presidency of Rev. Dr. Byrne, to discuss the prospects of the forthcoming election, and to decide about the candidate for Parliament to be supported. They certainly had plenty of men to select from. In addition to Mr. Purcell Fitzgerald, there were Mr. Delahunty, Mr. D. J. Reardon, and a Mr. Lehmann, all the way from London. The honest farmers were of the opinion that the Irish members ought to be chosen by the required standard of fitness and principle, so they declined to pledge themselves to any one of them. Rev. Dr. Byrne, defining what should be the programme of the Club, maintained that the first consideration should be to obtain a tenant-right bill on the principle of Mr. Butt's measure. The Club pledged themselves, on the motion of the reverend gentleman, to indorse no candidate who is not a Tenant Righter, a Home Ruler, a Denominational Educationalist, who is not for the Sunday closing of liquor shops, and who is not an Irishman. We particularly commend the Waterford farmers for insisting upon the last qualification, and we earnestly hope they will name a Mr. Roger Englehman, who had money and professed what are miscalled liberal principles, fancied he had a claim upon the suffrages of an Irish constituency. More particularly was this the case if, for the sanctification of his own soul, he had been converted to the true faith. Then, indeed, he fancied he ought to be elected to any place he asked for. Now, Englehmen, converted and unconverted alike, have always turned out very unsatisfactory members, and they failed just where they were most wanted. They were English in preference to Irish all the time. The good men of Waterford can easily find one of their own race and blood to represent them.

A telegram, dated last Wednesday, states that Mr. Disbrowny has been elected, but does not say whether he had any opposition. The Waterford farmers will be pleased if the farmers shoot his attachment to national principles, or he would not have been chosen. We hope he will be faithful to his trust.

THE English idea of the Irish people, carefully and systematically stirred through the agency of books, periodicals, newspapers, lectures, essays, etc., is that they are altogether destitute of capacity for commercial undertakings—that, do not know how to succeed in the world. They appear to them poetical and very humorous, so as to make Englishmen laugh, very interesting in their rags and poverty; but, of course, they cannot compare with the great John Bulls in practical common sense as illustrated in the making of money. Like a great many other things that pass current as truths, this is a lie of their own to that effect. Whether the Emperor will reject this, as he did the bill of the Legislature, remains to be seen. We trust he will remain firm by the principles of right and justice, and not allow sectarian intermeddling of any kind. The right of association is recognized by all enlightened Governments. If people are to be left free to combine for any purpose—social, commercial, benevolent, or scientific—why should they not be left free to associate together for the glory of God and the salvation of souls? Governments run no risks from any of these associations or societies, because their inmates trouble themselves very little about political movements in the outside world. It is, therefore, absurd in the highest degree to pretend that they are conducted either by or for political purposes. Their members are occupied with matters of a very different character, and they are not likely to be disturbed in their pursuits by any Government which has not lost its senses.

THE Public school system is receiving unpleasant criticism from persons whom one would suppose to be prejudiced in its favor. The truth is, its defects and evil tendencies are so glaring that it is impossible to conceal them. It is a very cheap sort of fame that is earned by loudly proclaiming what everybody knows already, or ought to know. But when some one adroitly seizes literary distinction—whether well deserved or not does not matter—calls attention to a patent fact, every person appears to see something wonderful in it. For instance, Wendell Phillips, at a recent meeting of the American Social Science Association, held in Boston as a matter of course, said the public schools of that city were not to be compared with those of Canada, Scotland or England. He might have said the public schools of the whole United States and the remark would have been equally true. But, however, his words are quoted as if they embodied something wonderfully wise and profound. A thousand other people might say precisely the same thing, and they would only be abused for it. The Catholic newspapers have been stating that fact persistently for years, and it has been lugged to them as something equivalent to high treason. The thing is true, nevertheless. Wendell Phillips declares that thousands of our public school children cannot write a letter, and that only 15 or even read a newspaper well, and he complains that the schools turn out thousands not capable of doing any work for which any one should pay a dollar. Of course. What else is to be expected? When the branches of learning useful to the lad who has to work his way in the world are neglected for such luxuries and superfluities as music, drawing, modern language, telegraphy, of which only the children of the rich can properly avail themselves, such values and common things as reading, writing and ciphering must suffer.

THE PRESIDENTIAL COMPROMISE.

The Joint Congressional Committee on the counting of the Electoral votes has at length a report and with it a bill for the consideration of the two Houses. The bill proposes that all matters relating to the counting of the Electoral votes, their regularity and their legality be left to the decision of a committee or commission, composed of five Senators, five Representatives and five Supreme Court Judges to be appointed by the vote of States. Four of the Supreme Judges are provided for in the bill, and they are to choose the fifth. The decision of this commission can be set aside only by a concurrent vote of both Houses, and as such a thing is hardly within the range of possibility, the decision must be regarded as practically final and binding. Of course, the five Senators will be Republicans, the five Representatives will be Democrats, and the four Judges will be equally divided between the two parties. Supposing, then, the commission should find for their own party sympathies, as it is very likely they will—for, beyond question, strong party men will be selected by both sides—it is evident that the fifth Judge will be master of the situation and be able to dictate who shall be the next President. That is certainly a disagreeable feature in the bill, but we do not see how it could be avoided, or how it is necessary to take some precautions against the occurrence of a deadlock. We have, moreover, a better opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States than to imagine it would be impossible to select out of it a man whose sense of justice and fair play would not overcome his purely party predilections.

And, again, some risks must be incurred and scope fidelity must rest somewhere in every compromise expedient. Probably there never was a measure brought under the notice of a legislative body which was not objected to by one party or the other up to the time of our writing, and the end has not been reached yet. The bill now very strong friends and very strong foes, but the latter are not those that we have to dread. Extremists of both parties oppose it bitterly, each claiming that it is a cowardly surrender to the other. But moderate and patriotic men on both sides look upon the destinies of the country as safest, are very nearly unanimous in its favor. For instance, such Republicans as CONKLING, FRELINGHUYSEN and CAMERON of Pennsylvania support it; while men like SARGENT, MORTON and BLAINE strenuously oppose it. The Democrats, too, are somewhat divided in their opinions; but the majority of them are certainly inclined to vote for it. Meetings have been held in various cities, and resolutions in favor of its adoption have been passed with enthusiasm; while as yet the protests against it come from individuals acting upon their own impulse. A similar difference is perceptible in the comments of the leading newspapers throughout the country. The Democratic party, others denounce it quite as earnestly.

It is plain, however, that the bill has broken down party lines and secured for itself full consideration from the impartial standpoints of justice and equity. There is every prospect of its passing both Houses, and the President has already declared that he will gladly sign it. However, SUMNER and BLAINE are determined to get up a majority against it in the Senate if they can, but the chances are they will not succeed. If they do, all that will happen is that the Houses will declare Tilden elected and the Senate HAYES, and the administration of national affairs will be brought to a very dangerous and critical deadlock—the very thing that all sensible men are trying to avoid. So its rejection elects nothing whatever, while its passage will give some solution of a grave difficulty. There are, of course, men of such stubborn disposition that they would sacrifice anything rather than make a concession to adversaries, but they are very dangerous advisers, indeed, and may do more harm in a day than they could remedy in a lifetime. We trust the bill will pass.

After a debate which lasted all night, the Compromise bill was passed by the Senate at 7 o'clock Thursday morning. Forty-seven voted in favor of it and seventeen against it. There was only one Democrat in the minority.

LOCAL IRISH NEWS.

From the Dublin Nation of December 30.

ANTRIM.

Two of the Local Government Inquiry Commissioners—Messrs. Chichester Clerk and [illegible]—visited Slane on November, 29. The commissioners still remained under the form of government intended by the Act of 1840 to be only temporary. There were two attempts made to put Carrickfergus under the Towns Improvement Act. The reason the charge was not carried out was that the country people were made to believe that if towns were put under the Improvement Act, they would be taxed for the benefit of the town, and they came in with a tremendous force, and outvoted the commissioners entirely. The population of the borough at the last census was 340.

ARMAGH.

On Wednesday evening week, says the Ulster Examiner, an old and respected Nationalist, named John French, of Lurgan, was walking about in his usual health and strength, and on the following morning he was dead. The deceased was well known in Lurgan for his extensive national sentiments, but, though he held these himself, he could not have been accused of willfully offending those who may have differed from him. There was recently a recurrence of the Orange anniversaries that he and his family were not subject to many annoyances by the ignorant Orange party, and frequently their house was wrecked and the inmates placed in imminent danger of their lives; yet all was borne with much patience.

CLARE.

The Guardians of Ennis Union, by a majority of twelve to nine, at last meeting declined to reconsider their decision, as recommended by the Local Government Board, of increasing the poundage of Mr. Redding, rate-collector, from 2d to 3d. This is the third time the Board declined to grant the increase sought for. On the motion of Mr. E. Kennedy the metal stores were ordered to be supplied to the paupers at Christmas.

CLARE.

The promotion of Rev. R. Fitzgerald, Administrator of the parish of Ennis, to the charge of the parish of Roan and Dysert, is about to be made the presentation of a testimonial by the inhabitants of the former place. The following letter has been received by Patrick McNamara, Esq., Secretary of the committee, from Lord Francis Conyngham, M. P.:—"Sir—Seeing in the Clare Journal of the 14th inst. that a testimonial is about to be presented to Rev. Robert Fitzgerald, P. P., and that subscriptions are being collected, I have great pleasure in sending you a check for £10 for that purpose.—I remain yours truly, Francis Conyngham." The reverend gentleman was chairman of the late meeting held in Ennis at which Lord Francis addressed his constituents.

CORK.

A difficulty exists at Kinsale with respect to the endowed school of that town. From 1707 until lately it had been under the teaching of a succession of Protestant clergymen. The present Town Commissioners are, many of whom are Catholics, are seeking to obtain from the Court of Chancery the trusteeship of the school, and a dispute has arisen on the subject, which is not terminated.

At the Cork Town Council meeting, on Friday week, a very lively discussion took place on the proposal to purchase a chain as a badge of office of the city sheriff, now that the office is elected by the Local Government upon the nomination of the corporation, and is not a certain step to a city dignitary. The suggestion of the committee was opposed by Alderman Nagle, who declared that the sheriff at present is the first apostle of the Cattle; and Alderman Hegarty remarked that there was no necessity for providing the distinguishing badge, inasmuch as the sheriff has been deprived of all the executive powers, and is no longer even the hangman to the city. The Mayor considered the latter observation out of order, but the aldermen explained that he did not intend in any way to oppose the office. Finally the Council decided not to have a chain.

On Thursday week the people of Inishannon witnessed, with much exhilaration, the hoisting of a grand bell, weighing, with its appendages, 19 cwts., to its lofty chamber in the beautiful tower recently erected to his church by Rev. T. Holland, P. P. The event was one of considerable interest to the parishioners, who have watched with deep anxiety the steady yet rapid progress of the tower and spire from the foundation stone. The height of the tower and spire to the top of cross is 120 feet. Rev. Mr. Holland had completed his improvements in his other church at Knockville and provided for it a magnificent bell, at a cost of £500, when he directed his attention to the works at Inishannon. He has quietly, and without any noise, expended and close upon £2,000 on both his churches, which are gems in their way.

DONEGAL.

An inquiry was held on Saturday week at Conwaynagh, six miles distant from Inneshagky, by Mr. Blake, Inspector of Fisheries, into an application of Mr. Stewart, of Ards, for a license to plant oysters on the shores bordering on his property in that locality. The Earl of Leitrim, represented by his agent, opposed a portion of the application, on the ground that it would infringe on part of a several fishery claimed by him, the decision relative to which was now pending before the House of Lords. Mr. Blake stated that if Mr. Stewart succeeded for the entire of the license sought for it would involve a very lengthened investigation on his part into the disputed claims of Mr. Stewart and Lord Leitrim to the several fishery in question, and which, he understood, had been the subject for litigation for twenty years, and was to come before the House of Lords next session. He would require the title deeds of Mr. Stewart and Lord Leitrim's property, or authenticated copies, to be laid before him if the claim was pressed and resisted.

DUBLIN.

The sudden death is announced of Mr. S. J. Brett, Town Commissioner, Kingstown. It appears that Mr. Brett was in his usual good health on Thursday. He was in Dublin in the afternoon, and while visiting at a friend's house he accidentally fell. He returned home and transacted his business as usual, and attended a meeting of the Commissioners in the evening. About midnight, after retiring to bed, he had an epileptic fit, and Dr. Newland was called in, but Mr. Brett never rallied, and died at an early hour next day.

GALWAY.

Captain Richard Lambert, J.P., Marvilla, says the Galway Vindicator, very generously and kindly has presented a valuable painting to his friend, the Very Rev. Father O'Dwyer, O.P., Prior of the West Convent, Galway. The painting is a portrait of Rev. Richard Ogilvie, who was Father Confessor to Rubens, and afterwards raised to the episcopacy as Bishop of Ross in Down. The portrait, which is in a massive gilt frame, is from the Florentine Gallery, and as a work of art is of considerable value, estimated to be worth £150. The confessor of Rubens was a Dominican, and he is represented in the habit of his sacred order, with pectoral cross showing his Order, and rank. The portrait is a copy by eminent hand of one of the old masters from the original by Rubens.

Report has reached us, says the Western News, on most reliable authority, that the wife of Hon. Major William Le Poer Trench has become a convert to the Catholic faith.

It is our consoling duty to record it—let, says the Galway Vindicator, another of those consolations which cheer the saints of our priests and people, in the presentation by the people of Athenry to Rev. James Hosty, C.C., of a purse of sovereigns to purchase a horse. The purse contained over a sixty-five sovereigns, and, considering that this amount was handed in in three days, it speaks volumes for the respect and veneration of the people of this district only for their Soggart Aroon, as well as for their own traditional liberality and generosity. The movement was set on foot on Wednesday night in Kineen's hotel, and on the next Sunday, 3d inst., the committee waited on Father Hosyne and presented him with their well filled purse and an address.

KILDARE.

We deeply regret, says the Freeman, to perceive the announcement of the death of Robert Archbold, of Ferbishtown House, county Kildare, at the advanced age of 86. The ancient Catholic family, he inherited not merely the estates over which he was the kindest of landlords, but also the virtues of his ancestry. He was beloved by all who came in contact with him, and the great sorrow has fallen with especial severity on his bereaved mother and wife. He possessed every virtue that could adorn his station, and his demise has excited out regret from every class in the district with which he was connected.

KILKENNY.

The house-to-house census on the Sunday Closing question was completed at Kilkenny on Saturday week. The result appears in a paper containing the question:—"Are you in favor of the Sunday closing of public houses, taverns, shops, taverns and spirit groceries in Ireland on Sunday?" was left with the head of each family. The police received about [illegible] Ayes, 1,680; noes, 179; declined to vote 424. Of the Ayes, 128 publicans in Kilkenny who voted thus; Ayes, 39; noes, 27; declined to vote, 62. The population in 1871 was 13,710, occupying 2,760 houses, and it is hence apparent that the poll was very full and exhaustive.

KING'S COUNTY.

Over £200 has now been subscribed by the gentry of Birr and district to offer a reward for any person who prosecutes to a conviction the party or parties who poisoned five valuable dogs belonging to Mr. Hamilton's hounds. A meeting was also held by the farmers of the district recently during the spot where the offence is said to have been committed. After passing a resolution expressive of abhorrence of such a dastardly offence, they subscribed over £50 to the reward fund, and forwarded the amount to the treasurer, the Earl of Rosse. Irsdon has written to the King's county Chronicle, and through that journal tenders his warmest thanks to the farmers and to all the members of the hun'. The sport has not been abandoned, as a search proved that on Monday

LOUTH.

On Sunday, says the Drogheda Argus & Saturday, the Most Rev. Dr. Nulty, Lord Bishop of Meath, delivered a most instructive lecture in the cathedral of Navan, on the nature and properties of good wholesome drinking water, and also of soft water for sanitary and economic purposes. The lecture was largely attended by the clergy, lawyers and gentry of the town and its surroundings. The Most Rev. lecturer introduced his lecture by a series of interesting observations upon the nature of the various gases—namely, oxygen, hydrogen and nitrogen—which, in their due proportions, was afterward made in the course of the lecture. He then proceeded to explain at length the chemical effects resulting from those various gases, and the irregular results arising therefrom. The Most Rev. lecturer in an proceeded to the subject matter of the lecture, which he treated in the most masterly, lucid and scientific style. The same illustrations were introduced throughout with marked attention.

LIMERICK.

It is really disgraceful, says the Limerick Reporter, to see a Protestant lady of high rank interest herself in the Catholic education of a Catholic peasant boy, who might become a prey to dangerous influences were it not for generous and scientific aid of the same class most interesting manner. The lecture was listened to

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— It is reported that Cardinal Morichini, Archbishop of Bologna, will, on account of health, be transferred to the suburban See of Albano, and that Cardinal Amat will succeed the late Cardinal Patrizi in the diocese of Ostia and Velletri.

— The Very Rev. Dr. O'Shea, V. G., and parish priest of Baltimore, is dangerously ill, and no hopes are entertained of his recovery. The melancholy intelligence will be heard with universal regret by a wide circle of friends.

— Rev. Thomas Quinn, lately pastor of the church of the Sacred Heart, Philadelphia, has been appointed to succeed the late Rev. James Kelley, as pastor of St. Stephen's church, Kensington, Philadelphia.

— On Thursday, the 4th inst., Octave of the Holy Innocents, died at Ogdensburg, N. Y., the good and virtuous Father John Edwin O'Heire. His death is a severe loss to the Bishop, whose faithful and trusted Secretary he has been ever since the erection of the diocese in 1872, and a no less severe one to the whole diocese.

— Rev. David F. Lasher died at the residence of his father in Lockport, N. Y., on January 5. He was in the 27th year of his age, and in the third of his priesthood, he having been ordained by Right Rev. Bishop Ryan, at the seminary of Our Lady of Angels, Suspension Bridge, on the 30th of May, 1874.

— Maynooth College was established in 1795; since then seventy-six students have entered the holy ministry, and of these more than twenty can be to-day Prelates in the Irish Church. Ithas given to the world also twelve thousand priests. The religious orders of Ireland have been largely supplemented from the College, and by one who would reflect honor on any ecclesiastical establishment in the world.

— There is at Rome a College for the education of young Catholic missionaries, which presents the rare spectacle of more than a hundred youths from the four quarters of the globe, and the Islands of the sea, speaking collectively from fifty to sixty living languages of youths of different personal peculiarities and colors of different political predilections, all dwelling in all clear tolerance, in which they all agree with one heart and one soul.

— On November 25th, at the Convent of Mercy, Dungarvan, Miss Meagher (in religion, Sister M. Francesa de Sales) made her religious profession, and received the black veil from the hands of the Very Rev. Dr. Cleary, V. F., and on the 27th, Miss Walsh, of Ballybricken, Waterford, received into the same religious community, taking the name of Sister M. Josepha Rodgers.

— We are sorry to learn that Rev. Dr. Moultyne, pastor of St. Stephen's, is not to be enlisted, as it was reported recently that he would be, to be the guest of Coadjutor Bishop of the Catholic province of New York. That one of the Catholic clergy of New York is worthy to be made a Bishop, however, seems to be true. Rev. Michael O'Farrell, for many years pastor of St. Peter's in Barclay street, New York, the oldest Catholic church in the city, we learn has been requested to elect between the Episcopal See of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and the Deanship in the Archiepiscopic See of Toronto. This is a fitting recognition of the long and faithful services of this estimable clergyman in New York, and his friends generally hope that he will accept the position offered him in this country.

THINGS TO BE REMEMBERED.

That in England and in Canada Catholics pay a proper share of the School Fund. So in the United States they do not.

That Catholic children should be empty in the next generation of Catholic children are not taught their faith in time.

That hundreds of thousands have been lost to the Church through the want of Catholic schools, and that the loss in the countries that stopped from 1634, when Maryland was founded, until 1776, when Liberty ate Orders of women are engaged actively in that work in the United States, and that seventeen hundred common schools, with 60,000 pupils. All without one cent from the Government.

That Christian schools were managed and originated by Catholics.

All the great Universities always and free schools attached.

That the printing was invented by Catholics.

That the first newspaper was started by Catholics—namely, the Gazette, of Venice, in 1563, over three hundred years ago.

The founder of Catholic journalism in the United States was Bishop England, who established the United States Catholic Miscellany at Charleston in 1822.

Sometimes a person is met who says that he "feels no interest in Catholic news." He is a curiosity, and will generally be found to take "no interest" in anything Catholic.

The number of residential sees of Catholic patriarchs, archbishops and bishops in the world is according to the new volume of the Catholic Dictionary, 894 and of these no fewer than 126 are in the British Empire—namely, 18 in England, 26 in Ireland, 4 in Scotland, 44 in British colonies and dependencies. The number of Catholic peers is 26, of whom 26 have seats in the House of Lords. There are 47 Catholic baronets, 7 Catholic members of the Privy Council, and 66 Catholic members of Parliament, all of whom represent Irish constituencies. The number of priests in England, Wales and Scotland is 2,000, and the number of public churches, chapels, etc., is 1,615. This gives an increase of 60 priests and one year of 64 priest's and 51 churches and chapels.

Happy Influence of a Great Specific.

For the proper vitality or recovery of health and strength the chief should be wholesome and nutritious food, and to promote this the alimentary powers are charmed by improper or half-matured food, the best remedy for the evil results of which the modern system in Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a most agreeable, prompt and gentle remedy for dyspepsia and the bilious and excretionary irregularities to which result from it. The true and benefit, in common with the stomach, experience its beneficial influence. The relief of the system is carried off through its natural outlet, a healthy, free and secretion of the bile is promoted, and a powerful impetus given to assimilation in consequence of its use. It benefit fully stimulates the bladder and kidneys when they are inactive, and by its tonic and regulating action fortifies the system against malaria.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from active practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having thoroughly tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, feels it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive, and a conscientious desire to relieve human suffering, he will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this receipt, with full directions for preparing and successfully using. REFUSING AN INHERITANCE.

The terrible vice—it may well be called a visitation of the age we live in is the reckless reach for the accumulation of sudden wealth. It is encouraged because of the universal worship of the golden calf. Every one flings himself down before the rich man, and the word in society is never now, "What is he?" but "What has he?" If you are a poor man you are displaced, and would be ignored entirely, were it not that you may have good, healthy muscle and might learn the proper pecuniary action. If you are a rich man, no matter how you gained your fortune, you are "such a nice fellow" and such a good fellow" and your hundred pounds is equality, which, in comparison, may be infinitely less than the poor man's hundred pounds exotic extensions of—And oh! he is so generous! This is the man that ought to have money! In such a state of society—and it exists out as much on the Continent as in England—it is refreshing as it is strange to see him who might be one of the richest men in Europe, who might have an income of nearly a thousand pounds a day, willingly lay down his wealth, and refuse to touch a franc of his vast inheritance. Such a man is the young Duke de Galliera, who will not on any pretension accept a single franc of the vast fortune of his step-father, Philippe Ferrari. It was a mistake to think that this young man was not the educated—which abroad means the legitimate—son of the late Duke. He was, and one of the finest young men by his marriage with the duchess herself, a member of the great Bulgarini and Brignole families. Young Ferrari, who refused five millions sterling, is now at Genoa, but means soon to return to Paris to reside fully and to study practising languages to the sons of rich grocers of Paris. Young Galliera, in refusing splendor, especially the ladies, who take a great interest in the young man's affairs, says he will be a wonderful lover, may indeed him in accept a portion of the inheritance—at least, so they say herself, a sizable 50 000 or 60 000 pounds a year—but those best acquainted with the Ship Fever Hospitals claim the result was obtained by fraud.

— The Washington Union of January 19 has come out a long letter from Hon. John Kelley against the bill reducing taxation on National Banks, in which he shows that the profits realized by the banks are light in comparison to those of many other industries, and that the real beneficiaries of the measure are the bankers during the stock speculations.

— The London Telegraph's Paris correspondent says: The Paris newspapers publish dispatches in the Ambassadors at the Congress of the Conference. It is stated that the proposals of the Turkish Ministers are considered inadmissible, and that the Turkish Ministers have decided to attack Montenegro before the expiration of the armistice.

— Cuban dispatches state that seventy bands of partisans, variously estimated at from 2,000 to 5,000 in the island. The most important engagement was that in which the insurgents were defeated by Gen. Jovellar, with a loss of 200 killed and wounded. The other action was at Tapaia, west of Puerto Principe, on the south coast, and at Jaguey, in the north coast. Cuba and Spain are both apparently supplied with all varieties, prices remain unchanged. Exchange on London, 9 to 9½ premium; gold, $1 00@1 01; coin, $1 00@1 01; Coin and small bucks, nominal; bank bills, $1 00@1 01.

CATTLE—Most of all varieties are dull. Beef, poor to fair, 2@3c; good to prime, 3@4c; choice, 4@4½c; quarter, free, nearly 5c; dressed, 5@6c; Veal, 5@6c; Sheep, 3@4c; Lambs, 4@5c; Hogs, 4@4½c; Calves, 5@6c; Cows, $30@$50. Receipts of cattle have been moderate for the week, and prices have advanced in sympathy with the improvement in the market, and prices have advanced in sympathy with the improvement in the market, and prices have advanced in sympathy with the improvement in the market

THE MEN OF KILDARE.

There were brave men who strove their devotion to prove
If for their country in fortune and fame?
There were true men who died on the scaffold with pride,
Who would never to tyranny yield;
Yet no truer here bone to the honour of green,
And no braver are men, while we answer,
In the white world around them,
To our country's call in the fight.
For our nationality right!
Are the bold, fearless men of Kildare.

There were staunch men who stood, and, like rain shed their blood,
By the side of the brave Geraldine,
Who deserve that they should, with the noble and good,
On the bright roll of fame now shine;
And through history hand, with the light of the land
Of sweat that has cherished there,
We will find no braver, better men of our race
Than the strong, manly men of Kildare—
Always ready to stand
In the name of our land
Are the brave, dauntless men of Kildare.

They're as bold and as free as the rocks by the sea,
Of the sea that stood on its plain
Ever first in the fray, ever last to give way,
Ever ready their blood to maintain;
In their homesteads we find they are faithful and kind-hearted,
Hospitality always is there;
They are honest and true, food and warm-hearted,
For around the Swedes of Kildare,
Shamrock a-fly to May month,
Love and friendship and truth
Fill the hearts of the men of Kildare.

There are men to be met in that grand county yet
Who would fight the good fight to the end,
And no lover of liberty need ever despair to keep
The old green flag always erect;
There are men in that land who would stand up again'
And for Ireland all dangers would dare;
When there's work in be'd'ne, or a victory won,
In the van are the men of Kildare—
Always cheerful and bold,
In the Land of the West
Are the gentle, generous men of Kildare.

The first arrival of American beef in Kilkenny may date from Thursday last, says the Kilkenny Journal of Saturday, when a consignment of ten and a half tons was delivered at 81 High street. The establishment was opened on yesterday, and the sale attracted great notice. Considerable crowds collected before the shop door, and the appearance of the beef was the subject of much criticism. The quality of some of the meat, as might be expected, looked rather heavy, but when sliced down it appeared as if only lately killed, the fat and lean portions are very nicely balanced, and on the whole the beef presents the appearance of a sound, healthy article. The opening price was from 6d to 8d per lb.

At the Carrickboy petty sessions on Tuesday week the court was crowded to hear the cases between Mr. Murdock Campbell, Clonsaster Castle, and Messrs. Arthur and John H. Moore, Roseleighp. TIPPERARY.

At the adjourned monthly meeting last week of the Nenagh Town Board on Monday, James Healy, Esq., in the chair, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted: Resolved—That it is the opinion of this body that the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1874 as it relates to towns containing under 6,000 inhabitants, would be more satisfactorily administered by the Town Commissioners than by Boards of Poor Law Guardians, who are already overburdened with other business, and have not the same local knowledge, nor as direct an interest as municipal bodies, in whom the authority was formerly vested." Resolved—"Inasmuch as landlords of towns in Ireland, where the Town Commissioners are or hereafter may be intrusted with the administration of the Public Health (Ireland) Acts of 1874, or any acts incorporated therewith, are so much benefited by the due administration of such acts as occupying tenants, we deem it just that the rates levied under the authority of those acts should be borne equally by landlords and tenants; and pray that in future legislation there may be a clause inserted in any bill introduced authorizing the deduction by the tenant from the landlord half such rates, as in the case of poor law acts."

The fondre was a signal for others, and the sky was soon illumined by the blaze from all the hills for miles around. The Doctor having, in a very feeling manner, thanked the people for their good wishes towards himself and his brother, was carried on their shoulders around the bonfire amidst tremendous cheering. Several barrels of tar were then broached, and all drank the health of the owner of Cockeborough. Before separating cheers were given for the jury, for Mr. Purdon's counsel, and for his attorney, Mr. Mooney.

WEXFORD.

John Fullam, poor-rate collector, Enniscorthy, has been committed for trial on the charge of having embezzled nearly £1,000 of the poor-rates collected by him.

With the view of adopting measures for the improvement of the harbor entrance the Wexford Harbor Commissioners held a communication with Sir John Hawkshaw, C. E., who will give an opinion on the subject. Several large vessels belonging to this port, and bound with valuable cargoes from Black Sea ports, recently arrived in Waxford bay, but owing to the dangerous state of the entrances the owners were obliged to send them to Dublin and elsewhere.

A meeting, says the Wexford People, was held in Gyngaue, on Sunday, for the purpose of forming an association for defense and prosecuting against unseasonable hours. The chair was taken by Mr. Sutton, Hyane. Mr. John Bolger acted as Honorary Secretary to the meeting. Prayer, duly proposed, and Mr. Bolger seconded.

The revival of conversions to Catholicism in England is taking place among the working classes. In the large towns the number of converts is daily on the increase. The junction of the countless neophytes. New various establishments are rising everywhere. The Duchess of Norfolk has just laid the foundation stone of a new church, and the fourth of the five churches she had vowed to build in honour of the five wounds of our Lord. Besides these, the hallowed hands of the Archbishop of Catholic basilica in Arundel. The light of such deeds, and countless of perfection, said in days when religious belief has grown cold, receive a new impulse, and even England was known as "Our Lady's Dowry," when rich and poor united in raising those grand edifices for the worship of God and the edcosation of youth that were the pride of our ancestors. Pope Romes Benedictine has been invited by the Bishop of Birmingham to select a house for the Benedictine Order, which is the hope of the land, and the novitiate are full of subjects.

The Rev. William Hennessy, Catholic chaplain of Waterford Union Workhouse, died at his residence, Dunmore, on the morning of February 16th, in the 40th year of his age and ninth of his ministry. Father Hennessy was born in the suburbs of Waterford city, and was connected with many respectable families in the city and county.

For the Diocese of Grass Valley.

1. All the faithful who have completed their 21st year are bound to observe the fast and abstinence from the use of flesh meat. But, by dispensation, the use of flesh meat is allowed at the principal meal on Sundays, Tuesday, Thursday during Lent, except on the Sundays of Lent, Holy Thursday, Holy Saturday, the Ember days, and the Vigils of Pentecost, the Assumption, and Christmas. 3. Some prayers, at option, are recommended for Lent, particularly on the Sundays, in which flesh meat is allowed.

4. Before taking a penitential time the pastors are required to instruct the people on the nature and end of Christian mortification, and also the grievous obligation they are under of complying with their Easter duty, which is to be fulfilled from the first Sunday of Lent; they will therefore, on the commencement of Lent, explain to the faithful the necessity of attending, before all other things, to the salvation of their souls, by the use of the sacrament then to the faithful discharge of their duties to their families, and to the world, so as to avoid the overwhelming misfortune of dying impenitent, and the consequent everlasting torments in that dreadful place where there is no redemption. The following regulations may seem superfluous.

THE MONITOR AND GUARDIAN.
SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1877.

THE FIRST PARTY.

Mr. to Mrs. about Mercury:
Was invited to a party,
Your company from 8 to 10,"
The invitation said;
And the maiden was delighted
To think she was invited
To sit up till the hour when the big folks went in bed.

The rosy little midget
Was ready for the party in Bridget,
With ribbons and hands and flowers a-lig, in Anna-belle's delight;
And said, with sparkling beauty,
"I will be the sweetest party"
If you're there yourself, me darlint! I wish it was to night!"

The great display of frilling
Was positively killing!
And, oh, the little bodies! and the lovely sash so wide!
And the gloves so very roomy!
And the way Mr. McCarty fairly regarded her with pride.

They gave nimble directions,
With great attention
Of "Will you stop at all?" and "Don't do this or that!"
"Do not be so rude!"
But, what with their carousing
Miss Annabel McCarty didn't hear a single word.

Then came the supper!
And the night was all enchanting;
As if lady-bugs could be, and were, positively jubilee!
There was laughing, there was prating,
And every thing that's fitting
And did and young together had a universal time.

The dear little midget
Was the youngest at the party,
And every move she made
Was beautifully driven;
For a doll she sat demurely
Or a rule, thinking sure by
It would cover her face so red and frolic with its rest.

The noise had growing louder,
The naughty boys would crowd her,
"I think you're very pretty, Miss Bridget!" the little lady said;
And then, without a warning,
Her home-instruction scorning,
She screamed, "I want my supper, and I want to go to bed!"

Now, by folks who are older
Than her, but little wiser,
For goodness, if the kids were bound, we've often felt inclined
To do the same ourself, before the end.
As did Annabel McCarty;
But we hadn't the courage, and we couldn't speak out aloud!
—Mr. Nobody. Josephine Pollard.

Divorce in New England.

The foundation of society is the domestic relation. The State is built of families. If a man would construct out of badly burned brick a very lofty and massive building he might naturally expect that at any moment its own weight would crush its low-walls and bring the fabric down in ruins. Several large vessels belonging to a prudence structure, and to have strength and firmness must be built of sound material. That material being the family, it is of the very highest importance that the family or domestic relation should exist in its purity and strength.

Any tendency that tends to weaken the bonds of the family must be of enough, and injure with dry rot the very material out of which the great fabric of civil society is built. And of what elements does the family consist? Of the union of husband and wife and the relationship of parents and child. Put husband and wife asunder, and the family is scattered, the blinding decency the obedience due by children to their parents, and insufficient of parents and children, and the cohesion of the family is turned into bare of sand.

Our wise and gracious statesmen of America are perceiving rapidly and they can on the bright project of destroying the family tie for the purpose of making a strong nation. They are not to be bound down by the shallowness of men who have machine-of railroads and telegraphs. The age is always old fogyism. Hence the public school is fostered by the State at private cost, and divorce makes strangers of man and wife. How long can society hold together when it has impressed into condit on like that described in the following paragraph from the Augusta (Maine) Journal?

"It is a monumental cause of most unhappy men and women, but only a small sample of what is going on in nearly all the other counties in the State. Twenty-two women asked to be divorced from their husbands. These cases have been made miserable by cruelty, neglect, drunkenness, crime and desertion; and who shall say that the Court has not been the instrument of blessing in setting the poor wives free from the marriage relation? In six cases husbands ask for divorce from their wives on the ground of high temper, incompatibility of disposition, and in seven cases a strong leaning toward ugliness and absolute cruelty."

Twenty-eight recent divorces in one county! It must be remembered that this kind of divorce imp'ies no blame in marriage, and

The hours, the graves of suffering alone shall be
The records these left behind us to tell of pain
And the silent rising curses of the wan Freedom's bondmen ask.

IV.

The Truth of God moves slowly, and her years
Are measured by the ages and the spheres;
With Him and yet not heard the tight of years;
The shame of former bondage, the heritage ran
With equal pace; but measure, woe by woe,
Of blood and tears and sobbed, never ceased
Yet in that heaven God's work is ever done,
But mortals see not beyond the hour, and wait
Impatient for the song, the song of nations saved.

V.

That one shall rise above the Atlantic wave!
The dawn is coming, and the time nearly nears
That through the darkness such their inner gaze,
Are indeed seers and more. Alas reader More
Grows paler as the foster morning's hue
Of crimson shows the last day and night the title
Of weeping Erin linked with sentient woes
And pitied pays when sentience yet kicks,
But which in patient vassal's modern rage subsides.

VI.

And then last sunrise, the, the widowed land,
Although by sickness killed, shall rise with the first
Between the shore and sea, for distant inland
Of wasted vitality the hour yet obtains.
With vests of hide and staves and star that Star
Befell a former land flame set to darkness's bane.
In that first land the echo of thy night
Has carried the dawn's word and light then the sun
Is leader where Freedom reigns to keep her hallowed vow.

Then, mother, if once more to rest if to our grief
We shall not be allowed, we shall not be left
Unaided by the Almighty's hand, but shall be Protected beneath those the many title
Of widowed mother, and the sun shall rise on a deeper vow than this our tears to fall.
Oh, whose are these sighs? Whose are these sobs?
Peal forth at reaper from the redeemed land!
We are, and glad are our sons to be counted as such!

The Oration.

After the "Star Spangled Banner" by the orchestra, General P. F. Walsh, the orator of the day, delivered the following eloquent address, which was frequently interrupted by enthusiastic applause:

With the coming of the spring time, with the verdure in the hill, the shamrock blooms again, and the harp seemed to the brightest memories of the virtues the greatness and the chivalry of our country, to exist conquering and to conquer, their consecrations sanctities that apostolic mission. Even to-day, some follower of a Columba, or a Virgilius may be found far away on the banks of the Ottawa, in the wilds of Australia in the forests of Africa unawakened by the wondrous sight, surrounded by groups of dusky pagans, to whom he is telling the story that the memory of his island home suggests, and with a shamrock in his hand, to illustrate to them—as St. Patrick did to our Celtic sires—the mystery of which it is a symbol. As to the manner in which Ireland has preserved the character of St. Patrick through persecution fierce as the forest fires, I shall only say, that so long as constancy is regarded as a meritorious attribute, fidelity to principle as a noble trait, and fortitude in suffer persecution for the right of conscience an exaltation of the noblest examples, the middle ages of Ireland will point its people to the faith of their fathers will challenge the admiration of mankind. Such is the religion of the Shamrock, the midst of her penitential shade, changes the Lenten song of sadness into the angel hymn of gladness, and the glad sons of the Te Deum are heard above the solemn measures of the Miserere Mei.

I shall now endeavor to explain its national significance, celebrated by parade and accomplishes, banquet and all the other methods which our people adopt to express their feelings and exhibit their love of country. In the connective the celebration of to-day is significant of the preservation of civilization in Ireland and the achievements of patriotism. Whoever studies the history of English misrule in that ill-fated land cannot fail to observe the efforts that were made—to deprive her people of all sources of knowledge—and misuse of science. Her schools and colleges were razed, her language, the treasury of her literature, proscribed, and even the bard who sang of her fame was outlawed, for, as Sir Walter Scott tells us,

> The sacks of the bare tree
> Had called the harshest air to see.

The purpose of such a policy is plain, and enlightened statesmen can be held in contempt enthrallment. To enslave and keep them so you must necessarily debase them, but that is not so easy of accomplishment. A people without enlightenment or civilization accept it more readily than a people who possess it are willing to relinquish it, but the struggle is more to the one more willing wing then be returns to the mist-enveloped earth. That proscriptive law, supported by the sword of victory is one to degrade, have failed, and that Ireland has been preserved to be an example to the world is not to say a brilliant nation, is something of which not only Irishmen, but humanity may rejoice. Ireland, in fact, by conquerors, in taking a historical retrospect to day, it is gratifying to the sensibilities that the land that English policy would have extinguished has given to literature some of its brightest stars, or science some of its most distinguished masters, and to philosophy some of its profoundest teachers; that the light of its genius has never been quenched by the darkness, and the green hillsides, the sacred shamrock, and the green hillsides, where the Irish rebels of '98" made their graves have been trodden by victory's car, are as dear, nay, dearer, to the hearts of Irishmen than the field where Bruce triumphed, and the valley of Runnymede, for the union of the island, as far as the memories of the past are concerned, is not to be asked, has all the pageantry no significance, but to commemorate the past, looking forward with hope, to borrow some of their luster to adorn ourselves? I should be sorry to see a people without a past, and that past were not fired sinking to decay. A nation which has to turn to its past for its glories, its traditions, its poor to its graves for its heroes and its benefactors, is full open the hope and dignity of its present.

The present significance of the celebration is, that the Irish people, by its universal recognition of to-day, show that they continue to adhere to the teachings of St. Patrick, and continue to practice the lessons he gave—neither her self condition, years of exile, nor the probability that many of her children will never see her more, alter or loosen.

That this love is genuine, is proven by the heroism and fortitude of those who have suffered for Ireland in our day, and we shall suffer, for no other offense than striving to make her free. It is also, I think, attested by the respect that is manifested by the participants in the celebration to day, who march the streets, leading in many instances their children by the hand, to show them one scene on one spot—on the contrary, they are frequently laughed at for their pains, and sometimes hanged; but despite the laugh, the jibe and the bate, they don their green regalia, affix the shamrock on their breasts, and muster and march; and I tell you the shamrock has been planted in the hearts of nearly courage in his breast, of the spirit in his being, that, whatever found in prisons or in scaffolds, preserves and perpetuates religions, that have boyriests of those who have been a reverent spring, or sower in darkness at his green regalia.

The celebration of to day is also signifi in that its world-wide observance, as a protest against England's rule in Ireland. We believe that England has no moral right to rule there, not even the right of conquest, for Ireland never has been conquered. Her rule is a rule of might, not of right; of force, not of favor; of usurpation, not of consent. She is there as the Moor was in Spain, with the exception that the Moor was far more magnanimous: as the Spaniard was in Holland, as the Austrian was in Switzerland. She is there as the Turk is in Europe, encamped, not incorporated with the life and soul of the nation. She is in the barracks, in the offices, scarcely in the museums, but not represented; and from the hearts of the people, and just. Ireland, as sure as the Moors were driven from Spain, as the Spaniard was driven from Holland, as the Austrian was driven from Switzerland, and as the Turks are surely will England be driven from Ireland. Tala has so long been an almost accomplished fact, that it cannot with certainty be said that it is impossible of attainment. Had Edward Bruce not fallen at Dundalk, had Don Juan not defeated the overtures of Mountjoy, and secured O'Neill and O'Donnell, had Owen Roe been spared to cope with Cromwell, had Sarsfield delayed the signing of the treaty of Limerick, had the Volunteers of '82 obeyed the inspiration that swayed them, had Napoleon gone to Ireland instead of to Egypt or Russia—England's role in Ireland would have long since ceased.

It is said that opportunities lost never return. But who would say that with the past before us, we produced them continue, others will not be presented? Let the peace of Europe be broken, let a Bismarck or Gortschakoff arise, and let the power of England be shaken, and enough of men to guard them in Ireland, until such time that the people can rally around the standard of liberty. Enough of English role in Ireland will have tolled; then the long looked and prayed for opportunity will occur. Then Erin, and Liberty, summoning her standard sprite of Concord, Brotherhood and Peace, will raise the land that in all her vicissitudes has been faithful to her memory and to her God, and the sun of her nationality would shine forth, and the enthusiast's hope would be realized, and the poet's prophecy fulfilled, that the graves of martyrs and the solace of hero-rule sacrifice an awakened nation to the cause of freedom, while with more reason than when the disastrous news of Ireriarde defeat, indicated the sympathies for expatriated Irish soldiers fighting for France, caused a former monarch to "commiserate the misfortunes of the brave Irish nation." Another may have cause to impugn the policy that has made Ireland her foe of England.

But mee will say, while such an event is not impossible, yet history teaches us that few insurance has foreign aid brought freedom to a people, or insurrection stained with blood been successful. The success of Ireland's many unsuccessful attempts and the misfortunes that ensued, are known to all history, they ask, to abandon the ever-watched struggle—the vain uprisings—the useless sacrifices—the fruitless efforts, the impotent attempts to break a chain which only serves to bind closer, and which would have never healed, the offering of your best and bravest of each generation and fresh victims for the block and scaffold—woe.3 it not be better to accept the decree of conquest and submit to the yoke of the conqueror? See Scotland, they say, and Wales; they have long since forfeited their independence, and are contented with her mercy, and received it in no stinted measure. Sin-are men ask the question, is not Ireland a dependency for Ireland, and they are deserving of respectful answer. Wales there is no natural distinction. They are all portions of the same island. They are the same race, and were it not likelihood destined to be one nation from the beginning. They are divided by no natural boundary line in the ocean, separated from the others by leagues of sea, and kept distinct from each other for a considerable time. Yet, as counterbalance the annihilation of her independence, and even her very name as a nation, people of any favorite poet, Goldsmith,

> Sweet country there loveliest
> Where poor, but honest, they retire.

Such is the opinion of Burns, and who interpreted Scottish feeling more accurately than he?

Time will not permit me to dwell on all the instances our history affords where Ireland for peace and tolerance endeavored to make honorable terms with her enemies. From this time that Henry II. refused to restrain the excesses of the Norman adventurers and Strongbow, who preferred to exercise clemency towards the Pictish princess, every attempt to make terms with Ireland has been met with denial. Ireland has never received a concession in a spirit of peace, even when it was prudent, only when she was in a position to enforce it. When yielded, because of fear, and as soon as the menace was removed, and as a rule, when such terms were granted, they were but the sign exposed to the fury of the storm.

The kindly results that followed the few concessions she obtained furnished ample and suggestive proof of how easy it is for a spirit of justice to conciliate and tranquillize the people of any nation. Good begets good, and evil produces evil. If you sow a dragon's tooth you must not expect but it will bloom as olive branch. England has never seen so in Ireland other than dragon's teeth, and it is not to be wondered at if they have invariably grown up armed men.

From Hackney to Isaac Butt, she has regarded as an enemy all who have pleaded for Ireland. In matters little what character of redress may be proposed, whether by statute or by the sword, by national independence or Home Rule, every proposition for Ireland's amelioration, whether extreme or partial, have all given occasion for proof how little England is to do Ireland justice.

Under form of remonstrance one secretly conceived than O'Connell's; yet he was hooted down, imprisoned, and at length opposed with fixed bayonets and shotted guns, though moral force had in no age a more zealous and faithful champion. The trunk of Irish liberty is—and in that truth is the solution of the struggles of centuries—watered by the sweat of centuries and reverses, and of the "irrepressible conflict" between both nations—alone at his green regalia.

The celebration of to day is also signifi in that its world-wide observance, as a protest against England's rule in Ireland. We believe that England has no moral right to rule there, not even the right of conquest, for Ireland never has been conquered. Her rule is a rule of might, not of right; of force, not of favor; of usurpation, not of consent. At a recent meeting of a society called "The Pioneer and Historical Society of Oregon," an address was delivered at Astoria by a Mr. W. H. Gray, which, for untruthfulness and bigotry, could not be surpassed. Our excellent and vigilant contemporary, the Catholic Sentinel, took the speaker to task for some of his wild assertion, and thus disposes of one of them:

Passing over the first part of the address we come to the pith and marrow of the whole distribe, where the President announces in this his horrible bobby—the Jesuits—after this fashion:

A DISCOVERY OF AN ELEMENT OF POWER.

The Hudson Bay Company, with its absolute control of the trading interests of the country, found, in the space of four years, that the American missionary establishments were, by their moral influence and agricultural improvements, destroying their future prospects of Indian trade and gathering around them an element of power such as would, if not checked, drive them from this country. To circumvent this moral and civilizing influence, and destroy the American settlement, they introduced and sustained Jesuits from foreign countries, who arrived with the companies over land and supreme in the fall of 1838, having previously dismissed their English Episcopal chaplain (Mr. Beaver) and wife.

The "Jesuits from foreign countries" alluded to by the infatuated President of the Oregon society with the long name, were no others than our beloved Archbishop, Most Rev. F. N. Blanchet, and the Rev. Modeste Demers, afterwards Bishop of Vancouver's Island; neither of whom belonged to the Order hated with such gusto by President Gray! But, then, so entire absence of his orders every missionary is a Jesuit, whose only aim is to proselytize the Goddess of Liberty, and to place a Roman eagle on the shores of the American eagle! This is Gray's hallucination relative to Jesuits, and being the all-absorbing idea of his life, it naturally manifests itself in the years of his intellectual decadence.

We do not intend to controvert the insane expressions of Mr. Gray, but we merely desire to inform the members of the Society which he recently misrepresented, that there is not in the whole State of Oregon a single Jesuit teaching Indians or anybody else! The whole idea is simply an ignus fatuus of the disordered imagination of Mr. Gray, whose mental aberration on the Jesuits has demoralized his intellectual faculties—so that he never sees the blackened stump of an Oregon tree that his hallucination does not shape it into the form of a Jesuit. Nor can he even partake of a Shoalwater Bay bivalve without professing its demolition with the soul-soothing soliloquy—

"Ah! wart then but a Saint smote!
That I might swallow him whole!"

Archbishop Blanchet—one of Gray's "Jesuits from foreign parts"—has resided in Oregon for forty years, and if his career is to be taken as a specimen of the lives of "foreign Jesuits" in America, we heartily thank Mr. Gray for citing him. This venerable prelate of this Church of God has lived among the people of Oregon until he has earned a patriarchal years, yet there breathes not a man on the American continent who dare lift his voice to accuse him of a solitary action unworthy the most exalted station among men. For forty years this "foreign Jesuit" has never been known to sully his sacred office with the political strife which has surrounded him; for forty years this venerable "foreign Jesuit" has seen Oregon emerge from primitive isolation to that of an important State in the Union, and he has measurably promoted its prosperity. He has dotted its hills and valleys with edifices erected to the true worship of Almighty God; he has erected schools and colleges for the education of American youth; he has erected hospitals for the care of the sick; he has caused to come hither thousands of our present citizens; he has introduced into the State two religious Orders of men who have been for long years instructing the rising generation and in visiting the sick, relieving the distressed, comforting the afflicted, and soothing the sorrows of the widow and orphan. These are the results of the presence of this "foreign Jesuit" in Oregon, and he, Mr. Gray, we grasp your fanatical fingers, and, in the spirit of charity, we thank thee for the evil allusion you thus make to the introduction of "foreign Jesuits" into the State of Oregon.

Bishop Modeste Demers labored many years in Oregon. He has gone to his heavenly reward, and not even the traditionary pen of Gray has ever dared to sully the purity of his pious life. Both of these sentiments and exemplary praises of the Catholic Church can well afford to instruct their characters in the results of the contemporary prejudices among whom their lives have been spent, and as an unanswerable assertions of a maudlin monomaniac and even the shadow of a blemish over the honor of their fame! They were the agencies of the Church in this land; the Church has honored them with its high dignity of the episcopate, and every Oregonian should feel a pride that we have had such exalted characters among the pioneers of civilization in Oregon.

Near the village of Dorne, in Germany, there died recently an old Catholic priest, who had served up to a late hour of his life and made the parish church his sole legatee and this disposition was well known to his natural heir, a young physician, living on the Rhine. When was the latter's surprise on learning, after the clergyman's decease, that short time previous the whole ecclesiastical of the village had visited him on his death bed, and prevailed upon him in his less is property to his relatives, as they feared if it were left to the church it might eventually be confiscated by Bismarck.

A NEWSPAPER QUESTION.—Quin was once at a small dinner party. The master of the house, pushing a delicious pudding towards the wit, begged him to taste it. A gentleman had just before greedily helped himself to an immense piece of it. "Pray," said Quin, looking first at the gentleman's plate and then at the dish, "which is the pudding?"

"Look upon this picture and on that!"

We have all heard a great deal of Turkish intolerance, yet Constantinople is more liberal in the choice of its representatives than New Hampshire. In the Turkish capital there were recently elected as representatives five Turks, four Christians and one Jew. Neither Turk nor Jew would be eligible in New Hampshire, nor Christian, unless a "Protestant."—Boston Pilot.

A clergyman was preparing his discourses for Sunday, stopping occasionally to review what he had written, and to note that which he was disposed to disapprove, when he was accosted by his little boy, who somewhat put few sommers, "Father, does God tell you what to preach?" "Certainly, my child." "Then what makes you scratch it out?"

IN SAN JOSE.

The 17th of March has come and gone, and the anniversary of the birthday of Ireland's Patron Saint has received another fitting commemoration. The observance of the occasion in San Jose was creditable to the Irish citizens, was pleasant and participated in it. The weather was delightful, and hundreds of people came in from the country to join with the throng in San Jose. Large delegations of the Ancient Order of Hibernians from Gilroy, Santa Clara and other places were present, and when the procession moved at 10 o'clock, headed by Bronson & Daggett's band, there were several thousand people on the street. At St. Patrick's Church, Rev Father Dowling conducted the religious services, and an eloquent eulogy on the faith of Ireland was delivered by Rev. John B. McNally, of East Brooklyn. After the services were over, the procession formed under the marshalship of John Paiste, of Gilroy, and after marching through the principal streets, proceeded to Music Hall, which by this time was thronged with people. D. J. Tooby, President of the day, called the meeting to order, and made a brief address on the character of the occasion, etc., in his usual felicitous style. Mrs. H. H. Mayo was then introduced, and a poem, written by S. W. DeLacy, was delivered in an eloquent and feelingmanner, and amid frequent bursts of applause. The poem is here on our columns unless up to lay the press over till next week.

J. T. Malone followed with the following oration.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: There is ever something in occasions such as that which calls us together to-day that awakens a thrill through hearts whom nature has endowed with even less of enthusiastic vigor than she has those of Irishmen. Why one day should be more to man than another I am sure has little reason in the condition of natural things. The same sun shines on the same cloudy sky obscures to-day as yesterday, and the same scenes, bright and drear to us for their associations of joy or cheerless for those of woe, gladden or sadden our eyes without dependence upon the fixing of the setting of the sun. But some days are more to men than others, and such man has for himself a day dear and holy—some sweet anniversary or some time of sad but sacred recollection. Families, communities and nations have each their anniversaries, all devoted to some corresponding commemorative idea. Some are peculiarly cherished for the commemoration of their joys and woes as individuals and as commonwealths with jealous carefulness, ever desirous of the keeping of time, it is not strange that we should find the custom still preserved, and it is in the hearts of men that we must seek the reason.

This day, while it appeals to us for all that belongs to the due observance of the national anniversary of a great people, brings with its recurrence something more. To us it is the day of Ireland—is not that, enough? While to other peoples their national anniversaries bring the memory of all that is glorious in their past, to Ireland's anniversary is ushered in by a joy that is free-born and joyous. When men set apart days on this solstitude of people, that inward monitor who holds communion with the heart of man demands. Why come these people here? Exiles, homeless, fugless, and branded with the stigma of rebellion; what have they to do with nationality and national commemoration? Let the object of my present task be the answer of that question.

Yes, my friends, all nations and peoples of the earth who celebrate these anniversaries can say with pride, "this is our nation's day"; but Ireland and Irishmen can only say, "this is our nation's day." But be it said without a blush, for what though force and fraud have wrested from us our country and our national name, they have not and they cannot pluck from our hearts the love of land that is as dear as their own ruby drops, and leaves us but to follow the too often martyred soul to heaven.

Without a home we may be, and without a flag, but we have made all earth our country and all flags are proud to shelter us. The bright sun which rises upon her lands is our lord's day and warm the blood in Irish hearts that beat in unison with yours, to the same lofty thoughts that stir your souls, till the last cankered body lay around the peopled orb. Oh, no, my friends, it is merely material reasons that justify this pomp and circumstance of anniversary observance, there would be found but little in the history of these exiles of Ireland and her people to give our assembly here a motive and a cause. Then you, then, make no answer to the question, "Why come you here?" Answer it proudly, that the ages of oppression you have suffered have not made you forget the glorious glory and the present worth of Erin's sons and daughters, and that the tears which you have wrung from your aching eyes have but watered the growing hope that the promise of that steadfast worth will be fulfilled, and that ancient glory be restored.

Ireland as she was—a nation once again. Lips more eloquent than mine have often uttered the sacred aspiration, and there is not a heart that is worthy of the warning pressure of a true Irish Irish blood that does not echo it. Ireland, Erin, the old sod. What associations cluster in the very name. Let us go back into the past. Let us leave the worry and perplexity of the present, the hopes, politics and hate reasons, and follow for a moment the light foot of memory through the dim paths of our country's history. When he, whose sainted memory we renew to-day, came for the first time to the shores of the sea-girdled island, that centuries before the song of Miletus had begun to people with a race who were to become the noble blood in the veins of sons of Sidon and of Troy, of Carthage and of Tyre, he found there a people and a nation worthy of that title and of him. Not like their present bore fruit among them by the bloodless victory of the cause of Christ of Nazareth. Those dazzling spirits whom old Phœnicia bore and cradled by the much-encroaching sea, the same polyphloisboio thalasses that Homer sung, the only souls that dared the unknown terrors of the seas, drove their adventurous prows in the face of storms and lightnings, over the treacherous Syrtes, past Scylla and Charybdis, and out into the unknown bays and the Pillars of Hercules, even into the boreal ocean. They were the first discoverers —they the heralds of civilization. How many times have their returning barques ushered into the presence of Egyptian, Assyrian, and Grecian pomp, tidings and witnesses of wonder equal to those with which the indomitable sailors of Genoa astounded the empires of the earth when, from the decks of his mere-carved canvel, he told them that another world lay hidden beyond the limit of the western sea. Trade, the calm health of nations, followed in their wake. They planted their colonies upon every shore they visited, and by their keen superiority on sea and wielded empire where first they sought but wealth. The shores of Erin had long been familiar to their eyes. Her mountains were to them gold and precious stones, and her fair valleys teemed with the richest harvests. The softness of her skies and the beauty of her landscapes wood them to a sweeter life than that which coursed the gorils of the waves and storms. When Miletus and his followers spread their sails and turned their faces toward her shores, they went to found a nation. Let the tongue of scorn be silent upon their cause of flight, and let destruction and the ruin of the walls of Rome were cemented with the blood of fratricide; that Athens rose beneath a traitor's hand; and that ages have since washed out the stain of murder from that boasted Norman blood which England claims the fountain of her glory.

Erin, under the sway of the Milesian kings, became great enough to send her armies even down to the walls of that Rome which had begun to awe the world. Well-considered tradition tells us that the Gallic chief whose arms laid Rome in ru and who dictated a conqueror's terms that is ne of her forum, was one of those bold, adventurous spirits, whose ancient Erin nurtured on her bosom, and his Irish name of Brin is stamped indelibly upon the annals of great Rome in the Latin form of Brennus. The last of the pagan kings of Ireland perished by the hand of God, at the head of his army upon the frozen Alps, and his sad followers, looking back on ancient Italy and vague for one conquest, turned their backs upon the cruel path and bore the blasted corpse of Dathy back to kingly Tara. In the latter site upon the throne of the Ri-Nal, the reign of the soldier is ended, and the sword of conquest rests in its silent sheath. Erin changes her warrior garb for the robe of peace, and puts on her brow the sacred lay of learning. All over her valleys and mountains, by her beautiful lakes and rivers, there have risen cloisters, schools and colleges, and her people, made happier by the possession of the pure legacy of faith and science than in the opportunity of universal empire, stand before the world a glorious triumphal spectacle of virtue, honor and integrity, coupled with the profoundest learning and the highest intellectual endowments. It was this period which inspired the poet's theme:

> Isle sacred and free, the wonder and envy,
> And a bright gold ring on a staff she bore;
> Forth the Princess went, and her maidens followed,
> Her sparkling gems of snow-white wand.
> "Lady, dost thou not wear that royal circlet,
> So fair and lovely through the lands way:
> Ah, Erin, a gem of purest ray serene,
> As sun to be adopted by women or gold!"

> For many a day, for many a year,
> Now on Erin will offer me harm,
> For though they love women and golden store,
> Sir Knight, they love honor and virtue more."

It was this period which gave to Ireland the name of Island of Saints, Island of Sacred Isle. It was this period which made her the school-master of Europe. It was this period that brought him to her shores whom English poets and historians justly call the father of English civilization, the great Alfred. From the Isle he went to obtain that learning and that wisdom which could not be obtained in his own. It was this period, too, that gave to the world a system of complete jurisprudence, which, though subjected to the scorn and prejudice of a jealous and conquering ten centuries, only measured by the duration of English power, has received the most unqualified than that most undeservedly much belauded hybrid, the common law of England. Let no man suppose that I am about to speak with more regard of respect for that system; it has much that is noble in it, and much that is the foundation of law and custom have ameliorated its harshness and destroyed its true rigor, and as in name, but in very little more, the foundation of our present laws, it is entitled to our respect for that of good which it contains. But, my friends, I have more pleasure in making an unrelieved comparison, I will give you the laws of the Brehon Code, and you shall be umpires. Here is a set of lectures delivered in the University of Oxford, England, by Sir Henry Sumner Maine, and devoted to the comparative study of Ancient Law, and called "The Early Histories of Institutions." Permit me to quote an extract:

> "The system of legal rules contained in these law tracts is distinguished by a merit which is not repeatedly condemned by Anglo-Irish legislation, and repeatedly noticed by English observers of Irish manners, namely, by the extent of its territory. It is the same law which in 1367 a statute of Irish Parliament denounces as the mere Brehon laws. It is the same 'lewd' and 'unreasonable' custom which Sir John Davis contrasts with the 'laws of England,' and which he regards as that which he attributes such desolation and barbarism in Ireland as 'the like was never seen in any country that professed the name of Christ.' Even if the worst that has been said by English writers of the Brehon laws, and of the Irish who were true, we might console ourselves by turning over the pages of Tacitus, the inquiry father of immediate promise to the world than ours, and observe how much of the wealth of modern thought has been obtained from the dross which earlier generations had rejected. Even though the Irish were virtually the same institutions as those out of which the just and honorable law of England has grown. Why should the Irish, involved in their development such different paths, it is the fashion with some to call the Brehon law, as it gives an impartial decision, I doubt much its wholly attributing the difference to native faults of Irish character. We who are now to examine coolly the ancient Irish law in its actual condition, can see that it is a very remarkable body of archaic law, unusually pure from its origin. It has some analogies with the Roman law of the earliest times—more with the Scandinavian law, some with the law of the Sclavonic race, and with that of the Germanic (there are particularly strong) with the Hindoo law, and quite enough with the old Germanic law of all kinds and ages to account for, or, at least, to suggest the comparison which English observers so constantly institute between the laws of England. Nor does the Brehon law altogether disappoint the expectations of the patriotic Irishmen who looked forward to its recovery. Pathey says it was published as opusty and reasonableness which was in force among the BARBAROUS JURISPRUDENCE of England."

The emphasis is mine—the words are the same. Let an Englishman, entered himself at the bars of Englishmen, "the halls of England's ancient learning—the University of Oxford. O the hand of the God of retribution! Over the grave of Alfred, and within the walls of the temple of learning, which was the ancient fountain of the glorious civilization of that England which now sneers at the Irish institutions that time-tried code of written law from which in Irish schools he culled the knowledge of imperishable glory, and upon which a people have been fairly made then that be, educated to the love of their own country, would have made it the model of his own, and taken his still honored rules of jurisprudence from its true, pure, time-tempered principles.

In the politics of the ancient Irish there ever appeared the same equity that we displayed in their laws. Had I an audience of Irish people I should expect the appreciation of family right, the truest representative of the family possessing the right to rule, from which the exclusion of the son by the daughter or the kin by that of Tanistry, is derived. Periodically all of the local chiefs, ranged with their personal followings, assembled at a grand Parliament, where the Arch King, as the king of all Ireland was known, presided over the affairs of state whose importance were submitted to two co-acting bodies, one composed of the local lower chiefs and the other of the hereditaries kingsand various members of the learned professions. Here was chosen the monarch of Ireland, and upon the death of the incumbent here was the Tanist installed upon the throne. Should the monarch prove unworthy the Irish people had all of the better elements which constitute the beauty of a people's power, and as nature's greatest peaceful people, they maintained only so much military force as was necessary for the internal police of their country.

Two military training was a necessary part of the education of their chiefs, and no Spartan youth ever endured a stricter course of war-like study than the ancient Fenian or Knight of the Red Branch. The virtue of that training is attested by the success with which the onslaught of the indomitable Vikings were repulsed, the iron-hearted pirates whose gory blades and blazing brands had ushered shrieking terror even to the gates of the imperial halls of France, then almost mistress of the Western world. For hundreds of years those bold and cruel vultures of the North were forced their black ships out of the stormy Scagerack and over the Northern Sea, and lowered not their somber realm until they bore it into some peaceful Irish bay, and shook its folds above some horrid scene of midnight carnage and the brutal massacre of some unguarded and unprotected monastery or hamlet. They found the hearts of Innisfail on many occasions the hearts of bar sons were stronger than the spears of the white strangers. There is a beautiful story which illustrates the ruler and the ruled in relation of the inner hut of the women of that time of conquest. O'Malachy, weak and conquered-ing, had allowed the Viking Thorgils to take a steel-fast hold upon the island. Soon the whole country groaned with the fierce oppression of the pirate tyrant. His bloodthirsty followers overran the rich valleys. Thorgils fixed his palace on lake island near the royal residence, and freedom, security and peace were unknown in Erin. The Irish soldier sought in vain to throw off the yoke —their weak king, shorn of all but the name of power, despondent and despairing, would not rouse himself to action. The brutal Northman, forgetting in his arrogance that courage may awe a nation into momentary and successful, demanded that Melcha, the daughter of O'Malachy and fifty of her maidens, present to his palace for the sport of himself and his retainers. Struck dumb at the fiendish outrage, the unfortunate father sought delay in seeming to accede. Aroused by his agony from the lethargy of unresistance, he formed a bold resolve to rid his country of her tyrant. He sent out swift emissaries who found eager thousands ready for the word. He sought his daughter, he told her of the horrid fate proposed for her, and of the plan of deliverance. He asked to work out full relief or rim for himself and for his people. A part of his plan was that consenting to the proposed visit to the palace, and that she should go herself to his stronghold with the fifty maidens destined for the lake. Like Judith in the Jewish girl shrank not from peril in her people's need. Lulled by the seeming resignation with which his wishes were met, the tyrant waited patiently the day and time when the maidens were to be delivered to him in the lake palace walls. In secret, O'Malachy's armed thousands gathered. Upon the day of the visit above the pirate fortress were filled with the impatient bands. The time came. The maidens, fifty maidens and Melcha, were landed, and arrived at the palace of Thorgils, in the midst of a mad debauch. Intoxicated with the evening's entertainment was the recital of "Robert Kemmy's Dream" and the name of Ireland's own Joe, Frank D. Ryan, a pupil of the Christian Brothers' Institute in this city. Thorgils, with the fire of young gentleman acquitted himself was received. Then came the dance of the Irish girls, and the rare with the warm approval of his guests, he was invited to lead the dance with Melcha. The dance ended, the Irish girls were dismissed upon the heads of the tyrant's followers. The night of terror began. Any day or hour may flash out the news that the Powers have appealed to that dread arbitrament, a general war. And in that event England cannot hope to escape a bitter struggle. With dependencies removed from her by three bands of miles of sea and land, themselves ripe to act upon any probability of breaking their own bonds, and to give an example to the world attention distracted in every quarter of the globe, she will stand alone in the midst of the storm. "England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity." This England knows, and the dreams of her statesmen are very like those of a troubled the conscience of her own guilty Richard on the eve of the battle which ended his cruelties and his life together.

How that opportunity may be availed of when it comes, this is no time nor place to speculate upon. That the circumstances of the occasion will present, I for the present assume as one of self-proven. For the consummation of the result there is a necessary part of the education of their chiefs, and no Spartan youth ever endured a stricter course of war-like study than the ancient Fenian or Knight of the Red Branch. Ireland! When passed, there by a time when genius, honor, valor, virtuprunt were needed, that same son of Erin sprung first among the children of men? Irishmen have filled the world with their deeds. Born of a hardy, healthy race, of rare intellect, even though untutored, gentle and loving as a woman when sympathy asks a tear, but brave, and bold and fearless when a strong arm and stout heart are wanted, God seems to have formed the Irish men for good deeds. Driven out of his native land, finding a home wherever the sole of his hand and his head can build him one, locally, time and change have no influence upon him. He is content to his nature.

> "Where'er I roam, whatever realms I see,
> My heart untravell'd fondly turns to thee;
> Still one dear charm attracts me to thy shore,
> Sweet native Ireland, and forever more."

His motives only flow toward his friends, his family, his country and his God. It may be in the beat of the hospice; it may be under the shades of some forsten berg; it may be in sunny France; it may be in frozen Russia; the rich harvest fields of America may pour their golden plenty into his waiting hands; the barren sands of Africa may grudgingly bestow a scanty remembrance; in one place more than another he is not one whit the less an honest child of nature and of truth.

There is nothing in the nature of Irishmen the belonger of circumstance, he formed a bold resolve to rid his country of her tyrant. He sent out swift emissaries who found eager thousands ready for the word. He sought his daughter, he told her of the horrid fate proposed for her, and of the plan of deliverance. THE O'MAHONY OBSEQUIES.

Funeral Oration by Mr. J. C. Mickam.

It has never been the custom of Ireland to eulogize the illustrious dead over their graves; and, for my own part, I have always thought that the grave of the patriot was not the fitting place for oratory, even for eloquence the most chaste or the most inspiring, but rather for the prayer, the tear, and the resolve. I have not forgotten the address made in Glasnevin Cemetery upon a memorable occasion, when the ashes of Terence Bellew MacManus were being carried over two oceans and a continent, found a resting place in his own land. I forget the eloquent passage—it more recently spoken in the Academy of our Southern capital. But "God's acre" seems to me like God's house; and for this reason alone I will restrain to express myself in the words of another, as mine may continue among us to be the exception and not the rule. You will easily understand from what I have just said, it is with the utmost reluctance I consented to address a few words to you over here, rather than embarrass by my refusal the committee who have given so much time and labor to the preparation of the most impressive and significant manifestation of a people's gratitude and a people's faith. But I am sure you will all agree with me that this is not the moment, nor is this the place to deliberate or try to delineate the character of the prelect patriot, the earnest worker, the able and prudent leader, who has died in our midst to-day; or to speak of his many claims to our love and sacrifices in the undying cause of this unhappy but unconquered nation. The name of John Mahony is a household word in Ireland, and in every clime where her scattered children are to be found. To those who was given to his country. True, never was to claims, never knew the cruel, and treachery had plunged her—by men who have been to speak his praises, were very distinct from what many have esteemed his virtues. And, oh, how he did love Ireland! She was his mother, his queen, his life all the world! And in the long list of her patriot martyrs there is none for whom will shine with purer luster than for him.

Let us dry our tears; and standing by the door of our dead chief, let us resolve to watch and labor and action, always living in the justice of God, who has endowed the immortal longing for nationhood in the hearts of our people, and hopefully remembering that

> Freedom hath arisen
> Gift from prince's hate,
> Gift from battle dismay,
> Gift from slaughter's day,
> Offerest from his master.

His travels are all over, and gently he rests in the bosom of his adored motherland, and as that sun goes down, millions and millions of the Irish race, remembering that its last beams will rest upon the grave of John O'Mahony, will join in our prayer—God rest the soul of its true and the brave!

The Church and the World.

On Sunday, March 4th, his Eminence Cardinal Manning delivered the third of his sermons on the "Church and the World," at the Pro-Cathedral, from which text—"I will ask the Father, and He shall give you another Paraclete, that He may abide with you forever—the Spirit of Truth whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, nor knoweth Him; but you shall know Him, because He shall abide with you, and shall be in you." (St. John, xiv., 16, 17.) His Eminence said: In the words were, there was no safeguard from the spirit of the world but the Spirit of God. The world is not the outward visible ocean of human action so much as the invisible, subtle and all penetrating spirit of the world. The body is not so, but the soul. The spirit is the soul of the world. Nothing was easier than for men to set the Diatisee, and to say they were not worldly, like other men, and then enter into their chambers, shut the door, and lock themselves in with the world, because the spirit of the world is within. The world is

THE FLAG OF FONTENOY.
(1745.)

Comrades, fill the purling glass,
And drink this toast with me;
Rouse! let the sparkling goblet pass,
And pledge it warm and free!
Then kindle up the cheering coal,
And fire the trusty rifle;
Thus pledged in brimming bowl,
The flag of Fontenoy.

To-morrow on the battle plain
Perchance I still be o'er her;
To fall 'mid heaps of human slain—
To die and be forgot;
Now bumper high the sterling bear away,
For if we fall, by heav'n,
High over our heads shall proudly wave
The flag of Fontenoy.

Our mess is full, beyond the sea
Have not brave fathers stood,
And borne that flag triumphantly?
Mid fire and flame and blood;
But never yet could foeman's hand
Or tyrant's power destroy
The banner of our own dear land—
The flag of Fontenoy.

In vain perfidious England strove
To trample and destroy
The noble sound symbol of the heroic love
We yet shall preserve me;
We'll rear it on the rolling waves
In peace and battle glorious;
Or sink, or float, the flag shall be
Where'er our banner victorious!
The flag of Fontenoy.

And yonder yet that flag shall wave,
And higher still it soar
Our Yarra hill and Kinmont's grave
In Alfred's isle once wore;
When joined together, heart and hand,
We'll half that day with joy,
And plant upon our own dear land
The flag of Fontenoy.

Then, comrades, fill your glass with me,
And drink before we go,
Fill up to each—be interrow we Shall meet to greet the foe;
And if amid the battle's shock
Purchance we fall, my boy,
High o'er our heads shall proudly flow
The flag of Fontenoy.—WILLIAM COLLINS.

"OUT" ON ST. PATRICK'S EVE

A Tale of the Rising of '67.

BY T. M. HEALY.

Well, while we got near the castle, either it got dark, the main body was posted in one quarther, an' myself an' a few more, wid poor Carty, was to hould to remain kwite as we wor, till we'd get the word, at the strroke of twelve.

We wor all in great speerits entirely; an' begor you'd wondher the way the boy kep' jokin' an' laughin' to themselves, though, faith, it wasn't any laughin' matter

And afore us,

their day. an' the capital buggy afther used to call the Gallvanther, as we to-day

"Begor, Jer, 'would do us a power o' good if we could get something to ait before the kind begins; an', faith, Jer, I'm inkinlin' an empty belly isn't as good for stoppin' a bayrah as a wan wid somethin' aback of it!"

"More power, Gallvanther," says the comrades, "if you can give out the gra time nolen. If you're thin spoke yit, that you got the kind of this mornin', I think that's a little like that's smokin' beyant, an', begor, roast pistaue has a mighty persuadin' way wid 'em of a night like this."

Wain they mintioned the kile I thought 'would be a fine place to keep poor Bill Carty out o' the cowld; an' so we all med over as kwite as possible, an' there was the lime-burner gote' about wid his lanthern, maidin' his work, whistlin'. So, whin we saw there was nobody else, out come the Gallvanther wid his big cowt an' hat, as we civil as if he were afther likin' a neighbor's lanch. But whin the poor constable of a man turned round an' saw the whole of us, wid the guns an' pikes, gethered about the place, he dhropped his lanthern wid the fright, an' couldn't as much as get a word out.

"Why, tishe, you onforbidth kushpe," sez the Gallvanther, "where's your manners? Ara'n you med to seein' Chrischnus in this part o' the counthry, or is it the way the smoit o' the lime gev you a krik in yer tongue?"

Wid that we all burst out wid the laughin', an' the poor man, seein' he wasn't goin' to be massacred, sez kwite hearty:

"I ax yer pardin, sir. God save ye kindly and kaads fakha!"

"That's right, now, lime-burner," sez the Gallvanther, wid won of his aire, still takin' the rise out of him, "an' I suppose you'll let us warm ourselves an' roast a few plates at the fire, if we won't throw the skine about on you?"

"Thrush, I will so," sez he, "an' give you plinty salt for them too."

"Round man yourself," sayethe Gallvanther. "Sure 'tis the Sishuis spot we've come to, an' I'll engage now it herself was 'idhin 'tish's long till we'd be towld where the noggin o' milk was kep'. Faith, 'tis you's the dacent boy entirely, an' so you be! I believe that was the Colleen dhas cruthin as you yon wor wishtlin' whin we kem up."

"Arrah, lave off yer jackeleerin'," sez Jer, gettin' tired o' the dissecrance. "Shure, we're not goin' to stop here all night."

So the pair of Sochels sate to work wid their sockin', an' the rest of us med ourselves as snug an' as cosy as we could round the kiln, an' the poor lime-burner was as civil as ex when he grew to know we wor. "Twas great to hear himself an' the Gallvanther talking together afther awhin as friendly as if they'd known each other a hundred years.

"I was out myself the last time," sayethe to him, "that we were bate; 'tas' though, o' course, there's no harm thryin', I'm afraid 'tis bate we'll be this time again, an always."

"Ay, mayte were bate this time, orra," sez the Gallvanther, confidentially, "but I'm a rale Asre, but ov'ry wall a-while. Do you see them stars, lime-burner?" sez he, pointin' to the skey.

"Faith, I do so, God bless 'em," sez the lime-burner.

"Now, isn't that a sighth?"

"Deed 'tis fine!" sez the poor man, not guessin' rightly what he was comin' to.

"But do you know what they're sayin'?" sez he, as solemn as a counsellor.

"Oh! God help us, sir," sez the other, quite frightened, thinkin' mayte it was Columkille was talkin' to him, or some other great prophet. "Nothin' wrong, I hope."

"O' conree not, man," sez the Gallvanther, an' I never saw him so serious before, "there God isn't a sayethen. Listen, an' I'll tell you what they're sayin', but 'tish'll all of 'em that's talkin' to us, you understand. You see some of 'em takes an interist in us, so' some of 'em don't care.

But, blud alive, man, don't you see that them that's twinkliu' down on us so spitefully, 'tis sookin' at us just be, an' sayin' to us every time they shut their purty eyes: 'Wait awhile, boys, wait awhile! We'll see ye all free yit.' Sistersis shin, lime-burner!"

"Why, thin, to be shure I do! Begor, 'tis the wonderful larnin' you've got, sir!" sez he.

"I spose so," sez the other, "we used never lose hope."

"In the rale thruth yer tellin'," sez the lime-burner. "More power to 'em every blight they shine! Arn't the Lard Mayor an' his family a bright as a wan wid somethin' aback of it!"

"More power, Gallvanther," says the comrades, "if you can give out the gra time nolen. If you're thin spoke yit, that you got the kind of this mornin', I think that's a little like that's smokin' beyant, an', begor, roast pistaue has a mighty persuadin' way wid 'em of a night like this."

Wain they mintioned the kile I thought 'would be a fine place to keep poor Bill Carty out o' the cowld; an' so we all med over as kwite as possible, an' there was the lime-burner gote' about wid his lanthern, maidin' his work, whistlin'. So, whin we saw there was nobody else, out come the Gallvanther wid his big cowt an' hat, as we civil as if he were afther likin' a neighbor's lanch. But whin the poor constable of a man turned round an' saw the whole of us, wid the guns an' pikes, gethered about the place, he dhropped his lanthern wid the fright, an' couldn't as much as get a word out.

"Why, tishe, you onforbidth kushpe," sez the Gallvanther, "where's your manners? Ara'n you med to seein' Chrischnus in this part o' the counthry, or is it the way the smoit o' the lime gev you a krik in yer tongue?"

Wid that we all burst out wid the laughin', an' the poor man, seein' he wasn't goin' to be massacred, sez kwite hearty:

"I ax yer pardin, sir. God save ye kindly and kaads fakha!"

"That's right, now, lime-burner," sez the Gallvanther, wid won of his aire, still takin' the rise out of him, "an' I suppose you'll let us warm ourselves an' roast a few plates at the fire, if we won't throw the skine about on you?"

"Thrush, I will so," sez he, "an' give you plinty salt for them too."

"Round man yourself," sayethe Gallvanther. "Sure 'tis the Sishuis spot we've come to, an' I'll engage now it herself was 'idhin 'tish's long till we'd be towld where the noggin o' milk was kep'. Faith, 'tis you's the dacent boy entirely, an' so you be! I believe that was the Colleen dhas cruthin as you yon wor wishtlin' whin we kem up."

"Arrah, lave off yer jackeleerin'," sez Jer, gettin' tired o' the dissecrance. "Shure, we're not goin' to stop here all night."

So the pair of Sochels sate to work wid their sockin', an' the rest of us med ourselves as snug an' as cosy as we could round the kiln, an' the poor lime-burner was as civil as ex when he grew to know we wor. 'Twas great to hear himself an' the Gallvanther talking together afther awhin as friendly as if they'd known each other a hundred years.

"I was out myself the last time," sayethe to him, "that we were bate; 'tas' though, o' course, there's no harm thryin', I'm afraid 'tis bate we'll be this time again, an always."

"Ay, mayte were bate this time, orra," sez the Gallvanther, confidentially, "but I'm a rale Asre, but ov'ry wall a-while. Do you see them stars, lime-burner?" sez he, pointin' to the skey.

"Faith, I do so, God bless 'em," sez the lime-burner.

"Now, isn't that a sighth?"

"Deed 'tis fine!" sez the poor man, not guessin' rightly what he was comin' to.

"But do you know what they're sayin'?" sez he, as solemn as a counsellor.

"Oh! God help us, sir," sez the other, quite frightened, thinkin' mayte it was Columkille was talkin' to him, or some other great prophet. "Nothin' wrong, I hope."

"O' conree not, man," sez the Gallvanther, an' I never saw him so serious before, "for is God isn't a sayethen. Listen, an' I'll tell you what they're sayin', but 'tish'll all of 'em that's talkin' to us, you understand. You see some of 'em takes an interist in us, so' some of 'em don't care.

"No," sez I; "there they either is! Walk on!"

"Then that," sez he, "but I can't lave me word, and there's somethin' rustlin' an' talkin' behind me. Maybe he's not dead."

I was very saint I heard the sound myself, an' I knew it kem from the body. 'Twasn't a very dark night, an' I stooped me head to hiry an' see what it was. My glory be to God! there was the Rosary beads he had worn in his hand, gripped tight in me poor boy's hand, an' rustlin' and thrailin' over the frozen snow!

I got as I wasn't sittin' like to be frightened the captain kem up, an' we burried him with our coats on the graveyard.

The captain had towld the Gallvanther an' some more o' the boys to go on straight to the castle, so as to be on the watch. 'Twas himself was cut to the heart at what had happened, for the time we got near the cold abbey, we could see where the dark heap of earth was turned up black wid' fare the white snow, an' we know may wor diggin' the grave. 'Twas the bother an' deasth' Archbishop's sarrant for us, I'll know, an' 'twould rush yer blood cowld to hear the sound o' the pick like they had thrown the grave wid' a curse for ivery stone an' rone, and the Marcus wonderyin' through the cowld ruin.

The Gallvanther was hard at work, an' when we got near him 'twas a'most finished, an' a step he got high enough to climbed up and sez, "I'll already now, boys. Lower him down." An' thin' I know, an' 'twould rush yer blood cowld to hear the sound o' the pick like they had thrown the grave wid' a curse for ivery stone an' rone, and the Marcus wonderyin' through the cowld ruin.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

SAN FRANCISCO, January 20, 1877.

MESSRS. LYONS & O'SULLIVAN, PROPRIETORS OF THE MONITOR—Dear Gentlemen: Right Rev. Bishop Amat, of Monterey, and Los Angeles, Right Rev. Bishop O'Connell, of Marysville, and myself take pleasure in declaring to our respective flocks that we beg to avail ourselves of your useful and ably edited MONITOR as our official organ. Very respectfully,

✠ J. S. ALEMANY, A. S. F.,
In behalf of the Bishops of the Province.

We have appointed Mr. John P. Croke special agent and convey ncer for THE MONITOR, and he will visit in the interest of the paper various towns and localities within the State in the course of the next three or four months. Mr. Croke is brother of the Very Rev. James Croke, so long Vicar-General of this diocese, and also of Most Rev. Thomas Croke, Archbishop of Cashel, Ireland; so he will hardly be reckoned a stranger by those upon whom he may call in the prosecution of his mission. He bears with him a very flattering recommendation from his Grace Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, whose good wishes, we are certain, should be sufficient to insure him a splendid success among the Catholics of California and the Pacific Coast; and, in fact, wherever he may travel on behalf of THE MONITOR. We ourselves need say no word in commendation of Mr. Croke, beyond stating that whoever meets him will find a genial, whole-souled gentleman, self. We—he stands friends for himself all our friends, by our knowledge trust that every one who has the interests of Catholic journalism at heart will lend him a helping hand and aid him in the mission. We tender our sincere thanks to Rev. Father King and the good people of Oakland and its vicinity for the liberal and generous reception accorded Mr. Croke. We hope he will be equally well-received everywhere else.

The Dublin Irishman is a paper which is much given to fine language and to bombastic utterance. Commence sense is too frequently ignored, and intelligence is too often insulted. It is one of those journals that think rhetoric is a substitute for logic, and empty sentiment for hard fact. In an article upon the O'MAHONY funeral it says: "It has been reserved for Ireland to show how a Nation mourns for her dead sons and faithful Knights. Herein may we not recognize the controlling Hand of Providence, which utilizes the humble at times to heights forbidden to the proud. Ireland, though suffering sorely in many ways, has yet had her moral victories." This is rather incoherent, but it has plenty of capital letters and sounds well. It seems to us that it would be much better if Ireland provided for her living sons and knights, and did not demand such bitter sacrifices from her dead. JOHN O'MAHONY died in actual pauperism, and would have starved but for the kindness of a gentleman who makes no show of his nationality. Half the money spent upon the useless pomp of a funeral would have cheered the last days of the patriot, if it would not have prolonged his life. But then there would have been no flourish of trumpets about the expenditure of the money; there would have been no "eulogies" to or from any place required, and no orator could have a chance to deploy his abilities. JAMES STEPHENS is still living in Paris, we believe, and in circumstances the reverse of affluent, yet how few there are, among even "distinguished" patriots, who care how he is getting on, or what his means of support may be. Probably the same could be said of other brave and devoted men who parted everything for the sake of Irish liberty. All this shows a lack of thought, a want of practical common sense, which should be reproved instead of countenanced or encouraged by an honest, national journal, whether published in Ireland or America. It indicates, also, the absence of that intensity of purpose which must be linked to every revolutionary movement. It will never do to be changing our politics[a]r one fine so often, or to forget valuable services once rendered. This fickleness is the greatest defect in the Irish character of the present day, and the efforts of all true patriots should be directed to its elimination.

We do not know where so many of our Eastern contemporaries get their peculiar ideas about the character of the Mongolian hordes that have settled in California, or what foundation they can cite in support of them. It rather surprises us to find the coolies described, time and again, as a very cleanly, peaceful and industrious race, who would be extremely useful in developing the resources of the State if they were only left alone and not subjected to bad treatment at the hands of hoodlums. Their neatness and their shocking disregard for sanitary considerations are so painfully and revoltingly evident that they cannot be denied or concealed. There is no ground for discussion of these things. And as for the peacefulness with which they are so freely credited, that can well be judged from the number of shootings, stabbings and beatings of which Chinatown has been the theater during the last month or six weeks. The coolies have soundly run riot in bloodshed, and they seem to have got the notion into their heads that they can safely set the law at defiance. Criminals are concealed or spirited away by their proselyting companies, and where an individual is arrested it is a mere matter of chance whether he is the person wanted or not. The Chinese imagine that one victim will answer as well as another, provided that some one is put-in-hed, and they act accordingly, if they act at all.

PRESIDENT HAYES has practically settled the dispute about the Governorship of South Carolina by ordering the withdrawal of the Federal troops from the State House. The pieces WADE HAMPTON in power, for he well knows that without the aid of Federal bayonets CHAMBERLAIN could not maintain even a semblance of authority for twenty-four hours. CHAMBERLAIN has deluded upon yielding gracefully if not gracefully. He will not fight the battle any longer, either legally or physically, but, after issuing an address to the Republican party, will quit South Carolina forever and settle somewhere in the North, probably in New York. Well, he will hurt nobody by that. The State of which he pretended a short time ago to be Governor will do without him, and in circumstances the reverse of affluent, yet how few there are, among even "distinguished" patriots, who care how he is getting on, or what his means of support may be. Probably the same could be said of other brave and devoted men who parted everything for the sake of Irish liberty! All this shows a lack of thought, a want of practical common sense, which should be reproved instead of countenanced or encouraged by an honest, national journal, whether published in Ireland or America. The domestic affairs of the German Empire seem to be in a very disturbed condition, accidently there are important Not many days ago we re[a]ble policy, court party suffered a great defeat in Parliament upon the question of the taxation of the matter the Supreme Court to Leipsig, and now we hear that Prince BISMARCK has presigned ministry, and retired into private life. We take these two things to indicate that the German people have grown tired of military rule, and have begun to understand that even the glories of Sedan are but poor compensations for the loss of liberty. It was natural that they should be for a while dazzled at the wonderful success of their war with France, and take more, much more interest in military organizations than in anything else; but sober reflection, which was bound to come some time, could hardly fail to show them that trade and peaceful industry were more necessary for the life of the nation. The Germans have learned that military glories are rather unsubstantial, especially when they are not backed up by corresponding achievements in the path of industrial progress, and they are now displaying dissatisfaction with those leaders who have led them from victory to victory and make victorious battles the sole object of national ambition. Prince BISMARCK was undoubtedly the very personification of the despotism of brute force, and liberals might be pardoned if they felt that the nation was passing through the ordeal of war; but he was manifestly out of place when the business of ordinary government had to be resumed. The Emperor appreciated this thoroughly with him because he was a soldier by profession and wished to transform the whole country into a vast camp; and consequently he maintained him in power as long as he dared. But popular opinion proved stronger than either or both, and the Prince who nothing ago seemed so powerful, and was believed so arrogantly to all who crossed his path, had to retire from his proud position. Prussia stands more in need of statesmen than of warriors now. All the money of the French indemnity has been spent, and the country is nothing the richer for it. Trade is dull and thousands of men are out of employment. Socialism, the most terrible expression of popular discontent, is spreading in every direction, and has even a strong body of supporters in Parliament. The tendency of the country is plainly towards revolution and republicanism. This tendency has not yet reached the point where it can be struck at by the sword, and therefore the soldier is no use in combatting it. The future of the Empire and the existence of the Imperial dynasty may yet be imperiled by events which are progressing noiselessly and peacefully. The Germans are slow to act, but, once they have made up their minds for action, they neither stop nor falter, so if they have decided against their present system of government, he does is sealed. Just yet the discontent is confined to the lower or ers, but revolutions always work upwards, and the upper classes may in time become disloyal, too, if a remedy be not applied. The retirement of BISMARCK is proof that the main concern of the Government is to combat the revolution, and that no foreign war is meditated just at present. His withdrawal from power will have the effect of allaying French suspicions, and perhaps of bringing about a better understanding between France and Germany. It is indeed, a matter upon which the lovers of industry, peace and good order may where should congratulate themselves.

A TRAGIC affair occurred in our city towards the end of last week, upon which we may with propriety make a few remarks. Two men, named CARDIFF and MCDONALD, went to pay, what we presume was a friendly visit to an acquaintance called YORLL. The latter was a Protestant, with, we believe, the reputation of being an Orangeman; the two former were Catholics. In their talk the subject of religion was unfortunately introduced, and almost as a matter of course a quarrel ensued. YORLL applied an insulting epithet to the Pope, and MCDONALD returned by knocking him down and beating him. YORLL managed to get a pistol out of a trunk in the room and immediately shot his assailant dead. The Coroner's jury brought in a verdict of justifiable homicide, and at the Police Court investigation YORLL was acquitted of all blame. These decisions are in strict accordance with California usage, but we doubt whether they are fair or legal. It seems to us that life should not be taken unless life is directly attacked, and that a blow or even a threat that a man upon whom a common assault is committed, may legally kill the person striking him, is to perpetrate an outrage upon law and order. A stiffer verdict could get away from his antagonist so as to procure the pistol, he certainly could have shot the room and gone for police assistance, and if he failed to find one he could have returned so arrogantly to all who crossed his path, had to retire from his proud position. Prussia stands more in need of statesmen than of warriors now. All the money of the French indemnity has been spent, and the country is nothing the richer for it. Division on foot wearing appropriate badges.

Citizens with their families in carriages.

After marching through the principal streets of the town, the procession halted in front of the Asylum, and was received by Grand Marshal Kelly and disbanded.

THE LITERARY EXERCISES,

Which were of a very high order of merit were held at the Rink. Long before the procession disbanded this capacious building was filled to overflowing by the ladies and gentlemen interested in the occasion, and the President of the Day, Mr. Jas. Sneehy, delivered an appropriate address and was succeeded by Hr. J. W. Bailey, who read a highly original poem. The oration by Mesar J. W. Sneehy, its a student in St. Mary's College, was a truly creditable effort, both in matter and manner.

"Alison Alanna" was finely sung by Miss Mary Hogan, and Mr. Bernard Cardinal Simmons' rendering of "Pomeroy" was admirably received by Miss Jennie Fallon of Watsonville.

I inclose you copies of the oration and poem, but presume your space is too much occupied with matters of more universal interest to give them insertion, especially as they have already been published in the local papers.

Mr. Mac den said as Mr Gardner was in attendance he might be able to give some explanation as to how the house in question was reduced to the condition described by the sanitary officer. Mr. Gardner said he had very little explanation to offer. The people of the house in question were formerly in his employment, and as he usually gave houses to his laborers as part payment of their wages, the people referred to occupied this house for a number of years, and as they themselves were in the employment the house was kept in proper repair, but about two and from that time—about—took for citizens to improve the condition of the premises. Wishing to get out of these people he consulted the sanitary officer, and found that the most convenient way would be to call upon the Guardians, as the sanitary authority, to institute proceedings under the Act. After some further remarks, it was agreed that the house should be closed up in accordance with the terms of the Sanitary Act. Mr. Gardner—I accept of the notice, and I will act upon it.

It is the one made by all bishops, ecclesiastics connected with the care of souls, rectors of universities, professors and others on special occasions. "If likewise unhesitatingly accept all that is handed down, defined and declared by the Ecumenical Canons and the General Councils, but especially by the Holy Synod of Trent and by the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican, particularly the reasons concerning the primacy and infallible authority of the Roman Pontiffs, and at the same time, I equally condemn, reject and anathematise all that is contrary to these and I likewise profess myself of my profession, and persevered the sake of several dozen of it here. — On January 20 was issued a decree of the Sovereign Pontiff promulgating the clause respecting the decrees of the Vatican Council added by his Holiness to the Creed of Pius IV. The profession of faith known by this name is a summary of the doctrinal definitions of the principal ecclesiastical authority, including those of the Council of Trent, the last Ecumenical one. Hitherto only all bishops, ecclesiastics charged with the care of souls, rectors of universities, professors and others on special occasions. "I likewise unhesitatingly accept all that is handed down, defined and declared by the Sacred Canons and the Ecumenical Council, but especially by the Holy Synod of Trent and by the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican, particularly the decrees concerning the primacy and infallible authority of the Roman Pontiff, and, at the same time, I firmly condemn all the contrary errors and anathematize all that is contrary to these and the Church has condemned, declared and anathematized by the Church. I, N., hereby pledge, vow and swear that, with the help of God, I will ever be faithful and always be most careful to hold and confess entire and unsullied until the end of my life the faith of this true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved, which I now of my own will profess and truly hold; and that, as far as lies in my power, I will cause it to be held by and taught to others, and I will be subject to me and entrusted to my care. So help me God and these holy Gospels."

Extravagance in Schools

A writer in the New York Tribune takes the following common-sense view of the extravagance of our public school system:

I do not know that one can say right to set forth his personal feelings and private griefs in the eyes of the public, and yet "open confessions" seem all the rage. I am a poor man, yet not so poor that I do not every day waste, and, in proportion to my salary or Free College, and I know in my soul that I help to support public colleges, for I see rich men's sons going there and getting their education at cost. I can't afford to send my children to such colleges, but I have to help pay for it.

And then I passed the other day a girl's college—I suppose it is, from the air of studies, or rather of fashion, and French and German and painting. It was some sort of high day, and there were carriages there, and girls in dimness and fur bellows, little bunches of flowers; real fine doings. And there was a long line of carriages waiting instead of cutting down teachers' salaries, why not cut down idle free education, and if people were willing and able to pay for them, I believe in good, plain learning; but I don't see and I can't see the justice of taking me to teach rich men's sons and daughters what they call the "higher branches," and which are of no use to my daughters, if they want to perch on the higher branches of the tree of knowledge, let them climb up, and I think they would be a good, solid foundation. It's a great mistake to bring up people to depend on charity, even for their education.

"By their Works ye shall Know Them."

The man who thought the dray an stingy because the music was so small, is only surpassed in his meanness by the man who, on the occasion of the funeral of the dead of those unwashing, disgusting lodgers and boarders, who, in the days of their flourishing state, were in a position to pay for larger than usual meals, will, by their study and acute action on the part, relieve the poor, and thus permanently overcoming consumption. In South America the Jesuit Fathers have entirely superseded other pills, and are relied on fully by the people, and they need as a preventive of and for the relief of the sickness, fever and bowels, so prevalent in that part of the country, and which Holloway's Pills have given away at drug store.

From a Physician.

HIGH PARK, Va., February 7, 1876.

Messrs. Reid, Wells & Co.—Gentlemen: I think you may perhaps remember that I wrote you to recommend Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for my wife, who was suffering from general debility, and was much reduced in flesh and strength. She has used several bottles of the "Discovery," and also in Canada, without relief. At your request, I write this to say that I have used Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in my own family with the most gratifying results. I have used it in my own case, after using six of the dollar bottles, she was restored to perfect health, and is now in the enjoyment of much about the house, and I feel that I cannot speak too highly of the merits of the remedy in such. I have prescribed it in several of my patients, and have proved the most satisfactory results in all of them. You can make any use of this letter you see fit. Yours very truly, JAMES H. REID, M. D.

"It's only a Cough"

Has brought many to untimely graves. What is a cough? Nature's effort to throw off disease. Shall it be checked? Is it safe? Reason says no, and warns us against the use of opiates, which only relieve the cough by paralyzing the nerves of sensation. Shall we use Wistar's Balsam or Wild Cherry? It has stood the test of a century, thousands speak in its praise. Is it proper to use it in a cough, which is a danger, for the cough is a safety valve. Use with her and be cured. Sold by all druggists.

Everything objectionable in the hierarchy of the Catholic Church was eliminated from the constitution and obligations of the Order.

Encouragement for the Feeble.

Debility, whether it be inherent, or caused by overtaxed strength, or protracted illness, has a most depressing influence upon the mind, rendering an object unattainably nearly akin to despair, and enforcing the abandonment of cherished projects and high hopes. Happily for the victims of this state, even in its worst forms, its conquest is not impossible. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will speedily and thoroughly invigorate the weak and debilitated organs of digestion, assimilation and nutrition, and in addition to affording the most salutary tonic influence, it possesses regularity among those organs upon whose efficient discharge of the duties in general will depend. Thousands of cases might be cited from among the most unexceptionable evidence of this health-giving agent in cases of debility, that have baffled the skill of the most eminent physicians, but the following must suffice:

THE MONITOR AND GUARDIAN.

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1877.

took place in the New York police court three weeks ago should, if anything ever can, indnce the scots to have nothing whatever to do with "reformed priests," but to leave them severely alone to work out their own destruction. There the Rev. PAUL VALENTINE, D. D., was convicted of infamous crimes, perpetrated upon little children who were placed under his care, that he might teach them the Gospel according to Methodism, and sentenced to ten years in the State Prison, the Judge stating from the Bench that he was very sorry he could not send him, where he richly deserved, to the gallows. Now the Rev. PAULHAD been a priest in Italy, but being discovered in some of his bad conduct, he was suspended, and to escape the law he fled to America. In New York he made his first appearance as a "convert," and he was immediately appointed a Professor in Dansbury Theological Seminary, nursing Methodist, as a matter of course. He did not stay there long, however. For some reasons, probably not worth while making public, he left and joined the ranks of the Episcopalians, and was "ordained" minister. Full of zeal, he proposed that he should open a school and refuge where the little waifs and strays of his own nationality, floating about the squalid purlieus of New York, should be taken in, saved from the "abominations of Popery" and brought up staunch Protestants. The scheme found up stanch Protestants. The scheme found no lack with public philanthropists, who never like a work of charity half so well as when a little proselytism is connected with it, and the necessary funds were soon forthcoming. Then PAUL VALENTINE, the great brand snatched from the Papal bonfire, was put at the head of the school; and he set to work at once to show that people can be behaved himself so vilely that before long he was hauled up before Recorder HACKETT, charged with cruelty and other things considerably worse. His guilt was so clear that he was convicted without hesitation, and the Judge, in passing the heavy sentence imposed, used the very strongest language of reprobation. The Rev. PAUL'S Methodist and Episcopalian friends ought to feel very much ashamed of themselves; but we are afraid they have not so much honest sensitiveness about them. They are waiting now for the next "converted priest" that presents himself, have sending for possession, in readiness for him, and more little children to put under his care.

Up to the time of our writing this—Wednesday—nothing very important has been telegraphed from the seat of war. A few minor engagements have taken place in Asiatic Turkey, in which the Sultan's troops are said to have been successful. In one of these the Russians were stated to have lost eight hundred men and fled in disorder, while the Turkish casualties were only eight killed. This is scarcely to be considered as more than a skirmish, and probably ordinary have to be a little more moderate in his exaggerations, otherwise with be apt to be suspected of speaking the truth. We have had some acquaintance with "magnificent lying" in this country; it was freely used at Washington during the civil war, and we believe the general opinion now is that it could have very well been done without, and the nation might safely have been spared the shame of it. Besides, all the world cannot be readily exploded by simple reference to an atlas. When we find that the Russians, who died in disorder, have advanced into the country and taken Kars, and are actually besieging Kars, we naturally begin to doubt the correctness of that tale about the eight hundred Russians and eight Turks being the sole result of an engagement. In regard to the Crimean war, twenty-three years ago, Kars was defended by a combined English and Turkish force, but the Russians took it and made the garrison prisoners. It is probable they will do the same this time.

THE cowardly and unprovoked murder of Special Officer Cocran by one of our city policemen, on the night of the 11th inst., is one good effect of rousing the authorities to take sharp measures against the criminal classes. The law-breakers are just now particularly defiant and audacious, as if they deemed it out of the power of any authority or force to bring them to justice. The remains of the brave officer who lost his life in the execution of his duty were hardly laid in their last resting-place when another officer, bringing in a prisoner, is assailed with coarse and brutal threats and insults, and pistol-shots are the penalty for the nonwelcome activity. The public, whose lives, property and peace are at stake, want to know how long this state of things will be permitted to continue. They want to know if the administration of justice is completely paralyzed in this community, and the prosecuting attorneys, judges and other judicial functionaries have resigned their powers or are afraid to exercise them. Beyond any doubt, the failure or the weakness, whichever it may be properly called, of justice is to be laid to the account of those officials, and to that of the police. It is not to be within the ability of the veriest "abyssine" lawyer to obtain postponement after postponement of these bootless cases, and then when the public vigilance has died out to secure an acquittal upon some miserable legal technicality. We could mention several cases of this kind, but it is quite unnecessary to do so, because every citizen will recognize the truth of our remarks.

We are satisfied that no true-hearted Irishman will say that the columns which are to-day devote to the publication of Hon. B. F. BUTLER'S letter upon "The Irish Soldier in America" have been misapplied, or could have been turned to better use. If we look at the American press of all parties and of all sections, we shall find that those papers which treat Irishmen justly—we will not speak of respectfully or sympathizingly—are in a very decided minority. The best use to which the majority ever put a Celt is to make him the object of some meaningless sarcasm, or else to fatten upon him some stupid, polatoism witticism. They all forget what a large share of the progress and prosperity of this nation is due to the superior brain, activity and business capacity of men of pure Irish birth and blood. They are equally quick at forgetting the heroism and fidelity with which the Irish fought to found and preserve this Union from the days of Washington to the present time. Impartial historians have freely acknowledged that America owes at least twenty times more to Ireland than to any other country in the world for the present proud and enviable position; but all that is flung into oblivion, and great study is shown by making the ignir and representative Irishman invariably a creature devoid of education, intelligence, or the semblance of culture. The lecture of Gen. BUTLER is a splendid tribute to the patriotism, bravery, efficiency and reliability of the Irish troops when fought for the republic, and coming from such a man it should have great influence on public sentiment. But, much as we admire it, and gladly as we give it insertion, we confess we have little faith in the assertion of his duty were heartily laid in their last resting-place when another officer, bringing in a prisoner, is assailed with coarse and brutal threats and insults, and pistol-shots are the penalty for the nonwelcome activity. It is becoming more apparent every day, notwithstanding the strenuous endeavors of the Radical press to conceal it, that Free-dom to the slave will have great trouble in managing the Senate. In fact the chances are that the honorable members of the august assembly will do all they can to impede, hinder and thwart the policy of the Chief Executive. And, reasoning in one way, we cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that they are perfectly justified in adopting such a line of conduct. For, let our own city and State be examined, and we feel confident that they support a President that deliberately and systematically departs from the old traditional ideas of his party and follows those of the fanatical adverse, and by so doing he has a great deal of trouble in keeping the Senate. DEATH OF REV. BROTHER FACILE.

EDITOR MONITOR:—In your issue of last week you mentioned the death of the Venerable Bro. Facile, the founder of the Christian Brothers' schools in this country. Permit me, if you please, to say a word on the career of this good man.

He entered our Society in early life—short time after the throes of the great Revolution, having passed through the ordeal of childhood and youth in the midst of the fearful days of the Reign of Terror. His success was marked from the very beginning. About 1802 he was placed in charge of the principal of the central houses of Paris, and in 1806 they opened a school for brothers to educate, and, as far as possible, reform the prisoners. Here the wonderful energy, self-possession and truly Christian zeal of Bro. Facile were universally admired. Such was the ascendency he had gained over the unfortunate inmates, that he quelled, by his self-possession and a few words, an outbreak among the prisoners, which had been instituted in position until 1865, when he was sent to Canada to take charge of the few schools then under the direction of our Brothers. There were about four hundred pupils in these schools, in Lower Canada in that day. In the United States there were very few Catholic schools—the Christian Brothers were almost unknown. In some cases a change of clothes was needed—a man with a head and a heart—and the Reverend Bro. Facile was the man was unacquainted with our manners and habits—a stranger to our language, and too old and too ready to study it with success. Indeed, he never acquired anything like a fair knowledge of it; yet very few men have done so much for Christian education in this country. His success was simply marvellous, and fewer vocations; but he had an indomitable will—a heroism superior to every trial—and a confidence in God that never gave way.

In his thirteen years of active personal administration he established schools in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Buffalo, Albany, Troy, New Orleans, Toronto, Kingston, and many intermediate places. He visited these schools annually, and, strange as it may appear, examined the pupils, each one personally, giving the standing not only of each school, but also of each class and the qualities of the teacher. It can be said of him that he labored to the last hour—out of bed at 4 o'clock, dressed at night and retired during the day; crossed the Atlantic about forty times, seeking laborers for the harvest, which indeed was plentiful, but few to reap it. He was successful in obtaining the help he required, he appealed to the reverend clergy to encourage pious, zealous and devoted young men to join the community. His appeal was productive of the happiest results. The reverend clergy took the matter in hand, and in a short time the novitiate of Montreal, the only one then in the country, was full of generous, heroic souls, who came to consecrate their young lives to the glorious work of Christian education. The whole country, and the Archbishop in particular, expressed with them to such an extent that two new novitiates were opened—one in New York, the other in St. Louis.

But it was not for his Society alone that the venerable Brother Facile worked. He was a true son of the Church. He saw with regret the very small number of vocations for the priesthood. He made it a special study to encourage, to pretend a respect for the sacred ministry that wherever his schools were established vocations were abundant for the state. This was one of the happiest fruits of the great man's mission.

The next, great good this noble soul effected was the wonderful impetus he gave to Christian education. He proved how zeal and devotedness, in the face of serious obstacles, can build up schools and support them. In fact, schools multiplied no every side, and many localities where the venerable form of Brother Facile was never seen, owed to his zeal and self-sacrificing devotedness the Christian schools that sprung up in their midst.

It is not surprising that such a man was highly respected by the illustrious hierarchy of our country. The great Archbishop Hughes, his friend and admirer, used to say of him that he used all the qualities of a great military leader.

Brother Facile was a profound thinker, a distinguished educator, an able administrator, and, better than all, a true religious. He was simple in his habits, a model of regularity, full of will and humor in recreation, and everywhere thoughtful of the welfare and happiness of his dear young brothers and the children confided to his care. How often have I head him say, "Oh! take care of these dear young children; teach them how to preserve their purity; inspire them with a horror for sin, and whatever might lead to it." No wonder that he was loved, and that his memory is held in fond remembrance by those who had the happiness to grow up in religion under his wise and prudent direction.

Wherever we find him, whether in the prisons of France or in the towns of Canada; in the first-hearted cities of the South, or in Paris during the terrible days of the late war and Commune, he was always the same devoted, heroic religious.

Two years ago I had the happiness to be at a retreat at which he assisted. He was bent and broken, and partially paralyzed, and had to be helped in and out of the chapel—how honored I felt when I was the one selected by the kind old man to assist on this occasion. He died as he had lived, full of faith and confidence in God; and I fondly hope he is gone to his Father's house, where the just find joy and rest.

Aid for the Banished Priests of Poland.

We have received the following from an esteemed friend, and request our readers to give it careful perusal:

Appeal to the Catholics of America.

Brethren in Jesus Christ! We live in a time of great persecutions of the Catholic Church in Europe. The cruel days of Diocletian's time arrived, and Poland specially has to suffer the most. The churches are closed up or handed over to schismatics; its bishops, its priests and its people driven into exile and the most dreadful persecutions and outrages, imprisonment, confiscation and banishment, are used to force the nation to renounce Catholicism. The number of martyrs still increases, and the population of Russia (a part of Russian Poland), the most persecuted of all, has already to suffer the most. In the —M. Odysse Barot, one of the most spiritual of religious skeptics, says in the France of Easter Sunday evening: "All the churches of Paris were this morning invaded by an enormous concourse of the faithful. The vastness of them were much too small to contain the crowd; to move within them was impossible; the crush was so great that strong bodies of police could hardly preserve order. To judge from appearances, a foreigner who arrived in Paris to-day for the first time might well believe that there was the in the world a more fervently Catholic population than that of Paris, and that France was still the eldest daughter of the Church."

—It has been remarked that next year Pius IX. will, if happily preserved to Christendom, enter on the 33rd year of the Church's monarchic epoch, noting that, according to the divergent views of Cardinals and Bossuet, St. Peter was the visible Head of the Church during thirty-two years, including the six years of the Supernatural Church of Antioch. But, as the Roman correspondent of the Morning Herald remarks, the number of the years of which our Saviour was counted Peter the Chief of the Apostles, the foundation of his office as Head of the Church would have been thirty-eight years, which forms another interesting year for Pio Nono to look forward to next, adds the contemporary, is it at all out of the range of possibility that the Pope may celebrate in 1881, or even considering his robust constitution and the traditional longevity of his family.

Presentation to Rev. Father Muirille.

The Catholics, although the most numerous one of any denomination, are not, as a class, the richest; but what they lack in ability to give will be made up in the goodness of their will. The Catholic, though he be a poor hard-working laborer, is always found doing his duty to his Church; when she calls for assistance he divides with her his means, and when asked from him it and so it is with those who are rich.

A very pleasant incident occurred in this city on Wednesday evening, April 26th, which illustrates, not exactly what we have asserted above, but shows the pleasant relationship which exists at this time between our resident priest, Rev. Father Muirille, and his parishioners. Father Muirille has a generous himself so common was about to same among us, after the death of the lamented Father Croke, as the occasion arose, has shown himself to be a man of mark. He has taken hold of the Church relatives with a vim, and pushed them for ward. His efforts to raise money to build a church worthy of the Catholics of Napa, have been crowned with eminent success, because managed with skill and energy; he has portrayed a most excellent Sunday School organization, and generally pleased his parish in first-rate order. His parishioners, knowing his worth as a priest, have resolved to show the good man that they appreciate them. So they quietly raised a fund and prepared a purse for their pastor, and on Wednesday evening they gathered at the parsonage in a body, and gentlemen from the presentation was duly performed. Mr. L. Meaker was spokesman, and in a feeling and impressive manner delivered the following little speech, which was heartily applauded:

"Father Muirille: During the past year your parishioners have noted your continuous labors in their behalf, have observed your unflagging efforts to build up a strong church, with a numerous and devout membership; have seen you at work early and late with the week, leading them to their duties with a firm and yet gentle hand; they have watched for the rising generation in the Sunday school, and now you have gone night and day to smooth the pillow of the dying and render consolation to the living; now you have been a guide and support to the widow and orphan—how, in short, you have been a true, devoted, devout and unwearying minister of Him who died and died that we might live. Having seen all these things, we have therefore appreciated them, and therefore come this evening to tender your noble horse as a slight testimonial of our appreciation of your labors. We wish you to know that we return in part the great love we know you bear us, and that we especially admire your virtues."

Father Muirille was greatly moved, and after a few moments' silence, during which the presentation was carried out in part only, but the words in which it had been made were duly appreciated by the donor, deeply grateful is his parishioners for their generosity, and begged only to be left to finish in raising funds to build the new church, and in washing over and guarding his flock, was but enjoying out the admonition of the Master. But still he was deeply touched. He would not, he said, accept the horse was due to the hearty co-operation and aid given by the good people of Napa, in the erection of the new church. They had succeeded his endeavors, in every instance had met with hearty co-operation, and he could only say he thanked them from his heart.—Napa Reporter.

Mr. G. Barth was called upon to make some remarks. And Father Muirille said some complimentary things of the people of Napa, and how much he had always been interest in Church matters than is customary; here it had sought to assist him, and how he had received nothing but courtesies and kindnesses from it; and he hoped he would be enabled to do the duties of his office in the fear of God and to the satisfaction of the Napa press.

As in duty bound, the editor of the Reporter, although now representative present, replied, and said that the press was only doing its duty as a conservator of good morals, and that Father Muirille had done more for good than any preacher that ever came generally who's supported the Church. There were more speculative made, but we have not space to publish them. It was a good time.—Napa Reporter.

A Wonder-working Remedy.

No remedial agent has ever been offered to the sick and debilitated in all comparable to Ron. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, in cases of malarial intermittent fevers, constipation, nervous affections, rheumatism and disorders investing constitutional debility, whether originating in "miasmatic vapors or wonders." The boldness ingredients which he spirituous liquors basis is notorious, not but a charm upon the stomach, and through the stomach upon the blood, liver, bowels and nervous system. There is probably in the compound that is needed to effect a cure in all cases of the above complaints, but it is sufficient to say that it has never been known to fail, when fairly tried, to relieve the most horrible, attended with a most distressing torment. The Bitters are particularly prepared to those engaged in exhausting or laborious occupations, or by on the strength to sustain the ability of the system to resist all impurity and other influences prejudicial to health and happiness.

The Art of Reason.

The boy that went to the mill on horseback, carrying the grist in one end of the bag and a stone in the other, when reproved by the miller, and told to divide the grist, replied that his father and grandfather had carried it that way, and he, being no better than they, should continue to do as they did. Similar, or equally as absurd, reasons are occasional as sufficient by some to warrant them in indiscriminate condemning Dr. Pierce's Plantic Medicines, even though there is overwhelming proof that they possess the most exalted for them. For many years the Golden Medical Discovery has been recognized as the leading Pure and Blood medicine in our market. Each year has brought an increase in its sale, and it is now used throughout the civilized world. Thousands of unsolicited testimonials are on file in the Doctor's office, attesting its efficacy in any recurring aggravated coughs, colds, throat and lung affections, also scrofula, humors, and blood disease. Are you suffering with some ailment to which you have not yet found a remedy? Remember that are scientifically prepared; that are reduced and that are sold at reasonable prices. Dr. Pierce's Pellets for Liver and Stomach, their action, their cheapness, their adaptation to the various forms of disease for the cure of which they are recommended, are the Purgative Family Medicines. Full particulars in Pierce's Common Sense Book, kept for free distribution by all druggists.

From H. Pinsmore, M. D. Auburn, N. H.

"Although averse to countenancing patent medicines, I cheerfully recommend Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Its compounder, Dr. Pierce, is a skilful physician, and his medicines are worthy of confidence. I have used it in my practice for more than two years, and I have always found it to be of the most efficacious. The Discovery is the best blood purifier I have ever used, and I therefore recommend it with the greatest confidence to those requiring an alterative and tonic."—Sold by all druggists.

One More Unfortunate.

Almost every day the papers chronicle the untimely death of some poor unfortunate whose name has been contributed by dyspepsia, over whose earthly remains the usual formula has been pronounced, and over and satisfiable agonizers of this great complaint. Dyspepsia is a disease which is more generally fatal than any human fly. It is contemptible in its nature—no wonder that people are ashamed to confess that they suffer from its attacks. There is a balm in Gilead! It is to be found in every drug store in the land. For years it has been scattering its countless blessed, health-giving influences among the children of men, and is amply proved to be remediable by the PECULIAR STOMACH BITTERS. The name of this wonderful remedy is the theme have been commonly cursed by the medical profession, and the unsuspecting portion of our first citizens prove. Sold by all druggists.

Produce Market Report.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 3, 1877.

Under the hideous influence of the recent storms, the growing wheat has in very many fields fitted out astonishingly, and now we are told that in some favored localities the yield will be as large as last year. Oats will begin next week, then making the time of harvest fully four weeks earlier than it was last year. We wish we could speak more encouragingly of the Carmel yield, but this we cannot do. The crop prospects in Monterey county, as seen by a gentleman recently from that county, are not flattering. The storms have done considerable damage to the late sowings, and must be very disappointing to many. Oregon, on the contrary, promises to have a larger and better crop than ever before. Our informant's estimate is now made that between California and Oregon combined the Pacific States will have a surplus of one thousand tons over and above the wants of the people. This will do very well for a dry year, particularly if we are to have the benefit of the new ports to help us out. We closed up the month of April without hearing one single ship on the Liverpool berth for Wheat loading. The same condition did not before occurred in two years. April closed with the following values for Wheat, Peas, Barley, Corn, etc., in a long period, sales having actually been made, April 30th, of choice milling Wheat at $1 75@1 77½ per ctl. Choice to fancy milling Chevalier Barley, $1 37½@1 40. These are all good quotations for wholesale parcels. On May Day lower Liverpool quotations came on to the wires, and which had a depressing effect upon holders of Grain, causing free offerings at a rapid decline from those figures. The receipts of Wheat, with small lots, for April average ten of milled Wheat. Holders of Barley have been weak for some days with free offerings, and a decline of 2½c per ctl. has occurred, with buyers still out free shipments from Los Angeles and the South, and reserved rates from the Interior brisk. Oats do not advance materially. Beans remain in plentiful and cheap, very little demand for at this season of the year. The receipts of Potatoes have obtained shipments to Hongkong in a very marked degree, and the market is now in a very favorable condition. Are you suffering with some threat to malady? If so, and you wish to employ medicines that are scientifically prepared; that are reduced and that are sold at reasonable prices, their action, their cheapness, their adaptation to the various forms of disease for the cure of which they are recommended, are Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines. Full particulars in Pierce's Common Sense Book, kept for free distribution by all druggists.

FLOUR—There has been a notable advance in price, say from $5 50 to $7 50 for Superfine, $6 50 to $8 for Low Grades, and $7 50 to $9 for Extras, $10 per bbl for some of any real scarcity, but chiefly speculation based upon short crops and the rapid rise in the King William wheat market. The extent to which the depression is having its effect in stopping shipments of Grain in a very conservative estimate. Extra family mill price for Extras is $9@9 50 gold, $10@10 50 for jobbing lots. The wholesale rates are for Superfine $7@7 50; Extra, $8@8 50; Family, $9@9 50; Extra Family and Bakers' Extra, $9@9 50 per bbl.

WHEAT—The rise in prices during the last fortnight is quite unprecedented, ranging from $1@1 50 per ctl. with free sales at $1 62½@1 65 per ctl. for choice Milling. On the first day in May, by reason of a decline in New York and Liverpool, our market responded and fell back to $1@1 65 with free offers. A somewhat severe price of the day offerings are more free than for some time past, and the tendency is to lower rates for the season. At this writing there is the promise of a very early harvest. Within a fortnight new Barley will be coming in, and new Wheat soon. California and Oregon combined give promise of a surplus for export of one million tons. Oregon will be the first to ship, and is now preparing for extending as storage, while ours will be only half a crop. Transactions last day of April were as follows: 1,000 sks choice Milling, $1 50; 600 ctls Shipping, $1 60; 300 ctls choice Milling, $1 60; 600 ctls Shipping, $1 60; 300 ctls do, $1 62½; 1200 ctls do, $1 62½ @ 1 65 ctls do, $1 1000 ctls do, $1 62½@$1 65; 400 ctls do, $1 62½; 1000 sks do, $1; 1000 sks do, $1 65; 1000 ctls do, $1 62½. Liverpool quotations May 1st—10s 10d@10s 6d; Liverpool quotations of yesterday—10s 10d@10s 6d. Liverpool quotations of yesterday—10s 10d@10s 6d. Liverpool quotations of yesterday—10s 10d@10s 6d.

"THE PATTERN."

(Michaelmas Boy. '79.)

To hold Shelgobbins' town again
I've come with boots fondly bounding,
To greet the good old pallid face
And view the lovely scenes surrounding;
Once more with visage fat and lean
To shake a mug of simple pleasure,
And spend a sportive Michaelmas
With those I very dearly treasure.

Alas! how altered the Mills since
Since first I sorrowfully left it.
Of many a soul, familiar face
Hero's as little and the much saved it;
The comrades of my youthful years,
My heart was hoping here to find them,
But all are gone to home unseen,
And Keto's home is far behind them.

MacGeogan's boys, forever true,
Old Dan O'Grogan's sons and daughters,
And Maguire's noble fellows, too,
Have crossed the ocean to great waters:
And members whose who's who's dead.
And little orphans left in weeping.
Of all the dear band one can find in
Beside the ruined abbey sleeping.

Still there are many hearts around—
O'Donohoes brave as ever and sweet O'Dwyer—
The truest hands and truest shrewd,
And Keto's hopes are rising higher;
Their lovely manor is unshrived,
And, while the bitter past forgiving,
They possibly prove in all the world
Their cheerfulness upon earth is living.

O Michael of the holy fame
That gleams the first in mortal glory!
O centurion of the Reformed race
That became a star of Irish story!
What to every habit of born
As a college, and the lovingly poor scholar street, Jersey City? none ever evil powers!

Another matter of almost equal importance touches upon in the Pastoral, is the advisability of some of our young men, who abroad the reputation of being devoid of true scholarship—the scholarship that requires time and study and thought—and of being distinguishable by a miserable compound of shallowness and pretension. On the contrary, Dr. PLATT is a gentleman of very considerable attainments. He is master of his own mind and borrows no ideas from any one. He has opinions of his own, and has sufficient manliness to express them without wasting to consider whether they may suit the popular taste or not. In a word, he has the thorough honesty and sincerity of profound convictions. We should by no means like to bind ourselves down to the endorsement of all his ideas and opinions, even on this subject of education, where we evidently hold so much in common; but under all circumstances and on respect what he says as the utterances of a man of liberal mind and unimpeachable conscientiousness.

In the discourse which we print to-day Dr. PLATT very clearly shows the line of demarkation between the duties of the State or government with respect to education and the duties of the parents and the Church. In this country the two methods prevail about these matters. We boast about our liberty, about our principles which develop and ennoble individuality of character, yet we give our sanction and support in theories of the responsibility of government which lead directly to the despotism of ancient Sparta. We seem willing to accept as scientific persons the most superficial and to relegate God-given duties as heads of families, to State supremacy and to State control. The is what is really back of the whole question. Fathers and mothers are too lazy, too indifferent, or else too ignorant to fulfill their sacred duties toward their offspring, and they seek to throw all the burden upon the State. Consequently they think they have no right required of them when they send their children to public schools. And so they cannot agree as to the exact nature of religious instruction, they hit upon the compromise of excluding religious instruction altogether from the curriculum of studies. It is a wretched and miserable expedient. Dr. PLATT indicates pretty plainly what he believes must be the ultimate result of this, and we perfectly agree with him. One of the daily papers of the city has endorsed the proposition to exclude religious instruction altogether from the curriculum of studies. It is a wretched and miserable expedient. Of course it will be readily understood that additional priests are among the very first and most pressing necessities of a diocese, the population of which is increasing like that of San Francisco, and a peculiarity of the case is that they must be provided for beforehand. Priests cannot be improvised according as wanted; for they must undergo a long and careful training before they are fitted for the sacred ministry. They require a peculiar education, such as mere secular institutions can never give. As we have got no diocesan seminary of our own as yet, though that, too, will come in its good and proper time—it is necessary to have the young students intended for European colleges, presided over by learned, zealous and pious ecclesiastics. This imposes upon the diocese a great deal of expense, but it is perfectly unavoidable. It is to meet this expense that his Grace the Archbishop calls for the generous contributions of his faithful flock. The collection will be taken up to-morrow (Sunday) at all the Masses, and we trust that every individual attending the Holy Sacrifice will go prepared to contribute according to his or her means.

COLLECTION FOR THE SEMINARIANS.

Last Sunday there was read in the different churches of the city a Pastoral Address from his Grace the Archbishop, which we publish in another column of this day's issue. It referred to a matter closely relating to the future progress of the Church in this coast and to the duties of the Catholic community. Population is increasing rapidly in this State. Towns and villages are springing up in places where previously scarcely a house was to be seen. Old settlements are extending almost beyond recognition. New industries are being created and new avenues of employment are being opened up. It is true we have had a very bad year and passed through a season of very discouraging depression; but every one knows that this will prove only a temporary check, and that a renewal of old-time prosperity is close at hand.

With all this advance the Catholic population has steadily kept pace. It is daily increasing and daily gaining power. With increase of numbers, as a natural consequence, comes increase of wants—there is no possibility of avoiding this. New churches have to be provided, new schools established, new convents, asylums, etc., erected. People so profoundly impressed with the inestimable value of holy faith as Catholics are, and ought to be, do not look upon this as a embarrassment but rather regard it as a blessed triumph. It is an incentive to renewed exertions. The additional duties imposed by these ever-progressive circumstances are in stories rejoiced at, and grateful. Therefore is it that his Grace the Archbishop appeals with boundless confidence to his faithful people whenever the necessities of his Church or the requirements of his diocese demand their generous assistance. He has never yet been disappointed. On the present occasion he asks them to take up a collection in the different churches to defray the expense incidental to the education and training of the young Levites who are studying in European seminaries for duty upon the California mission.

Of course it will be readily understood that additional priests are among the very first and most pressing necessities of a diocese, the population of which is increasing like that of San Francisco, and a peculiarity of the case is that they must be provided for beforehand. Priests cannot be improvised according as wanted; for they must undergo a long and careful training before they are fitted for the sacred ministry. AN HONEST ENGLISHMAN.

The average Englishman appears to be totally incapable of understanding Irish questions. He has never been in Ireland, knows little if anything of the people, has not studied either the wants or requirements of its people. He is thoroughly satisfied with the British Government for Ireland, and is always ready to back it up, well it does not interfere with his amusements; it allows him all the rational liberty he can desire. Then, again, he is proud of his substantiality, and proud of the rank to which it has led his country. He, therefore, for the life of him, cannot comprehend how anybody else can be dissatisfied with it, and the idea of rebelling against it seems to him something like sacrilege. The fact is he argues that if it was not to be a full of national pride himself he will make no allowance for he existence in the minds of other people. He would start back in horror if any one were to say to him that all the rights and privileges he holds now he might also enjoy under French Government and that, therefore, there could be no grave objection, on the part of Englishmen, to the annexation of that country to France. Of course he cries out that Englishmen would never submit to foreign domination even for a single moment.

Exactly. Now, if this typical Britisher would only reflect for a moment and get the idea into his head that Irishmen, very naturally, regard the British government as alien and foreign, and that they have just as much objection, or at least as much to enduring the yoke of a strange nation, he would begin to understand that there is not, after all, so much unreasonableness in the Irish demand for national independence. And, again, if he would only read a fair and uncolored account of the pitiless plunderings, burnings, robberies and massacres, which marked the progress of England's conquest of Ireland, he would, unless he were an idiot, acknowledge that it is impossible for the two countries to be governed except on a harmonious union. A man may, out of Christian motives, forgive the assassins of his father and mother; but it would be rather too much to expect him to occupy the house with them and live in close and friendly relations. That would simply be unnatural. Now it is yet within the memory of living men and women how England suffered thousands and thousands of Irish people, young and old, or rot of fever and die of starvation, in the midst of plenty sent by a bounteous providence, sooner than "disturb commerce" or "interfere with the laws of trade." There are plenty of living witnesses of how England refused to lend one of her hundred ship warships to convey food from America to the perishing peasantry; and they remember, too, how duly had to be paid upon the alms of generous-hearted Americans before it was allowed reach the people. All these are historic facts which cannot be concealed or ignored, and they certainly will not be forgotten. Yet Irishmen are expected not only to forgive but to forget all this heartless tyranny and insensibility to human suffering.

But we have dropped out of sight our friend, "an Honest Englishman;" and wandered away from our proper subject. Let us resume it. Sometimes it happens that an Englishman, above the average either in information, or in intelligence, or in honesty of mind, deals with the Irish question, and then he is sure to make admissions most disagreeable to the vast bulk of his fellow-countrymen. Such a one is Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, son of that Duke of Marlborough who is at present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Addressing his constituents at Woodstock, for which he is Member of Parliament, a few weeks ago, he spoke of the Irish Home Rulers and the conduct of Parliament towards them. He acknowledged that Mr. PARNELL and his companions acted perfectly within their rights and he confessed that at the cause and occasion of her death. "Had there been no onslaught on the synagogues," says Baring Gould, "there would have been no murder of Hypatia." It is worth while inquiring into the cause which led to the "onslaught on the synagogues" and the expulsion of the Jews and Jewesses. Who were the aggressors? Let a near Socrates, the Novatian historian's account:

"On the Sabbath an immense multitude of Jews assembled in the theatre, where a women was to exhibit ordinary exhibition—namely, the performances of two famous dancers. With all their acrepulency in the observance of the Mosaic law, they were not occupied with the study of it than with all kinds of licentiousness and wantonness. The Jewesses also vied with one of the dancers, whilst the Christians applauded his rival; they came to blows; the fist was mutually exchanged, and the Prefect Orestes, by reason of the subsidy, succeeded in separating the combatants not exhausting order. But it was not of long duration. Some days afterwards the whole population was assembled again in the Amphitheatre. Among them was a certain professor de grammar [named Hierax,] a constant hearer and admirer of the Bishop, Cyril. As soon as the Jews per, they began to insult him, and they were no sooner in the theater in order to excite a sedition. Their vociferations continued a long time, and endured until supper-time. The Prefect Orestes sent to Hierax to be arrested and publicly scourged on the spot. This was a severe punishment for a man of his age, who having heard of this outrage, notified the leaders of the Jews, and warned them that unless they would cease to molest the Christians he would have them punished. These menaces, although well known to the multitude, did not in the least intimidate their fury. A conspiracy was organized among them to massacre all the Christians. According to a preconcerted plan, they provoked a fray on a public street. The church of Alexander is on fire!' said they one. scarred those Christians who rushed out to save their church. At daybreak there was a fearful carnage of the Christians. Cyril put himself at the head of the survivors, attacked the synagogue, expelled the Jews from Alexandria, and ranted their property as spoils of war. Orestes was overjoyed at this result of all hopes of peace. The governor cast the Book of the Gospels on the ground."

Then for Socrates, the Novatian historian. (Lib. VII., chap. xiii—xv.) Although bitterly opposed to St. Cyril, Socrates does not impute to him the murder of Hypatia. Neither does he call St. Cyril "the irreconcilable enemy of Orestes." On the contrary, he admits that St. Cyril implored the Governor, and extended "the right hand of fellowship" with the Holy Gospels, in order to be reconciled to him. What wonder, then, if the Nitrian monks, seeing the Governor cast the Gospels on the ground, and imagining that Hypatia emblazoned Orestes against St. Cyril, tore her to pieces? As well might we accuse Moses of being an accomplices with AARON, who connived at the idolatrous conduct of the Israelites.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR BOYS?

The Problem Solved — The Story of a Very Successful Experiment — Its Present Working — and Future Prospects.

The query which forms the caption of this article has been often and anxiously propounded of late years in San Francisco, and many efforts have in consequence been made to reclaim those who had already become tainted with that peculiar disease known as Sardoodledom, or to keep others, who were as yet innocent, free from the contagion; but, unfortunately, the well-meant endeavors have not been fruitful to good results. What was the cause of this failure? It was not God has blessed the evil was not attacked. Dr. Watts tells us that

> "Satan finds some mischief still
> For idle hands to do."

Idleness, the prolific source of crime and misery, has annually recruited the hoodlum ranks to such an extent that of the institution, which the Eastern press would have us believe is peculiar to our city, has become not only an annoyance, but a serious grievance, and even a positive danger. There was no occupation for the boys, no safety-valve, in the shape of honest employment, for the restless energy which is the characteristic of youth. The cheap Chinese immigration contributed greatly to this result—the market was glutted with Mongolians who worked for a boy's wages, and consequently shut the door on the poor white youngster.

The Most Rev. Archbishop and several well-known citizens, appreciating the necessity of finding employment for our rising generation, if we would prevent the unceasing increase of hoodlumism, organized the Youths' Directory. "This institution," we are informed in the Superintendent's second report, "is one we have now before us, was organized for the purpose of diminishing juvenile crime and vagabondage, by affording employment, together with food and shelter, without charge, to homeless boys of San Francisco in search of work." We are informed by Mr. A. P. Dietz, the zealous Superintendent of the Directory, that since its opening in November, 1874, to September 1, 1877, 7,889 boys have been procured for 7,889 boys." This is a noble record. The office of the Directory is now located on Bush street, but has since been removed to Howard street between Tenth and Eleventh streets. The building now occupied is a large commodious one in office, a dormitory (having about a dozen beds furnished by generous patrons), kitchen, refectory and rooms for the Superintendent's family. The whole establishment is worked on an income of less than $100 per month, exclusive of the Superintendent's and matron's salaries. Considering the vast amount of good effected, this is a ridiculously moderate sum; but this Directory is poor, and the hands of the Superintendent are crippled for want of funds. The most rigid economy were not practiced it would be an impossibility to support the institution with such inadequate means. Many cases of real distress could be relieved on this account.

It is sad to be compelled to refuse help to worthy applicants. Shelter and food for a few days until employment was obtained might save many born criminal career which they are too often driven by poverty and despair. The future of this most deserving institution lies in the hands of our citizens; let them support it liberally, let them by their liberal contributions enlarge its sphere of usefulness, and the problem of what we are to do with our boys will be forever solved. The County Jail and the Industrial School will not be overcrowded in their mission of suppressing hoodlumism. Give the Youths' Directory a chance to extend a helping hand to our boys when they are in need of work, and they have to be so frequently resorted to. Such institutions are worth a whole army of police. Every dollar so spent is well invested.

Many manufacturers, farmers, laundry proprietors, etc., are applying to the Directory for boys to take the place of Chinese, now. This is a healthy sign. In connection with the Directory is a Home for Boys, at 1417 Howard street and inspect the Directory for themselves. The generous and indefatigable Superintendent, Mr. Dietz, will furnish all information and supply visitors with a copy of the annual and quarterly report. Contributions, not only of money, but of food, linen, blankets and such like, are very acceptable.

Winter is rapidly approaching—times have been exceptionally trying in the laboring poor, and it is in our power to aid them in a most effectual manner by assisting this admirable work. The Superintendent writes us: "This Home and Bureau, now in the zenith of its usefulness, is sorely cramped for want of funds to carry out its object." Toil should not be. The Youths' Free Directory is an honor to San Francisco, and, above all, an honor to our Catholic fellow-citizens who have established a philanthropic undertaking, and, with a rare spirit of true Christian charity and patriotism generally, made it free to all classes, irrespective of creed. It should not be allowed to decline for want of revenue. Christmas is drawing nigh, that beautiful season of universal charity. May we not hope that many will come forward generously to aid this institution. Its need is urgent; let the charitable hasten to its assistance and give a helping hand to the children of the poor, many of whom are in need of the very necessities of life. Subscriptions or other gifts will be received with thanks by the Most Rev. Archbishop or the Superintendent, 1417 Howard street. If this institution is not supported it will indeed be a solemn question "What shall we do with our boys?"

Church Fair at Temescal.

NORTH TEMESCAL (Oakland Township), October 17, 1877.

EDITOR MONITOR—On the 18th inst. we opened a fair for the benefit of the Catholic Church of the Sacred Heart, Temescal, at Col. Fernandez's Hall, Junction of Adeline street and San Pablo avenue, and intended to close it last night with the drawing of prizes; but owing to the rain last evening, only a few persons attended, and on that account it was considered best to close up the fair till next Saturday, 27th inst., when it will be opened again. A general attendance is expected, and the final drawing of prizes will take place on the evening of the same day, and everything then remaining unsold will be offered for sale at auction. Thus the lady managers and their helpers have not lost every means of defense and protection, and except the Priest their intentions have always been to deal honestly and fairly with their patrons. During last week the fair was well attended, and considering that times are dull and rather hard, I might say that the fair has been a success, which is very creditable to the good ladies in charge of the tables, and their assistants as well.

Hoping you will be kind enough to give publicity to the above facts in the next issue of your valuable paper, I remain, dear sir, your humble servant,

LAWRENCE SHANA.

We have received the Biennial Report of the Secretary of State, from December 5, 1875, to July 1, 1877. It gives a full account of all Mr. Beck's actions relating to official duties, and all the disbursements made by him. We cannot say that it is an interesting reading, but no doubt there are plenty of persons who will peruse it from beginning to end in quest of information.

We have received an "Offertorium" for Requiem Masses, from Edwin F. MacGoogin, St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook, Pa., and "A Dream of Home and Mother," song and chorus, from M. Gray, Kearny street.

Cyril and Hypatia.

EDITOR MONITOR—Dear Sir: Having seen a paragraph in a newspaper stating, on the authority of Dean Stanley, that the murdered Hypatia was not murdered by the Christians and very probably at the instigation of St. Cyril, the Archbishop of Alexandria; having also read in the Alta California Dean Stanley's account of Draper's pernicious "Conflict Between Religion and Science," in reference to the murder of the philosopher Hypatia, I felt it advisable to write a few lines stating the whole truth and nothing but the truth" relative to the cause and occasion of her death. "Had there been no onslaught on the synagogues," says Baring Gould, "there would have been no murder of Hypatia." It is worth while inquiring into the cause which led to the "onslaught on the synagogues" and the expulsion of the Jews and Jewesses. Who were the aggressors? The Chicago Times' Washington special of October 19, says: The money refunded by LaGrange on the strength of the last report, $2,500, was paid into the Treasury on-day. Some $1,000, which the Commission found him legally responsible for, still remains due, and it is altogether probable that a suit will be in due season instituted against La Grange and his bondsmen. It is the evident intention of Dr. Lindeman to recover all that has been lost to the Government.

—John Morrissey received the Anti-Tammany nomination for Senator from the Seventh District. The district is the home of John Kelly, chief of the Tammany organization.

—The injunction recently issued against the School Directors, of New Orleans, at the instance of Paul Trevyzer, forbidding the Board from maintaining separate schools for white and colored children, was totally dissolved by Judge Rightor, of the Sixth District Court.

— Congressmen Cox, of New York, will shortly introduce a bill abolishing the colleges of twenty-one places.

— A Washington dispatch of the 22d says: No action has been taken by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury looking to a change in any of the San Francisco Mint officers, but General La Grange having intimated his desire and intention to resign the Superintendency during the next few days, recommendations are now being made on behalf of various persons for appointment to the place. Ex-Congressman Houghton, of California, is recommended for the place in several letters received at the Treasury Department. Consequently, the Priest is the one whose duty of consecrating their lives to the service of God. What mission could be more worthy of admiration than that of devoting every little energies to the furthering of the Christian education of youth? Who are the first out of His infinite charity, canvassed with love for thirty-three years, to teach them the way to eternal life? Who are only in the knowledge of Christianity, naturally deserves the name of Christian? Who are the ones allied to the mission of the Son of God, Our young men generally prefer to engage in the secular pursuits of life, rather than the vocation of a Christian Brother, who prefers, even from his youth, to live in little with the wages of a superior kind, and in duration college consisting of an office, a dormitory (having about a dozen beds furnished by generous patrons), kitchen, refectory and rooms for the Superintendent's family. The whole establishment is worked on an income of less than $100 per month, exclusive of the Superintendent's and matron's salaries. Considering the vast amount of good effected, this is a ridiculously moderate sum; but this Directory is poor, and the hands of the Superintendent are crippled for want of funds. BRIEF CITY ITEMS.

— By a telegram received by Superintendent LaGrange, from the Director of the Mint, the coinage of trade dollars is suspended until further notice.

— James G. Maguire, Assemblyman from San Francisco, has been commissioned Second Lieutenant of the Meagher Guard, Co. D Third Infantry Regiment, Second Brigade.

— Three pairs of English pheasants have been placed on Goat Island, and that the birds may increase and multiply, the rest of firearms on the Island has been prohibited.

— An explosion occurred October 23d in a colliery at High Blantyre, near Glasgow. Four hundred men are said to have been in the mine, and a large number are killed.

— A dispatch from Rome, dated October 19, says: The Pope's health remains good. Five or six Cardinals are to be appointed in the Consistory to be held about Christmas.

—Col. W. H. L. Barnes will deliver the address at the formal opening of the dog show on Monday next.

— The Governor Among, on her last trip from this city to Portland, made the passage in forty-six hours—the quickest time yet made between these ports.

— The next session of the Grand Lodge of the Emerald Isle Benevolent Association, held at their rooms, at Irish-American Hall, on Wednesday evening, October 17, the following officers were elected: Vice President, Jas. McLaughlin, reelected; Treasurer, James O'Connell, reelected; Recording Secretary, Timothy J. King, reelected; Corresponding Secretary, Michael McBride, reelected; Board of Trustees—Hugh McMullen, reelected; Patrick Scott, reelected; Dennis Wheelen, reelected; Patrick Cosgrove, reelected; Daniel Breslin.

— St. Mary's Society gave a temperance entertainment in the basement of St. Mary's Cathedral on the evening of October 19. Two thousand people were present. Mr. Frank Conklin, the President of the Society, opened with a stirring address on the vices of intemperance, after which St. Mary's Band played as overture. Hon. H. Gay McClellan was the lecturer of the evening, and spoke in a feeling manner of the horrors and crimes caused by the use of strong drink. John J. Cosgrave gave "The Irish Peasant to His Native Home, a young lady of natural vocal ability, sang with good effect, and James W. Boland, a comedian of some merit, gave "Old Mother Hubbard." which was well received. The entertainment of the evening was concluded with the Society has the reputation for since its organization.

— Twenty-eight miles in one hour and nineteen minutes! Such was the record between Mare Island and San Francisco on record—that made Wednesday by the North Pacific Coast Railroad Company's new side-wheel steamer Monticello; and it was only her trial trip—the first time steamed from the Vallejo Street wharf to Benicia to a beauty. She is the sister of the Sausalito, belonging to the same company—alike in everything, both in their boilers are placed a little further forward than usual in steaming, to make her better in the water and increase her speed.

— On Tuesday evening last the workingmen of the Tenth Ward assembled in Irish-American Hall, E. J. Joyce presiding. The object of the meeting was to hear reports of the financial affairs of the Ward and enrolling new members was first transacted, after which Mr. Joyce expressed his views. He stated that the workingmen intended to be heard and understood in the coming election, and denounced Congress, and our Representatives will be sent to Washington to carry out their wishes. Before the assembled workingmen a mighty mass-meeting of the workingmen will be held in the Pavilion, in which many able speakers will address the people in their own language, their position in the present crisis. J. O. Day and other speakers followed.

The November number of The Catholic World contains a lively article on the "Free Religionists" and their proceedings at their late meeting in Boston. Their case of idea, the pretentiousness and affectation of learning, of some of these gentlemen, and the general want in high relief. We have long a second "Glance at the Social Question," from a man who shows that he is thoroughly at home in his subject; and it is to be hoped that his suggestions will receive due attention from the people for which they are intended. "The Two Prophets of Mormonism" is of course a history of the rise, growth and development of Mormonism up to the present revolting stage, and at the same time a key to the whole movement. In the "God of Advanced Science" the "advanced" scientific doctrines very rough handling in the person of one of their leading representatives in this country—Professor Youmans. A very interesting paper is that on Father Isaac Jogues, the recent discovery of his remains—by far the completest and best-written account which has yet appeared of the last days of the great missionary, and of the disposal of his remains. "Charles Lever at Home" is a breezy but generous reminiscence of the favorite Irish novelist, containing some capital stories as they fell from the lips of that most inimitable of raconteurs. Dr. James of Compostella" gives a pleasing account of the shrine of the Spanish patron saint and its history. "A Sweet Harangue" is a lively bit of story-writing; and the "Little Chapel at Monte Carlo," at once tender, graceful and humorous, promises to be unusually good. "A Legend of Dieppe" is well told. The poetry is of the high order which is characteristic of this magazine; and in the literary criticisms some works as Cardinal Manning's Miscellanies and Dr. Schaff's Creeds of Christendom are treated as only thoroughly competent hands and trained minds can treat them.

A FINE lot of oodlish is being offered at Haslip's tea store, 622 Market street, at 25 cents per pound; best coffee, 3 lbs. for $1; 4 lbs. best ground coffee, $1; 12 candles, 25 cents; 5 bar soap, 25 cents; 4 lbs. raw crop Japan tea, $1; 4 crop, 75 cents; 5 pulse; roast oil, 3 gallons one, $1 50. Haslip & Co. do a strictly cash business, which accounts for the extreme low prices they have on their goods. They also have a large wholesale trade up and down the coast.

Sitting Bull Treats the Commissioners With Contempt.

CHICAGO, October 22.—A special from Fort Welsh, Northwest Territory, via Fort Benton says: The Commission has met Sitting Bull and utterly failed to obtain any satisfaction or terms of settlement from him. The Canadian officials had experienced great trouble in Canada with Sitting Bull and his warriors to meet the Commission, and the Sioux chief had believed some of the statements which had been made concerning them. He held the Americans in contempt, and deemed them thieves and liars.

He utterly refused to see them, and it was only after Major Welsh, the officer in command of the post, had remained in his camp three days that he succeeded in inducing him to make the journey. The camp of Sitting Bull is at present located on the north side of the White and Mud River, 20 miles east of Fort Welsh and 15 miles north of the boundary. When the Indians arrived at the post they were assigned a large cabin from one of the log houses, and were given all the food they desired to eat. During the intervening days they remained to await the arrival of the American Commissioners, the Indians became very restless and threatened to return to the village. Given up their arms and cease hostilities, and that if they would return and henceforth refrain from acts of hostility they would be given for all cessation in the past. The speech of the General produced no effect on the Indians. The offer of peace was rejected, the Council broke up, and the Commissioners turned their faces homeward.

SITTING BULL'S CONTUMELY.

The correspondent describes Sitting Bull as very dark and swarthy, his straight black hair falling down upon his shoulders, his features regular and strongly marked countenances all betokening the pure-blood savage. He stands five feet ten inches in his moccasins and is splendidly proportioned. The one drawback to his really fine bearing is a pair of bowed legs. He wore a fan cap, ornamented with the tail of a badger, which hung over the left side of his head; a heavy robe of buffalo hide was wrapped closely about his neck and shoulders. He wore no ornaments in his ears or hair, and no paint was discernible on his face.

On September 17th a summons to answer a charge of libel was served upon Mr. D. Sullivan, M. P., Nation, at the suit of Mr. Callan, M.P. The charge was libel as been heard in Dublin on the 6th inst.

On September 20th two gentlemen, M. T. O'Brien, Esq., solicitor, 9 Lower Dominick street, Dublin, and Dr. Brennan, of Lou'sburg, proceeded in a small pleasure boat to an island in Westport bay, county Mayo, for the purpose of shooting, and when returning homeward in the evening to their residence in Streamstown, a tremendous waterspout on the coast, and when Mr. O'Brien was residing with his brother in-law, W. J. Kelly, Esq., solicitor, Castlebar, the boat upset. Mr. O'Brien sank shortly after the occurrence, but Dr. Brennan reached the shore in an exhausted and almost dying condition. He is nearly recovered now. Mr. O'Brien leaves a young widow.

On the 24th September Mr. Thomas D. Wright committed suicide by shooting himself through the head at No. 5 St. Andrew street, Dublin. The deceased, who had not reached his thirty-first year, was a journalist by profession, carrying on an extensive business in Townsend street, in conjunction with an establishment of a similar description owned by his widowed sister-in-law.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

— Father Weninger, S. J., recently gave a very successful mission at Houghton, Lake Superior, where he had the happiness of rescuing a large number of strayed sheep to the fold, and where he also had the happiness of receiving fifteen converts.

— At St. Peter's Catholic Church, Saffron Hill, London, on Sunday, September 30th, the Rev. T. A. Eglinton, M. A., a well-known professor at Worcester College, in the University of Oxford, was received into the Catholic Church.

— The friends of the venerable clergyman, Rev. F. Sourin, S. J., will regret to learn that he is confined to his residence, attached to St. Ignatius' church, Baltimore, Md., through illness.

— The Rev. John Monaghan, of the Prieste of the Congregation of the Mission, died on Thursday, October 4th, at the Mother House of the Congregation, at Mount St. Vincent, Germantown, Philadelphia, aged 82 years.

— Rev. D. M. Kneip, O. F., died at St. Rose's Convent, St. Louis, on Thursday evening, October 4, after a brief but severe illness, in the 57th year of his age.

— The London Weekly Register of October 6th says, that Cardinal Barile-Sforza, Archbishop of Naples, who was regarded as one of the candidates for the tiara when likely to receive the largest number of votes, showed symptoms of disease which was pronounced by us on Saturday last in our second edition, has just died, at the age of 67.

— At S. Rose, in Paris, there were no less than the Holy Catholic and Roman Church, by Very Rev. Mgr. Rogerson, Mr. Van Rensselaer and Mr. Mackall, late fellow-students in the Episcopalian Church at New York; and, upon the same day and at the same place, Miss Van Rensselaer, recently a Sister in the Anglican Church in London.

— The offer and solemn Mass for the repose of the deeply lamented soul of Rev. Mother Mary Joseph Ryan, of the Presentation Convent, Cork, were held in the convent chapel, Saturday, September 29th, his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Croke, the reverend Bishop of the Diocese, presiding. Venerable Archdeacon Quirke, Canbel, being celebrant, the Rev. Mother Prioress of the Rev. Wm. O'Doherty and the Rev. Michael Horigan as deacon and subdeacon.

— The Most Rev. Dr. Warren, Lord Bishop of the diocese of Ferns, has, we understand, made the following clerical changes in that diocese: Rev. T. O'Connor, from Tagheen to Wexford, consequent upon the retirement of Rev. Thos. Power, who leaves shortly for Bishop Rice to join the Redemptorist Order; Rev. Jos. Walsh, Moyglass to Tagheen; Rev. P. D'Arcy, Rathdrogan to Moyglass; Rev. Jas. Doyle, Prumnaggart to Galbally, vice Rev. Wm. Wyse, who retires temporarily on account of delicate health; Rev. William Furnissee, Moygiass to Rilmeenie.

— In the most definitely arranged that the splendid new Catholic Church of St. Patrick's, Newtownards, will be dedicated on Wednesday, the 24th October. 11 months are to elapse from the time the foundation stone was laid, when everything has been completed, and about £19,000. The church has been built at the sole expense of the Dowager Marchioness of Londonderry, who was received into the Church about twenty years ago, and who is a daughter of the late ultra-Orange peer, the Earl of D——.

— The Most Rev. Dr. Power, Lord Bishop of Waterford, made a most comforting announcement of nearly 500 children presented him at the confirmation on Saturday, September 29, in Dungarvan. After reading the boys he paid them a great and public compliment on the way they were among the best he ever examined. The very rev. pastor was so delighted with the way in which all acquitted themselves that he requested a few holidays the ensuing week for them.

— Consequent upon the death of his Eminence Cardinal de Angelis the number of the cardinals became reduced to sixty-three, and these belonging to the order of bishops, forty-nine to the order of priests and ten to the order of deacons. The dean of the cardinal-bishops and of the whole college is Cardinal Di Pietro, second dean being Cardinal de Pietro. Out of these three cardinals only five were not created by the reigning Pontiff—namely, Cardinal Amat, the dean; Cardinal Archbishop of Compostella, the Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Oreoli, Archbishop of Benevento, Cardinal Rinaldi Mirone, Archbishop of Naples; Cardinal Swarzenberg, Archbishop of Prague—all of whom were created cardinals by Pope Gregory XVI.

— The obsequies of the Most Rev. Dr. Moriarty took place in Killarney on the 4th October, and were conducted with great impressiveness and pomp. There was a large attendance of ecclesiastics, religious, dignitaries, and religious of various orders, representing nearly every diocese in the province. The solemn requiem Mass for the repose of the soul of the much lamented bishop was participated in largely by the Protestant aristocracy of the county and city. At the meeting of the Limerick Board of Guardians a resolution of sympathy and condolence on the great loss sustained by the country at large, and Kerry in particular, by the death of Bishop Moriarty, was unanimously agreed to. After the interment of the Most Rev. Dr. Moriarty, the Chapter of the Diocese assembled at the Episcopal Palace, and elected the Very Rev. Dean Galvin, P. P., Vicar Capitular, to the office of Vicar Capitular of the diocese.

— Cardinal McCloskey has appointed Rev. Dr. Patrick F. Mathewsey, of Poughkeepsie, pastor of St. Peter's Roman Catholic church, in place of Rev. Father Mooney, lately deceased. The appointee is one of the most learned and zealous priests in the diocese. He was ordained in Rome, and for several years officiated as assistant at St. Patrick's Cathedral. He was thence transferred to the pastoral charge of a church in Poughkeepsie. His brother, Dr. Edward McEnaney, is also a pastor of a church in Poughkeepsie. Another brother, Francis McEnaney, is now in Rome, studying for the priesthood, while a third, Rev. O. Callahan McEnaney, recently died in New York, while officiating as assistant at St. Teresa's and other Catholic churches. Still another brother, Dr. Daniel E. McEnaney, is a practising physician in New York, one of the leading members of his profession in the metropolis. The uncle of the new pastor, Rev. Dr. McEnaney, was for fourteen years President of the Irish College in Paris. On his mother's side he had two or three priests in his family. Talent and genius seem to have been the prerogative of this family in all its branches.

Produce Market Report.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 26, 1877.

We remark very little activity in the Piece and Grain markets, and were it not for the free Oregon supplies reaching us by every steamer, our table of reports would be indeed small. Prices paid by millers and exporters are really more than is warranted by Liverpool quotations daily to hand by cable. Eastern advices for Barley represent the crop large and of good quality both in Canada and the States and this was an out of ship hope of a market in that direction. A year ago California was a very large shipper by rail and sea to Chicago, New York, Baltimore and other cities. In September of last year nearly 7,000,000 lbs of Barley went overland, this season there is none moving in that direction. The truth is, we have no surplus in spare and prime here are for above Eastern figures. Coal continue to arrive freely from the North, commanding good prices. Oregon Extras are held at $5 12½@ 5 25, Shipping Extras are held at $5 10@5 12½ for cargo parcels. Both dressed Extras command the attention of the local market; for Family and Bakers Extra, say $5 50@5 75 bbl.

WHEAT—The market is rather quiet, yet, when the advent of the rainy season, farmers seem more willing to sell at current rates. We note sales during the week in Bulwers: 6000 ctls choice shipping, @ $1 87½; 1000 ctls second do, @ $1 70; 600 ctls choice milling, $1 87½; 1000 ctls good milling, delivered at Vallejo, @ 90 cts; 900 ctls good milling, @ $1 82½; 1000 ctls choice, Chili milling, on private terms; 600 ctls choice shipping, @ $1 80; 6000 ctls good milling, @ $1 80; 600 ctls choice do, @ $1 80; 1000 ctls do, @ $1 87½; 600 ctls fair shipping, @ $1 82; 800 ctls choice shipping, @ $1 85; 1000 ctls Oregon shipping, @ $1 85; Bulk do. At shipping at $5 12 and 1000 ctls good shipping alongside at $5 10 @ 5 12½. Liverpool quotations, October 5th, 10s 10d for an average; 11s 2d for no cash.

BARLEY—The market is exceedingly languid and prices are low. Feed grades are in excess of the very little demand for brewing, and no prospect of an Eastern overland outlet this year, as crops in Canada and Eastern States are reported to have been on both sides of the continent. Sales during the week here were as follows: 1000 ctls, more or less, Feed Barley, on the Bay Feed, @ 87½ cts; 600 ctls do, @ 77½; 600 ctls Island feed, $1 cts; 300 ctls Coast feed, @ 82½; 1,000 ctls Bay Feed, @ 77½; 600 ctls Island feed, @ 87½ @ 90 cts. Sales at the close of 500 ctls Chevalier at $1 50 and 1,000 ctls old Bay brewing at $1 60 @ 65.

OATS—The market is without change. We note sales during the week in bags as follows: 800 ctls White Surprise Feed, $1 75; 400 ctls Bay Feed, $1 70; 100 ctls Coast Feed, per ctl, $2 25; 150 ctls Hunnicutt Feed, $1 60; 150 ctls do, $1 50, silver; 100 ctls Bay Feed, $1 45 @ 1 50, silver; 100 ctls do, $1 40, silver, and 500 ctls new small rows at $1 40 @ 50, gold.

RYE—We note sales of 600 ctls good to $2 50; 100 ctls Bay Feed, $1 90; 100 ctls do, $1 85.

POTATOES—Are in fair demand at $1 @@1 50 ₱ ctl.

HONEY—We still receive small lots of choice Comb Honey, which commands 20c ₱ lb; extracted ready sale at fair rates. No receipts as yet from the South. Stocks are very much reduced, and prices firm. We quote: Extracted, 10@12½c ₱ lb; Comb, sources and selling at 17@20c for light; dark do 12@15c.

BEESWAX—Is very scarce and in demand. Prices are firm at 30@32½c for good to choice.

POTATOES—Sweets are in fair demand, and prices are nominal.

ONIONS—The receipts are heavy and the demand light. Prices are steady and now quotable at 4@ 4½c per lb for choice Silverskin.

HAY—We note a slight improvement in prices, particularly in the better qualities. We quote fair to good shipping at 11 @12½ per ton; choice do at $13 @14; $15 @16 per ton, with sales of 25 tons of the latter at $16 per ton.

WOOL—Receipts are moderately free, but the market is dull, particularly in mountain and San Joaquin Valley, and the nineteen southern crops, for which the range of prices may be quoted at 16@17½c for berry, and 18@19c for free. Northern—Humboldt and Mendocino is sold of better grade still more readily, although at low rates—say 19@21c, the latter rule the extreme, except for extra choice parcels, which receive 22c, and is estimated at about two-thirds that of last fall. Our warehouses are well filled, and the market accommodating. Sales for the week as far as reported are as follows: 300,000 lbs, at 16@17c; 100,000 lbs, at 17½@17½; 100,000 lbs, 18@21c; 300,000 lbs, 19 @20c.

We receive considerable country store Butter of mixed qualities and assorted colors and shapes, which is almost entirely unsalable in this market, except at merely nominal rates, buyers preferring the Pickled Roll which the Dairymen can put up during the season as it is of uniform color and quality, and can be bought within the range of 37½@41½c. A Remarkable Speech.

Lord Randolph Churchill, member for Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, a county borough besides Blenheim, his father's princely seat, has "flattered the Volscians," and may exclaim, "Alone, I did it." Addressing an audience of his constituents in Woodstock, a few days ago, he singled out Ireland and her political treatment for his denouncing notice. He described her as passing which the British Government had, he said, "enthroned all the arsenal of the passions and the appetites," and declared that from the violation of good faith and treatment extended to the country, "the logical sequence would be to give back the Irish Parliament." He commented that "there were great and crying questions of the Irish which the Government had not attended to. He did not say he was inclined to attend to, perhaps did not seem inclined to attend to—the question of the intermediate and higher education of Ireland, the question of the assimilation of the municipal and Parliamentary electoral privileges, and other questions which he would not go into then; but, at the same time, they were of the highest importance to Ireland, and so long as they were neglected, as long as the Government did not take them in hand, and endeavor to settle them, so long would they have to deal with Obstruction from Ireland." He further intended his audience that "they must remember that England had years of wrong, years of oppression, years of misrule of government to make amends for to Ireland."

And who is Lord Randolph H. Churchill? He is a nobleman about thirty years of age, and has sat in the House of Commons since 1874. His mother is an Irishwoman, and her elder sister is the Duchess of Marlborough, the Queen's popular Viceroy at present in Ireland, and Woodstock; where he spoke, is one of the Royal Manors granted by Parliament, with the splendid palace of Blenheim erected at the national expense, with a noble monumental pillar to commemorate the brilliant victory of Blenheim, won by the first Duke of Marlborough, with a splendid hereditary pension, and made a Prince of the German Empire. Such sentiments, and from such a man, here, as might be expected, caused a deep sensation in England and in Ireland, while even after their utterance his Lordship and his wife came over here, and are at present at the Viceregal Lodge, on a visit.

The Season of Intermittents.

All miasmatic complaints, in other words, all disorders generated by carbonizeous exhalations from the earth or water, are prevalent at this season. In the vast ocean region to the westward of the Rocky range, or other forms of intermittent disease, the common under positive form maladies are very actively at work. This, therefore, is a period of the year the inhabitants of such districts should prepare their systems to meet the carbonizeous exertions of the atmosphere by a course of tonic and alterative treatment. Foremost among the latter, we recommended by time and experience as a means of forti-fying the system against all outbreaks and epidemic maladies, stands Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. By a timely use of the Bitters, the feeblest resident of a fever-and-ague district may escape the ultimate wrath of the foe, but all the present duty of nature, will be apt to overtake the strongest.

BELFAST.—The City of Belfast, Ireland, which a century ago had about 13,000 inhabitants, has in the present day a population of about 200,000, of which nearly 54,000 are Roman Catholics, while upward of 60,000 are Presbyterians and accept the Westminster Confession of Faith. Next to these in point of numbers rank the Episcopalians, who are about 47,000 strong; and of course every variety of belief and nonbelief has it representatives in this large and prosperous town.

From time to time we feel impelled to notice the efforts of Messrs. Anderson & Randolph, jewelers and goldsmiths, Montgomery street, to suit the public taste in matters of personal adornment and sorts. We only repeat the public verdict when we declare that in their line they stand foremost in the city. In fact their store always contains an exposition of the beautiful and the costly in precious metals and low le.

3 MONTGOMERY STREET (Masonic Temple), S. F.

MESSRS. BURR & FINK, in announcing a very large REDUCTION in their prices of Gentlemen's Clothing, have still the same faith as ever—namely, that in spite of dull times, there are men who must buy and wear Clothes, and there are still to be San Francisco many who believe that good work, good material, and garments that fit well, and are stylish and graceful, are, in the light of economy, the best and the cheapest. To this class we would say that we now make, to measure, good BUSINESS SUITS at from $40 to $55—a reduction that must bring these suits within the means of all who study economy intelligently. In FINISH and WORKMANSHIP every article will be precisely as heretofore. Call and examine for yourselves. There is no use of wearing ready-made clothes, manufactured in the East, when you can get a suit made to your order at BURR & FINK'S for the same price, thereby supporting home labor.

Sitting Bull's Reply to Gen. Terry.

[Chicago Times' Report.]

In his turn, Sitting Bull rose slowly to his feet, threw the robe off his shoulders, and displayed a blue calico shirt, which was worn over his leggings. His leggings were made of dark blue cloth, with a dark stripe extending down the side, and around his neck was tied a red-banded handkerchief. His first sentence was uttered in a sharp, vindictive manner, and his mannerism throughout was in following. The actions of each sentence was followed by "How!" from all the Indians in the room, showing how closely they sympathized with him. As I watched the swaying body of the Indian and saw his mobile face light up as he spoke of the great wrongs of his people, and uttered his contempt and hatred for the American nation, I could not but admire the eloquence which enabled him to speak so strongly. Every thought was expressed in a gesture more powerful than the words could be framed to read. When he cried, "You come here to tell us lies!" he advanced to the Commissioners and shook his forefinger at them with force and fury, and stood there till the translation had been made. When he told he Commissioner to take it easy going back home, he conveyed the only smile during his speech, and the irony was undoubtedly very fine. He spoke as follows:

"For sixty-four years you have kept me and my people, and treated me bad. What have we done that you should want us? We have done nothing. It is the people of your side that have wanted me to do all these depredations. We could not go anywhere else, so we took refuge in this country of the British. It was on this side of the country that we learned to shoot, and that is the reason that I came back to it again. Why do you come here? In the first place I did not see you. You came on my land and followed me from one place to another, so I had to leave and come over to this country. I did not send for you. Secondly, but you took it away from me. I was born and raised in the Black Hills. I was a Black Hills bred braves, and I intend to stop with them. I was raised here and bred with the Red River half breeds. I was on my own ground when I met many of the country, and that is the reason why I have come here. I have nothing beside with the British officers, as you have with the people, and that is the reason why I have come to them. You have got scars to show, and you have got eyes to see, and you see how I live with these people. You see me. Here I am. If you think I am a fool, you are a bigger fool than I am myself. I am not the fool you think. You come here to tell us lies, but we don't want to hear them. I don't wish any such language addressed to me, that is to tell me such lies is my great mother's house. Don't you say two words before you go back home where you came from. This country is mine, and instead to stay here and to raise this country full of children, as you have done, you here were raised with them." Again shaking hands with the British officers. "That is enough. I do not see you crying with these people. The part of the country you gave me to run run into the United States. I come here to stay with these people, and I intend to stay here. I wish you to go back and take a good look back."

Taking a Sans Indien by the head, he said: "These Sans's are born and raised with. He is going to tell you something about them."

On concluding his speech, Sitting Bull advanced and took Colonel McLeod by the hand, and walking past the members of the Commission, ran down the line, shaking hands with officers of the mounted police in the room, and addressing a few words to his own people, sat down among them.

THE SUN'S SPEECH [SAUVAGE].

"Look at me. Seven years in the country. For seven years I have starved, and I am treated as bad. I don't like you. You tell lies. I will not be satisfied with these people as long as I live. I shake hands with them. You come over and tell us lies. Go home, and don't be easy as you go."

SPEECH BY A TANETON WHO WAS IN THE MISSOURA MASSACRE.

"I don't wear the same clothes that you do. You come here to lie. You are treated as bad for sixty-four years, and have been living on all this time. There were seven different tribes of us. We promised to take care of us when we were over there, but you did not do it. We like these people, and intend to live with them. I don't intend to kill any one." [Shook hands with General Terry and Lawrence.]

SPEECH BY A SQUAW.

"You would not give me time to raise children, so I came over here to raise children and live in peace."

[To allow a squaw to speak in council is one of the wonders of the Indian character.]

CROW'S SPEECH.

"You would not give me time to raise children, so I came over here to raise children and live in peace."

[To allow a squaw to speak in council is one of the wonders of the Indian character.]

CROW'S SPEECH.

After hissing all the English officers, he said: "What do you mean by coming over here and talking this way to me? We were driven out of your country and come to this one. I am afraid of God and don't want to do anything bad. For sixty-four years you have treated me bad. These people give us plenty to eat. You can go back and get away. I come to this country, and my great mouth never will be shut. I come to live in peace and raise children."

After the Crow had spoken he sat down and said they were done. General Terry then stated that the Commissioners had nothing further to say. The Indians then left, after shaking hands with the English officers.

The Late Archbishop's Will.

The Tribune says: "The published will of the late Archbishop Bayley has excited some inquiries about the disposition and amount of his property. The will simply bequeathed all his Archbishop's and real property in New Jersey, to Cardinal McCloskey, Bishop Loughlin, of Brooklyn, and Bishop Corrigan, of Newark. The remaining portion of his property was given to Bishop Gibbons, of Richmond, Bishop Becker, of Wilmington, and Bishop Kain, of Wheeling. Many persons have thought this was personal property which the Archbishop divided equally among the three prelates named above. A prominent clergyman recently stated to a Tribune reporter that the will had been misinterpreted. In bequeathing his property to the six prelates, he was simply performing a duty that belonged to every bishop. The title deeds of the various institutions and churches in a diocese are in the name of the bishop. Many deeds of property belonging to the diocese of Newark, such as that of Seton Hall College, Archbishop Bayley never conveyed to his successor. At his death he gave them to the prelates of the province in which the property was situated. None of his personal property whatever was given to them. At his death Archbishop Bayley was worth about $4,000, which he had disposed of several weeks before. Of this amount, $1,000 was distributed through the diocese of Newark, and $1,500 through the diocese of Baltimore. These amounts were to be devoted to Masses for the repose of his soul. The Masses were reckoned at $3 each. He left $1,200 for his funeral expenses. The remainder was distributed among the Little Sisters of the Poor and other charitable institutions. He also had a paid up life insurance policy of $10 000, half of which he gave to Seton Hall College, and the remainder to St. Mary's College. About $1,500 was due him from several churches in his diocese. This amount he gave to his successor.

River and Harbor Improvements.

WASHINGTON, October 26.—Official documents which are now being prepared for printing, contain the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, certain the following information concerning the progress already made and work contemplated during the present fiscal year on California rivers and harbors:

Regarding the Sacramento River, it is officially reported that one thousand dollars per year will keep the portion from Knight's Landing to Walsh's Landing, or Chico, in very good condition, as few or no snags are concerned. No operations were performed on the Feather River, and it is recommended at present not to undertake any work looking to the improvement of their navigation during the present low water season, as no remora such snags as endanger navigation.

The engineer in charge of the improvement on the San Joaquin River proposes to survey those portions below Stockton where navigation is impeded, and if necessary contract in the usual manner for the removal of obsole by dredging.

Operations on Oakland harbor are reported to have been mainly directed to the attainment of a convenient depth in the channel between the jetties. It having been opened for the width of 100 feet, and the second end of the jetty having been nearly completed, only a few hundred feet remaining to be secured.

The channel at Wilmington harbor has been steadily improving, both in width and depth. There is now a depth of eleven feet at mean low water, where at one time less than two when the original operations were commenced. The increase of depth during the year has been one foot. The engineer in charge reports that the accumulation of sand on the outer end of the work has not been so rapid as was expected by its designation. Some dwarfing operations have to be carried on from time to time, with a view to hasten the growth of the dwarf. Eighteen hundred feet of the proposed, and with moderate success; but the subject has hardly received a fair trial, nor have any positive rules for the application of brush to this purpose been developed. It is believed that a good deal can be done in this way to hasten the desired result, but more time and some money must be available to prove the correctness of the assertion.—Call.

Among the articles deposited in the foundation stone of the new University buildings on Mission street, are told, were a pair of "sea worn by her Majesty!" Thrice happy people of Nottingham to have enobrined amongst them such a precious relic; but why Nottingham, of all other towns in her Majesty's dominions, should be thus especially honored does not appear. No doubt, however, other municipalities will hum by petition for the other stocking that was worn by her Majesty," and it is even probable that other articles of "dress" gracious sovereign's attire may be required to complete the collection. Should no such request be forthcoming from Nottingham, we think Leicester, Northampton, or Leeds, might be induced to step in and supply the deficiency. Or, if the Mayor of Nottingham is not disposed to part with the stocking, he might be induced to lend it for exhibition purposes, and we are sure that the Lord Mayor of Leeds would be willing to lend the pair of boots worn by the Queen at the Jubilee.—Nottingham Journal.

The timber lands in the mountainous districts have been visited in a number of instances for the purpose of securing fuel and timber, and a number of arrests have been made for trespass by Government officials. THE REAPING OF MULLOUGH.

Towards the end of August, '77, a singular harvest home took place at Mullough, or O'Mooney's farm. The proprietor was hiding in the old meabs of Kilmurry enterprard, but the people, crashed and disheartened as they were, did not forget him even then. They came in myriads, bands of a silvart reapers and groups of beautiful country girls, to pip the bend, and lead the golden sheaves, so that lo, gratitude, at least, might not be urged against them as a crime. With these there also came troops of red-coated sojers and long lines of infantry, and as the golden grain was laid low in the sultry harvest day, gleaming steel from back and sword and bayonet twinkled beneath a cloudless sky. Of this scene John Savage seems to have borne vivid remembrance, for he afterwards wrote the following song, which is still popular among the peasantry of two baronies:

If nature gave to human life a contented length of years,
And with it gave the strength of mind the which age rarely bears,
We'd bless the glorious harvest day and storeleus time for the same,
For 'tis a noble 'midst memories' tears of sorrowed Forty-eight.

From far and wide the reapers came, through love or some same hope,
From Comeragh's wilds to Inlevenagan, from Grange to Gaity moor—
Like warriors rushing to the sea, the wracked men to a rock,
They hurried down and gathered at the reaping of Mullough!

God bless the sturdy reapers! God bless the kind the dare,
The thoughts that made their sleeves aid to help the peasant's heart!
The mind that lives in noble deeds, on earth made vassalers meed,
And soon like yours are freedom's hope, ye reapers of Mullough!

Then hent the reapers joyfully, their hooks with fervor pires;
And maidens of the sunny South bind up the fairest purses,
So may the tract is of our soil still fall before your wreaths,
And Irish wives and children aid to bind them in their pain.

Bright the sights of freedom were my mind as bound our woods and seas,
And thousands met less noble souls around their gal land's chief,
Eager waiting for the word to take each stock a rose,
To plant the flag of freedom at the reaping of Mullough!

WHAT MR. MAGUIRE SAW IN THE KITCHEN.

BY SOLINUS.

Mrs. Maguire, wife of Denny Maguire, of the Kilebane Arms, had retired to rest. The bell was tolling eleven when she took a last look at the room and quenched the candle. It was Saturday night, and Denis, according to immemorial custom, had remained in the parlor to contribute his wit and jocularity to the conversation of a few friends who had been escorted by a christening, and slipped into the Arms to spend an hour until midnight. The courtesy of her husband was but ill-approved by Mrs. Maguire, who entertained a vague suspicion that the house was haunted by the fairies, or cacodemons of fairies, who formerly emptied the tubs on which the christening was based. Her fears, it is only just to admit, had some foundation. Night after night, when every one was in bed, and all, but the watch-dog, was quiet and shrood, supernatural noises proceeded from the kitchen. Now there came a sharp clatter, as if jugs, and plates, and delft teapots had come to grief in a simultaneous collision; and anon a jingling which foreboded destruction to every wineglass, tumbler and decanter on the dresser. Denis had repeatedly listened with eyes asked and ears open to these supernatural manifestations, but, however alarmed as he felt, he always contrived to allay his wife's apprehensions by such exclamations as—"Musha, the divvle's in that cat, or," or,"Whi! them mice never be stej?" Consoled by the practical philosophy of such words, Mrs. Maguire would draw a long sigh, exacerate, to her blandest tone, that "there never were sich a man as Denis, with the good people," and so commit herself to the bosom of sleep.

The church clock struck three, and Mrs. Maguire awoke. "Mush she married," as the old ballad has it, that Denis should have prolonged his carousals to so unnecessible an hour. Her astonishment was increased when, on listening attentively, all the silence tingled in her ears, she could not catch the sound of a single voice or the jingle of a solitary glass from the room in which she had left the revelers. To arise, to light a candle, and descend the stairs in search of Denis, was but the work of a few moments. On reaching the ground floor, what was her surprise to find that individual, with his back propped up against the kitchen door, his head cushion on his chest, and a broken pipe contered in fragments by his side, seated last asleep on the ground!

"Denis," she exclaimed, "Denis, get up ir ye're any shames left, ye Samin' drunkard;" and with those words she seized him by the collar, and gave him one of those shakings wun which a mastiff sometimes honors a spaniel.

Denis lazily opened his eyes, and rapidly reclosed them. "I cannot," he mutered, "I cannot, though it goes hard again me, asked ye."

"Murdha, alanna, do ye hear; the unfortibiate man that has so more business table's a-droop than an consolation! Consider, yerra! come, come, ye'll get yer death o' could, sittin' here you foolish creature."

Denis received a duplicate of the first shrug, and again muttered his spell. "Didn't I tell ye," he exclaimed, with no small show of bitterness—"didn't I tell ye that I consisted? And what more does you want. An! all gone! but, you deserver," he continued, addressing his wife, who was suddenly startled by his altered manner. "Be off wid ye, quick mee—do; here yer choice, as' more luck to ye. Arrah, what come across you, that ye didn't fat in the North Pole, an!"

"Oh, then, what is he dhramin' o!

'For the love of God don't say I'm here, or there'll be reactions till Michaelmas.'

'Any, now be sky, till we hears what he sez for himself. Be quiet, silence, and who knows but it's all for the best.'

So saying, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy threw herself into a posture of affected instinction, and was scarcely humming a sailking song, when Dunle Maguire entered the house looking pale and haggard.

'God bless all here,' he said, with a slight quiver in his voice.

'And you too, Dinis. How's all at home wid yez?'

'Purty middlin', begor; we can't complain, ma'am.'

'Want yez sit down and rest yourself, Dinis!' said the lady, driving the cat from a bay-bottomed chair, and handing it to the visitor. 'Is herself fine and strongly?'

Denis groaned. Connexion' her, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I'm afeard I've put my foi in it.'

'Fat, egra, that's a quare thing.'

'Mortial quare, ma'am, intirely. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I'm the unmost, ungratefullest baste in crayation.'

'Is the man dhramin' wid his eyes open?' asked the good woman, suspending the operation of washing a butter tub, and looking at the speaker.

'Faith, they're open wide enough now, ma'am. If you saw them this mornin' airly, 'tisn't that ye'd say, I be bail.'

'Oobwabs, after the night, yes mane?'

'Dust, ma'am—lasity dust that tuk away my dyes nexose to the other world, and put me beyant myself, and made me strike Biddy Doran out of doors—made a pote—a rete, five pots o' me intirely, ma'am.'

'The dickens take it, sure yes wasn't as bad as all that, Dinis! Pute, heagh. Sorra wan o' me knows of your pots or houses, and pots has both, God bless 'em!'

'And I don't deserve 'em, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, for I'm a baste, and no mistake, to into and be that kind hearted orathur on the cowld world, without a bit of breakfast or a tester in her pocket, av a morain' airly!' and so affected was the speaker by the pathos of his own discourse, that he buried his face between his hands and wept snditsly. Mrs. Maguire, who was a breathless listener to all that passed, in the next room, instinct her example with the best and readiest facility for which the female sex does are celebrated; but she took care to drown her sobs in the folds of her cloak, lest her grief should betray her.

'Tut, tut, man, sems don't be killin' yerself that way,' insisted Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, in a voice o the kindest sympathy. 'The thrust comply on the face is the earth will have their turns and there's no help for it. Dinis, I'm compissibly bothered to make out the relate that seme over yez, all of a hape, to meithrest poor Biddy. Was she throubleseome?'

'Throubleseome! An angel playin' on a harp o' goold isn't her aiqual for civility that's in her, ma'am. Oh, that dhrame that dhrame!'

'What dhrame?' asked Mrs. O'Shaughnessy.

'Musha, sit down, and you'll hear the

Mrs. O'Shaughnessy followed the direction, and, after many intreductory "hems" and "hahs," and some slight preliminary snuffing of his drivelets, Denis began:

'Arrah, woman alive, to hear Shitter Jem's wife talk you'd do you good to shervoodles. He cocked his head, he cocked his eye, he cocked his nose in a good way and ha, 'barring he's a lord or a duke—begor, bardie' he's an earl for all that. And if his lordship's an earl, Mrs. Jem's a countess, and lookin' down on Pimlico, 'nex to the contheary, let alone the keep on his jacket and I'll steer by her him.'

'Pimlico, bardie' is the discourse, talk a place? Gorb sure! and what the devil does your honor know about it, Shiver, are yes just (sabthose, the sonexist' church over), are yes bist to the ould lady a-reading in ag' document? Yer pinsons is,' sez he, 'to go down on yer knee-bones, and—like—but stuff it somthere-ist' strong—yer four ugly bones, and all the min and women in the reib walk over yer agin nexose.'

'Up jumps Biddy, as live as a lark, my dear, and sez she, 'I'll throuble's about me, pet an and to it, for I'm promised to Lord Pimlico here, an' I wouldn't change my place for the best peer in Gran'brittain,' and sayin' this, she turned up her mouth and kissed the pimple on the lord's nose, begor, may I never see another Sunday, but she did.

'Well, sez, sez Shiver, squosin' his dale for the diversion. 'If I'm to be throubled like a baste, I'll be a baste,' and with that he up with his dale and knocked down the lordseen. There was the nape of a pithin to pitch on the head of him, the figgins' heaven glorest, but faith, my bowld Shiver fished them right and left, min, winin and chilthen, and the lord was, and still is, down, some up wid a decanter and laid him as fat as a porpus' on inside, and all at once I looked around for biddy, and, shure enough, there she was, sittin' on the berrel, breakin' her heart intirely, via the dickens' tattled down a pot of goat's milk. Haven't yes a ring yerself, my lady?'

'Begor, thin, I have,' sez she, 'an here it's for him, if I was gould instinse ever.'

'She was whipped off the ring, sure'se, and she flayed sez, 'What'll Dan think o' this whin it kumes to his earsi' sez he?

'Why you should your jaw, and don't be bothorin' me about the spalpeen. I've somethin' else to concern me.'

'Well, the milk was boiled, and no sooner did the lordseen swallow it, than he got up and scrutinized about the room as grand as a paycock.

'Does yer love me, Biddy?' sez he.

'I does on you,' sez Biddy, 'shure,' sez she, 'a nater pin'nle was never seen than that poor lordship's nose.'

'What'll Maguire give for such a lump of grandeur?' sez the lordseen.

'The two eyes out of his head,' sez Biddy.

'When will we be married Biddy?' sez he.

'Faith, as soon as he convayonced,' sez she.

'Where'll we be married, jewel?' sez he.

'Why, thin, where but at the North Pole,' sez she.

'We must have Denis's consint, Biddy,' sez the old scoundrel. 'Will it be easy to get him?'

'There he's behind the doors,' sez she.

'Hurrah, hurrah,' sez the lordseen, wheeling his stick around his head. 'Min,' sez he, 'drag in that quadruped, and ask him if he considers it any manyin' Biddy?' and, sure enough, before I could lift a leg they had me off my pins and planted in the middle of the flure.'

'Biddy,' sez I, 'the Lord forgive yes.'

'Musha, bould your ugly mouth,' sez she, 'and don't be cockin' like a gandher.'

'Does yer consint?' sez the lordseen, with a scrame like a wild ocraze; 'does yer consint to separate from your wife, and give her to thim that can support her discently?'

'No, sez I.

'I'll pull the hair owe by one, min,' sez the lordseen,' we'll teach him manners before he's much older.'

'So the pickeens kem around me, and they pulled away until I thought the skin on the top of my head, rosette, all the hairs wid pain, and saw I had only three hairs remainin'. Begor I was frightened outsuck of me brain' a wig, and saw all the hair was gone intirely. I thought best to keep the seed of a new crop, so sez I, 'I consint,' and instily were the words out of my mouth when I sits up and sees Biddy shlote me. 'Get out o' the house this minit,' sez she, 'and wid that I flewed out in the middle o' the pavement, for I couldn't come to. I had been dhramin' Arrah, don't that her cryin' away in the room there?' said Denis, suspending his narration and laughing.

'The herself, then, poor woman,' said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy; 'here go in and make friends wid her.'

Denis went, and returned in a few minutes, leading his wife by the hand.

'Twas all a dhrame, ma'am,' she forcinated to say, an' I'm goin' to take the pledge to-morrow.'

'As' when you do,' said she wife laughing, 'I'll run off wid the lordseen.'

'Are yez at it again?' said Denis, catching and kissing her, 'the dickens take him for a lordseen, anyhow.'

IRISH RAPPAREES AND ROBBERS.

Among the Rapparees was one bald in high esteem by the youth of the peasantry, and a representation of his deeds formed a part of their plays and sports. The person who represented him was called Sir Dan Levelle, or Sir Dan Leveller, and is thus described in the house of Mr. Robbles, a respectable gentleman, in the county of Kilkenny, where his father was a servant. He showed us early Wigs not ag' at the same time many amusing and of 'good report," and no efforts of his kind parson could turn him from low dissipation. He had a precocious and incorrigible fondness for cock-fighting, bull ing and gambling. His friends at length were compelled to abandon him to his own irregular courses, and he became a highwayman. He collected round him all the idle and worthless fellows of the neighborhood, whom he formed into a gang of robbers, and over whom he exercised absolute control, an object of alarm and terror to the whole country. In his predatory excursions his manner of their proceedings was very summary. When a horse was set to be robbed, he proceeded to forge in the vicinity, and having chosen a fit animal for his need, whom he seems forth without the aid of his stick, and was able to blow himself, and put on his cap, as a test of improvement, with the hitherto paralyzed arm. Having thus equipped himself, he then carries for her comfort a bottle of eau de cologne, and his bottle slipped from her hand the other day as she knell near the confessional stalling her tale in envy. The padre with, who has many penitents of another class and other habits, hearing the crash and thinking the odor, started up with the stage whisper, "You awful old woman, you're at again!"

— The Madras famine has left thousands of children orphans. Most of these will probably come under State care until they grow up, and it was at first taken for granted that they would be educated as Christians; but it has been strongly urged at a public meeting that this would not be right, as the ground then no interference is justifiable with the religion of a child so derived from its deceased parents.

— In 1865 the Austrians were fearn to beat the Prussians; in 1870, the French were confidently expected, by three-fourths of Europe, to beat the Germans; and when the war commenced the only question was of the number of weeks it would require for the Russians to march to Constantinople. Still further, in 1870 it was the European Regenie who gave the final shoves to push the reluctant Emperor into the abyss of war. Now we have seen the vacillating and hy-nonconformist Czar dragged into conflict by the enthusiastic wife and son.

— The discovery in Cracow Cathedral of the remains of the Polish King Stephen Bathory, who died in 1586, has caused a great sensation in Austrian Poland, and there were general demands for an imposing funeral, as in the case of Casmir the first in 1869; but the Galician magnates, being opposed to any demonstration, had the remains reinterred with an early Mass.

— The oldest Church in the Christian world is said to be at Orleansville, in the diocese of Algiers. It was erected A. D. 328, soon after the convention of Constantine, as has been recently ascertained from an inscription on the pavement of the Church.

— Many times Archbishop Hayley gracefully recounted his experience in an ocean voyage, in the early days of his life, which nearly resulted in shipwreck. A number of passengers retired to a narrow escape from death while we were riding in a carriage in the neighborhood of the Van Courtlandt estate. The horses took fright and he was thrown almost breathless on the ground senseless. He seldom took a drive after that accident, and then only with a skilled driver.

— A Methodist organ, Zion's Herald, had an article recently, in which it admitted that Methodist churches had rapidly disappeared in Boston, and that numerous Catholic churches replaced them. The fact is that there is scarcely a city in the country which can show a larger list of Catholic religious edifices than Boston.

— Thomas Fraser Duff, a noted architect, died at Chantilly, France, recently, aged forty-six, from a fall on the deep emotion, caused by the heroism of his youngest boy, who saved a child from drowning at a great risk. Mr. Duff was one of the few descendants of Fyfe MacDuff, the hero of the battle of Sheriffmuir in Scotland, gained by King Kenneth II. over the Picts in the ninth century. The Earl of Fyfe represents the family.

— Captain Benson, at one time master of Lord Byron's yacht, published a book in which the following passage occurs: "Percy Shelley, who heretofore made no secret of his infidelity, and whose spirits by the lowness of his diet and exercise were much weaker, but from long practice he now just how to go after them. A good ride, firm hands and steady eyes, and we soon see the end of the fellow over. The old lady may take a little longer to the road, and we are sure to kill her, and then it is no trouble to pick up and secure the colt. We try to get these little fellows when they are about three or four weeks old; they are then like young puppies, easily managed, and soon learn to know their keepers. Leopards, tigers and all that kind of animals we get in the same way and as about the same age. Baby elephants are hard to get, and the trouble and danger is great. The old ones are known to know (as for true) what we are after their young, and their rage is something terrible. The trumpeting of the parents can be heard for a long distance, and quickly alarms the whole herd.

"The rifle is comparatively useless, and trying to approach them is generally hazardous—yet it has to be done. First, we must find out the whereabouts of the female by her offspring. Then a native creeps up from behind and, with one out of a bag of tricks, quickly secures the tendons of her hind feet. She is then effectually cast as well, and soon falls to the ground. We promptly kill her, secure the ivory, and separate the flute one. Of course, we occasionally have a native or two killed in the kind of a hunt; but they don't cost much—about $5 or $6 apiece. The elephants are paid in advance, and don't care a straw about the poor devils some back, and so we don't bother about them much. Baby lions, we like to get when they are about one year old. Younger ones are too tender, and older ones are too much for us. We have acquainted with all the camp, and we have all the fun we want with them. They are kindly, docile, and as full of capers as the little nigger babies that play with them."

— Bull all Saints, engraverable and lasty brutus," the hunter continued, "the hippopotamus with young is the very worst, and whenever we start off to get a baby of that kind we calculate to come back with one or more men missing. But I must say that the baby hippos are very docile, and in five minutes will crush to death the strongest beast we can use. They are quick as a flash too, and the hunter must have to be wide awake to keep out of their way. On shore they are the best exercise, and the way they can harry their stumpy little legs over the ground would astonish you. They do their work, and take a heap of killing. When such a job is over, you may be sure there is great rejoicing among us; but, as one little hippopotamus is worth as much as half a dozen lions, tigers, and such trash, we are well content to take the risk. We cannot get these babies too young to suit us. One, I remember, though I was not in that, was popped on the very day it was born, and the hunters and attendants brought it up on the bottle. It is the same animal that Barnum advertised so extensively as the 'Baby Hippopotamus,' and it is now traveling with his show. Ostriches we run down on horseback, and then on to them with the lasso. It is an exciting chase, but not particularly dangerous. On these hants we are confined to only the young animals we capture.—N. Y. Times.

The Grant-Sumner Controversy.

BOSTON, October 19.—Wendell Phillips, in a lecture on Charles Sumner, strongly denounced General Grant's statement that Senator Sumner was negligent of his business as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and lied about the San Domingo treaty. Mr. Phillips intimated that President Grant was in no state to understand anything when Mr. Sumner called to inform him that he would not support the treaty. In regard to Mr. Motley's recall, Mr. Phillips said the records in the State Department in black and white proved that the Administration stooped to a falsehood; that Mr. Fish exhorted Mr. Sumner to take the British missions, and told him he ought to go to London; that six months later the Minister was recalled on the ground that he had issued too much on the opinion of a great Northern Senator; that Mr. Sumner's indignant exclamation to Mr. Fish was: "If Mr. Motley's leaving was an unpardonable sin, by what right did you sit in my study six months ago and urge me to go to England, and press my views on the Alabama claims? Sir, you are a tool of the President for base purposes, and this remark is out of spite."

Ex-Secretary Fish, who is a delegate to the Episcopal Convention here, was questioned to-day by a Transcript reporter with respect to the above. With regard to the alleged negligence of Mr. Sumner while Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Fish said it was a last unexplicable of proof from the Senate records that drafts of treaties, from eight to eleven in number, remained in the hands of the Committee for several months—some of them, as near as Mr. Fish could remember, for more than two years. Mr. Fish did not impute this delay of public business to negligence on the part of Mr. Sumner. The latter, however, remarked that business was delayed, together with another fact, that after Mr. Sumner's refusal the entire batch of treaties was dispatched of in less than four months.

Regarding the San Domingo Treaty, Mr. Fish denied that the President placed the treaty in Mr. Sumner's hands, as he never had it in his possession. It is said that Mr. Sumner favored the treaty until he found that Mr. Fish, Mr. Ashley of Ohio, and Mr. Commissioner to San Domingo; then he placed himself in opposition. Mr. Fish also denied that the Monroe to England was urged upon Mr. Sumner, as claimed by Wendell Phillips, and denied the existence of any estrangement between him and Sumner relative to Mr. Motley's removal, wherein Mr. Sumner responded saying, "Sir, you are not the tool of the President for base purposes, and this removal is out of spite."

The statement that President Grant placed the San Domingo treaty into Mr. Sumner's hands, as related by Mr. Phillips, Mr. Fish characterizes as ridiculously absurd. The President never had the treaty in papers in his possession, but they were in the hands of the Secretary of State. The President in conversation with Mr. Sumner, laid before that gentleman the features of the treaty. This information was imparted orally. No one of printed document was read to the Senator. Mr. Sumner was also opposite to any of the features, indeed, so warmly did he express his approval of it that a gentleman present at the interview, who prior to that time had placed himself in opposition to the measure, was induced by it solely by arguments used by Mr. Sumner.

Mr. Fish says Mr. Sumner continued to favor the treaty until subsequent to the Commissioner to San Domingo came up for settlement, and when he found that J. M. Ashley of Ohio was not to be a member, he then placed himself in direct opposition to it. The conversation between President Grant and Mr. Sumner took place toward the last of December, 1869, or the first of January following, and in February, 1870, Mr. Sumner of Nevada, gentlemen of opposite political views, consulted with Mr. Fish and found that the treaty could not pass and both agreed that it was dead. Mr. Sumner was not removed from the Foreign Committee as the reasonability of Congress in the fall, but upon the meeting of Congress in 1871, he was not reappointed. He learned of the fact from the newspapers. He was not at that time on speaking terms with either the President or Secretary of State.

AN IRISH PEASANT TO HIS WIFE.

The harvest is over, my corn is sold,
Oich hero, scushla machree,
But I'm little the better, if truth must be told,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
For though mine was the toil, yet the landlord's the spoil!
Oich hone, scushla machree.

Sure he says that the soil
Belongs not to me,
And God, through my sweat within, made the world for him.
Oich hone, scushla machree.

Though in labor succeeding my days are all spent,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
A lost root to pay I did always consent,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
Though in sunshine and sorrow I strive and I delve and I sow,
Yet to pay what I owe
I will ever agree!
But 'tis hard to resign what is rightfully mine,
Oich hone, scushla machree.

The fish in the brook, and the bird in the brake,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
Were made for his honor, without a mistake,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
While I toil all the day, with my pulse for my pay,
He dwells far away,
And only receives
And squanders to me what I labored to win,
Oich hone, scushla machree.

Sure I know very well that our law-makers still,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
Give him pow'r to plunder and pillage at will,
Oich hone, scushla machree.
Though my building is small, yet I can't see at all
Why it is not as safe as my landlord's hall,
And brave cutting he'd be for me;
If 'tis legality so 'tis not justice I know,
Oich hone, scushla machree.

From the law shop in London no succor we'll get,
Oich hone, scushla machree;
Still 'tis vain to complain, and 'tis idle to fret,
Oich hone, scushla machree,
But courage awhile, for soon o'er our isle
Will sweep a wild storm of vengeance,
And each hasty decree
Shall be lighted straightaway, and I fervently pray
May God speed the day, says

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

— It is reported that, although the Turkish Envoy has not yet left London, on account of exception from the Ameer of Cabul, the visit was not liked. Comments passing freely among the crowds assembled said that he was not a true Mussulman, because he ate with infidels and other fashion, and that he was a disguised British agent sent to Cabul to forward British interests. It is reported from Cabul that a third Russian Envoy is shortly expected to arrive there, the supposed object of this visit being to negotiate the mission of the Turkish Envoy. A State mansion has been prepared for his reception.

— A New Jersey man named Snowden is tremendous sent at pomp, steerage, and model of piety generally, has come to grief for beating his wife and assaulting a fellow-citizen. Snowden gave the woman seven weeks' start of him in the house of a neighbor, and then followed to recapture her. Arrived at the house, he found the door locked, and sent him home from Bordeaux to Glasgow, where he no doubt is praying for her and all the poor sufferers who "is" Lourdes. CHRISTOPHER CANTON, S. — It was observed that the British crew "spoked" their inside oars in rounding the buoy next in the water. On the homestretch the boats had the tide with them, and better time was made by both crews. The race seemed destined to end in a deadheat, so well did the boats seem to hold their positions. As they swept down from the stake-boat toward Hospital Point, the encouraging shouts of their friends rang in the ears of the crews and encouraged them to strain every nerve to reach the goal first. As the Opels neared Hospital Point, bald glasses and stop-watches were got out and time was taken. The Opels, pulling 42 strokes to the minute, passed the lighthouse at 6m. 55s. after 4. The Lockwannas passed the same point 2 minutes and 45 seconds later. Precisely the same time was observed off the Target, and the boats reached the end of the course in the same order, the Lockwannas winning the race by 15 seconds, amidst the warm plaudits of the crew of the ships and the crowds on shore. The Opels seemed somewhat the worse for wear. The Kockwannas, with a single exception looked fresher than their opponents. As the winning and losing crews passed the Royal Squadron on their way to the ships they were loudly cheered, shouts which the Lockwannas returned with which always characterises the British tar, leading off with loud hurrahs for the Lockwannas. On board the flagship Duncan after the winners were received with an ovation, the crew were almost treated by the officers, and has not been heard of since.

— A Roman Catholic lady well-known in London society, when she gave her confession at the Jesuits' church in Farm street, arrayed herself in sad and mortified garments, which, at the first glance, conceal her rank. Among her wards, by the way, she carries for bottle of eau de cologne, and his bottle slipped from her hand the other day as she knell near the confessional stalling her tale in envy. The padre with, who has many penitents of another class and other habits, hearing the crash and thinking the odor, started up with the stage whisper, "You awful old woman, you're at again!"

— The Madras famine has left thousands of children orphans. Most of these will probably come under State care until they grow up, and it was at first taken for granted that they would be educated as Christians; but it has been strongly urged at a public meeting that this would not be right, as the ground then no interference is justifiable with the religion of a child so derived from its deceased parents.

— In 1865 the Austrians were fearn to beat the Prussians; in 1870, the French were confidently expected, by three-fourths of Europe, to beat the Germans; and when the war commenced the only question was of the number of weeks it would require for the Russians to march to Constantinople. Still further, in 1870 it was the European Regenie who gave the final shoves to push the reluctant Emperor into the abyss of war. Now we have seen the vacillating and hy-nonconformist Czar dragged into conflict by the enthusiastic wife and son.

— The discovery in Cracow Cathedral of the remains of the Polish King Stephen Bathory, who died in 1586, has caused a great sensation in Austrian Poland, and there were general demands for an imposing funeral, as in the case of Casmir the first in 1869; but the Galician magnates, being opposed to any demonstration, had the remains reinterred with an early Mass.

— The oldest Church in the Christian world is said to be at Orleansville, in the diocese of Algiers. It was erected A. D. 328, soon after the convention of Constantine, as has been recently ascertained from an inscription on the pavement of the Church.

— Many times Archbishop Hayley gracefully recounted his experience in an ocean voyage, in the early days of his life, which nearly resulted in shipwreck. A number of passengers retired to a narrow escape from death while we were riding in a carriage in the neighborhood of the Van Courtlandt estate. The horses took fright and he was thrown almost breathless on the ground senseless. He seldom took a drive after that accident, and then only with a skilled driver.

— A Methodist organ, Zion's Herald, had an article recently, in which it admitted that Methodist churches had rapidly disappeared in Boston, and that numerous Catholic churches replaced them. The fact is that there is scarcely a city in the country which can show a larger list of Catholic religious edifices than Boston.

— Thomas Fraser Duff, a noted architect, died at Chantilly, France, recently, aged forty-six, from a fall on the deep emotion, caused by the heroism of his youngest boy, who saved a child from drowning at a great risk. Mr. Duff was one of the few descendants of Fyfe MacDuff, the hero of the battle of Sheriffmuir in Scotland, gained by King Kenneth II. over the Picts in the ninth century. The Earl of Fyfe represents the family.

— Captain Benson, at one time master of Lord Byron's yacht, published a book in which the following passage occurs: "Percy Shelley, who heretofore made no secret of his infidelity, and whose spirits by the lowness of his diet and exercise were much weaker, but from long practice he now just how to go after them. SATURDAY.....NOVEMBER 3, 1877.

SUBSCRIBERS will please especially look at the printed label on the margin or cover of the paper; the date thereon will show when the subscription expires. They should also know that their talking the paper from the postoffice renders them liable for the subscription price so long as they continue to do so. Persons have no excuse to make the paper lumber up at the office, as they can order it discontinued at any time. Subscribers who intend to remove, and wish the paper sent to their new address, should not only send the change of address to the postmaster, but should also notify the publishers of that fact, and so have the paper stopped. We make this explanation for the information of those who make the excuse, when called upon for payment, that they paid for it as long as ordered, but still continue to take it from the office.

We have appointed Mr. John P. Croke special agent and canvasser for THE MONITOR, and he will visit in the interest of the paper the towns and localities within the State. He bears with him a very flattering recommendation from his Grace Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, whose good wishes are certain, should he need sufficient, to insure Mr. Croke a splendid success among the Catholics of California and the Pacific Coast, and, in fact, wherever he may travel on behalf of THE MONITOR.

Notice to Our Subscribers.

It is not by any means agreeable to us to have to appeal to our subscribers with respect to money matters; but we find it must be done occasionally, nevertheless. Mr. J. P. Croke, our traveling agent, is energetically at work during the spring, and a number of pieces, whence remittances have ceased, that it is utterly impossible for him to visit just now. Those who are delinquent will take a glance at their address on the paper will tell them whether they are so not—are hereby earnestly requested to forward the amounts due to our office at their very earliest convenience. As we have already said more than once, the amounts thus owing to us are not large, but the aggregate reaches a very high figure. We intend doing the best we can to make THE MONITOR a first-class newspaper in every respect, but we certainly cannot succeed unless our friends and subscribers help us. The times, we know, are not as prosperous as we could wish them to be; but yet, at least some will of the many who stand indebted to us ought to be able, by a little exertion, to put themselves clear on our books. Bless we have never before made a similar appeal without receiving a quick and cheerful response, we trust the rule will hold good this time also. Let those to whom our words apply take them into consideration.

☞ We again direct the attention of our subscribers to the foregoing notice. It is shockingly necessary that those indebted to us should make some effort to pay up. The strain upon our resources is constant, and it must be met in some way. There is a very large amount owing to us, and one-half of it would remove all difficulties or causes of complaint.

RETURN OF REV. MOTHER ESP ITTE.

We have to notice—a very pleasing duty—the return from the East of Rev. Mother J. Baptiste, Superioress of the Convent of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart, Oakland; and now, in addition, Provincial Superioress of the Order for the Pacific Coast, appointed to this very responsible trust and dignity during her recent visit to Canada —a merited acknowledgment of her great worth and labors. The same gratifying task and pupils of this justly celebrated and endowed Academy of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart will be glad to learn that their dear Rev. Mother, in enlightened, pious and indefatigable fervor, returns to the field of her beneficent labors with restored health and refreshed zeal, to continue, with the efficient, refined and amiable Sisters of her Convent, their enlightened and pious mission. [This was received just after the paper had gone to press last week.]

Hon. Oberlin Gibbs, we understand, is candidate for the Speakership of the Assembly. We do not know say gentleman who has stronger claims on or who is better fitted for that position. He has already served one term as Speaker pro tem, and gave general satisfaction. He is thoroughly posted on parliamentary business, and his integrity has never been called in question even by his bitterest political adversaries. We are sure he would on all occasions act honorably and independently, and that in the matter of the appointment of committees he would strike more than one straight discretion. The interests of the whole community would be safe in the hands of and faithfully guarded by Hon. Oberlin Gibbs.

Rev. J. Mulry is now pastor of Gold Hill, Nevada, and has been for the last two months. Father Mulry is a true priest and an accomplished gentleman. The good people of Gold Hill will soon find this out and love him as he is loved everywhere he is known.

THE SACRAMENTO "RECORD-UNION" ON EDUCATION.

The Sacramento Record-Union is not displeased with the sermon on education recently delivered by Rev. Dr. PLATT in Grace Church. It notes as "a significant fact" that we reprinted the discourse, and endorsed it editorially. It seems to think that the reverend lecturer should take warning from this remarkable circumstance and change his course. The inference pointed out is, evidently, that when a Protestant clergyman says anything upon a great moral question, affecting the future destinies of the Republic, which a Catholic journal approves of, he must, of necessity, be wrong, and ought to reconsider his words. Another inference, derivable from the language of our contemporary, is that anything binding, or seeming to bind, or likely to bind, to the advantage of the Catholic Church is, somehow, mischievous and deserving of discouragement at the hands of American citizens.

Now, the Record Union is really the only paper on the Pacific Coast whose editorials can lay substantial claim to the distinction of exhibiting depth of thought or extent of scholarship, and we would wish to respect its utterances on that account. We are, therefore, sorry to find it putting forth innuendos so unfair, so suggestive and so deadly void of provocation. If every living soul within the wide boundaries of the United States were, to-day, Catholic, we maintain that the Republic would not be less great, nor less free, nor less liberal; and that a far higher standard of morality in public and private, in social life, in politics and business, would prevail. The multiplicity of sects, with their discordant and warring theologies, their divergent opinions of right and wrong, and their uncertain teaching of Christian duties, has, unhappily, demoralized the public mind, overthrown the ancient landmarks of reputable behavior, and brought about that sad state of affairs where to be "an active church member" is to lay one's self open to suspicion. We have yet to learn the name of a single man known as a dutiful and practical Catholic, who has ever done anything to injure or to dishonor this country, while we can name hundreds who defamed, fought and died for it. And our contemporary must really excuse us, for we only give way to natural feeling, if we get indignant at, and treat as gross slanders, the language which would imply that we, Catholics, have not as much enthusiasm for republican institutions, as much love for liberty, as much attachment to our own individual rights, as much eagerness for progress, as men of any creed or class living to-day or known in history. We are simply tired of that kind of talk.

To return to the matter of education—the Record Union has strong objection that dogmatic theology should be introduced into the public schools. Does it mean by the term "dogmatic theology" the doctrines concerning the nature and history of all religious systems? If so, we think it would be very difficult—impossible, indeed—to find such educators. They would either belong to some Christian church, or they would be freethinkers. If the former, they would inculcate, as a matter of duty, those of their own particular creed, and so be incompetent to teach; if the latter, they would surely deal with Christian beliefs on matters of pure speculation, and unacquirable of demonstration. Does our contemporary expect for a moment that it will ever get the fathers and mothers of America to agree to such a system as that indicated? If it does, it is sadly mistaken. The spirit of negation will not be accepted as the basis of education in the freest and most progressive nation in the world.

We have attentively read the series of very clever articles recently printed by our contemporary, in which the divinity of Jesus Christ was attacked, and the existence of any Church or Body vesting by the authority of God was denied; but all they proved to us was that the editor of the Sacramento Record-Union was not a Christian—a thing of little importance to the individual himself. The arguments were used dexterously, but they were not original. They were drawn from the ancient yet most fallacious assumption that we cannot know anything for a certainty of a supernatural character, and that everything not susceptible of physical demonstration, must be held as non-existent. That is how we understood him; but perhaps we are mistaken. Our contemporary has manifestly studied the works of the modern German and English freethinkers, and has read the two sermons in order to refute them—a very praiseworthy act in its own. But he has never explained this in full. He has contented himself with, as he thinks, demolishing the evidences of Christianity without giving us the evidence for anything else.

We make no doubt that the Record Union would like to see some gentleman sharing his own ideas, elected to the post of schoolsuperintendent, to impart information concerning the nature and history of all religious creeds. It says that "the only result of excluding all reference to religion from our schools is to cultivate that stupid and demoralizing kind of skepticism which springs from absolute ignorance of the history of religion. There can be no doubt that this form of infidelity is vicious or degrading, or that it is fostered by the present system."

These strange sentences appear in the issue of Saturday last; the previous quotations are in Wednesday's paper. We ask what more would Mr. PLATT himself say than is contained in the lines we have italicised. If the present system of education fosters vice and degradation, it certainly ought to be changed. If the change is made, should it be done in the interest of infidelity, once of the non-stupid kind, as advocated by the Record-Union, or in the interests of Christianity as demanded by Rev. Mr. PLATT? Let the American people answer. We have not much fear of the verdict.

WICKED WORDS FROM DEMAGOGUES.

It cannot be necessary for us to expend many words in saying that this journal is in deep and intimate sympathy with the working classes of our city. There is no complaint that they can make to which we are not ready to give respectful consideration; there is no grievance affecting them which we are not anxious to see remedied; there is no proper step they take to better their condition which has not our warm approval and our unwavering support. Our opinion has always been that the prosperity of the Republic is indissolubly connected with the comfort and contentment of the industrial classes. Everything that tends in the slightest to depress or degrade the workingman, that lowers his position in the social scale, or deprives him of a fair remuneration for his toil, will always be sternly discountenanced and opposed by us. In brief, we claim to be the steady friend of the workingman.

Therefore it is that we are all the more ready to raise our voice against the conduct of a few men, claiming to be workingmen, and assuming to speak on behalf of their fellows, who give great offence by language that ought to be discovned and reprobated by every well-intentioned citizen. The meetings of alleged workingmen which have taken place in this city during the last three or four weeks, apparently under the management and control of Mr. D. KEARNEY, Mr. J. J. DAY and others of the same stamp, have been signalised by the use of language which might have emanated from the sansculottes of Paris, or the descamisados of Barcelona, or the real democrats of Berlin, but which should never be heard from residents of San Francisco. Threats of riot, pillage, arson and even murder have been indulged in without the slightest restraint, and as if they implied not the smallest risk or responsibility.

Of course there is great latitude of speech allowed in this country, perhaps too much, and the law may not be invoked against the mere utterer of incendiary harangues. Words are only air, and burn slowly. But the moment any attempt is made to put these threats into execution, the moment any man's life or property is endangered, the moment the civic peace is disturbed, the authorities will set promptly and vigorously, and they will be sustained by all citizens of good repute without distinction of class and station. This is a free government, of, and for, and by the people. No question can arise, no difficulty spring up, which cannot be settled in a lawful and peaceable manner. A little patience may be necessary, for important matters affecting a large community cannot be settled in a day; but the legitimate remedy for all grievances exists and can be applied in due time. One thing is absolutely certain, organized violence and lawlessness will not be permitted to decide anything in this country, or the State of California, in which we live, will promptly and

A WOMAN'S ANSWER.

Do you know you have asked for the costliest thing
Ever made by the hand above—
A woman's heart and a woman's life,
And a woman's wonderful love?
Do you know you have asked for this priceless thing
As a child might ask for a toy,
Demanding what others have died to win,
With the reckless dash of a boy?

You have written my lesson of duty out—
Man likes you keep questioned sir;
Now stand at the bar of my woman's soul
Until I question you.
You require your motion shall always be hot,
Your necks and your shirts be white;
I require your heart to be as true as God's stars,
And as pure as heaven your soul.

You require a cook for your mutton and beef—
I require a match greater thing;
A seamless yarn for working for socks and shirts—
I seek for a man and a king—
A king for this beautiful realm called Home,
And a man that his Maker, (his),
Shall look upon as He did on the first,
And say of it is very good.

I am fair and young, but the rose will fade
From my soft young cheek one day;
Will you love me then, 'mid the fallen leaves,
As you did 'mid the blossoms of May?
Is your heart as ocean, so strong and deep,
I may launch my all on its tide?
A loving woman finds heaven or hell
The day she becomes a bride.

I require all things that are grand and wise—
All that I am should be;
If you give this all, I would make my life
To be yet grander and truer.
If you cannot be this, a knave or a fool
You may hie—and thank no one!
But a woman's heart and a woman's life;
Are not to be won that way.

Miraculous Manifestations.

See where she stands! a mortal shape endued
With love, and life, and light, and deity;
The motion which may change, but cannot die,
An image which nor power knows how to slay.

"I know that you still claim miraculous manifestations for your Church," said a friend, while discussing the question of revealed religion; "that that in other nonsense. The age of miracles and power, and exists only in the wild brains of fanatical monks, or is the result of the morbid, acute dreamings of some of those women who live much to themselves in convents, and spend their lives in imaginary converses with the Lord. Young women must find some outlet to their love of sentiment and romance, and if the natural course is debarred them, a species of religious frenzy is the result."

My friend herein only expressed the common belief among Protestants; a belief which is the cold result of casting away the precious gems of an interior life, when, in the mystic recess of the chosen cell, the voice of God can be heard, as He is wont to speak to his beloved alone. And yet what an inconsistency this lay as if the arm of God could ever lose its might, or His power be circumscribed. Every age finds its parallel, and history repeats itself forever. Why, then, should not circumstances arise in the new order, as well as in the old, wherein God should see time and occasion for some startling manifestation of His power, whereby some purpose, some excell, known to himself alone, may be attained? To open the pages of the Old Testament, and read with awe, blended with faith, the marvelous works therein related. All deconstructives give their acquiescing assent thereto; but tell them, in these days, of a miraculous interposition of the operation of some hopeless lavelld, through the power of prayer alone, no matter how incontestable the evidence may be, yet all is at once resolved to the maple form of popish superstition. And yet a little calm, dispassionate investigation will prove that the superstition which still believes the ancient promises to be the foreshadowing of what (though in a limited degree) should down with the Christian era.

THE OPERATIONS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

That we have since been required to witness and believe, bear scarcely a comparison with the comparatively few wonders which are crowded into the forty years of life while traveling through the wilderness, "when the majesty of the law abided with the people in a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night." (Exod. ii: 32) When, as perpetuated in the beautiful canticle of Moses: "The ruinment with which the wart covered, bath not changed by age, and thy feet are not worn in the the forty years." (Deut. 8 v.) For so there become now no rod of Aaron, "whose buds swelling, it blossomed blossoms, which, spreading its leaves, were formed into almonds." (Numb. 17: 8) What would the scoffing skeptic of the nineteenth century say, should one of our old battlefields present the miracle of the plain of dry bones, or witness any other of the marvelous miracles that were of daily occurrence in the life of the prophet Elisha? But if who are conversant with the history of these days, know how forcibly and vividly these God voices rang through out those primitive ages of creation. As then, so now does it ring, deep, clear and resonant for those who, like Hall and Samuel, are ready to say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." All of life is a miracle; and there are silent and secret signs given, at times, to some chosen ones, who, like Mary, keep them locked in their own hearts. Even for little children her advent at times been lifted, and the mysteries lying beyond been revealed. Bearing stooping upon this affirmation, and corroborating it, I will here relate an incident for

THE BENEFIT OF THE INCREDULOUS AND SCOFFING,

Which occurred in the life of a child, when about six years old, and who now, though a grandmother, has never relaxed the circumstance but once before this, always feeling, when inclined to do so, that it was like exposing to desecration some hallowed, sacred shrine. When traveling, many years ago, from Canada to the southern part of the State of New York (a long journey in those days), owing to the extreme illness of the father of the family, they were detained to a wayside town. The gentlemen's illness becoming alarming, a priest was sent for, and early next morning he came to administer the Viaticum. Now, the little girl in question had never received any instruction, upon any point whatever, connected with this great mystery; not the slightest idea of its material form or spiritualized subsistence, were known to her. At the hour appointed, she was told by her mother, that if she would be quite, keep quiet, and kneel down while the priest was there, she might remain in her father's room. Watching with intense earnestness every motion of the priest, worshiping with childish curiosity what she was which he was taking out of the gold "watch" she saw, as he raised the host, the words of the solemn Ecce Agnus Dei—what? a plate, opaque white wafer! Not but there appeared in this little ignorant child's vision, as plain as the priest's hand that held it, an extended transparent ball, clear white and red, which reminded her, then, of a carnelian breastpin sometimes worn by her mother, and to which her little mind at once compared it. Such was the impression then; but as each after year deepened, strengthened and moulded this "solid not image" in her life, the manifestation assumed its true character—that of flesh and blood; appearing just as the hand does when held up before a strong fire or light, the crimson blood," to give assurance to the doubting dead ceased. It was to common. The event that the marble angel was placed over the cents of St. Angelo in Rome, where it still stands. Subsequently, other, also, bear testimony to the many favors and miracles, which were the result of the devotion performed before this picture. The Madonna del Sasso, on the shores of Our Lady of Good Counsel, Genazzano, like the house of Loreto, was also borne through golden clouds, and upheld by the hands of angels to its destination (1467), and testified its miraculous origin by the marble ourselves and other miracles, that have been confirmed by the testimony, under oath, of contemporary eye-witnesses. For those who are inclined to scoff at such credulity, we would remind them of the miraculous transmigration by the angel of Habacuc to Daniel in the lions' den (Dan. 14:35); that of St. Peter's release from prison; Elias to Mount Horeb, and other similar marvels in both the Old and New Testaments. Those who have read the interior life of Père Lacordaire will have no trouble to recall the interesting account this illustrious orator gives of the novitiate made by his little band of earnest followers in the old convent of La Quercia (of the Oak). It was through his faith in the simple, sincere and responsive prayers, for which this ancient shrine had so long been noted, that induced him to prefer all the discomforts of its crumbling walls to the more comfortable, and bung upon a large oak tree, in 1417, on the campo Gazzano, the picture of the Virgin, by pious pilgrims, in gratitude for favors received, in the way of votive offerings to churches and religious houses, soon sprang up around this shrine, and it became the resort of the pious from the highest dignitaries to the lowliest peasant. Pope Leo the Tenth, with his usual and profound discernment, chose this Madonna as the patroness of his convent, and sanctified it by her presence.

THE FUTURE SUCCESS OF A MISSION

Which labored under so many material and spiritual difficulties, is best illustrated by "That piece of life," he would say to the skeptical, "was obtained all our prosperity. His had the original faithfully copied by one of the band, who was an artist, and taken to their new convent on their return. There, passful, hospitable, jest-judging, venerable, who law and rule among the clergy, with the elements, the picture is said to preserve until its early freshness. It, together with the trunk of the tree whereon it was originally attached, stands over the high altar of the church in Viterbo, and is still suspiciously visited by the faithful in the nineteenth century as it was in the fifteenth. [CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Professor Tyndall on the Soul and Religious Beliefs.

We will not follow, nor will our space permit us to follow, Professor Tyndall through the process by which, in his lecture delivered at Birmingham, he conducted his audience to the conclusion of the non-existence of free will. It must suffice to point out that even critics who have the least sympathy with a dogmatic treatment of the subject have found that when he ventured on the part of his discourse he forsook the methods of exact science for the rhetorical accessory of a theory. We might also observe that his argument against the sufficiency of the "hypothesis" of soul to explain obscure phenomena cuts two ways. If science cannot trace back mechanical motions to a psychical agent, neither can it explain "states of consciousness" by "molecular motion." "What is the causal connection," he asks, "between the objective and the subjective—between molecular motions and states of consciousness?" My answer is, "I know not, nor have I as yet met anybody who knows. It is no explanation to say that the objective and subjective efforts are two sides of one and the same phenomenon. Why should the two sides not have two sides? This is the very core of the difficulty. There are plenty of molecular motions which do not exhibit this two-sidedness. Does water think or feel when it runs into frost forms upon a window-pane? If not, why should the molecular motion of the brain be yoked to this mysterious companion — consciousness? Frankly stated, we have here to deal with facts almost as difficult to be seized mentally as the idea of a soul." It is perhaps also worth remarking that the crucial instance selected by Professor Tyndall to prove that statements hitherto accepted as revealed truths must be taken to represent aspirations rather than actual facts break down as far as Catholics are concerned. If the song of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" is to be taken as the description of "a visible host and an audible song," then "that promise," says Professor Tyndall, "was preserved for the inconclusive experience of eighteen centuries." But the MSS. from which the Catholic Vulgate has been translated furnish no such promise of universal peace. The Church sings with the angels "in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis." Peace with God and with each other is to be the portion of men of good will. And as the writer of a letter to the Times points out, the Protestant Dean Alford adopts the Catholic reading, though he gives a slightly different turn to the translation. "The only admissible rendering is 'among men of God's good pleasure'—i. e., among the elect people of God."—London Tablet.

BISHOP MORAN'S REPLY TO FROUDE.

Irish Civilization — What Mieg Brian did for Art and Science.

The renowned Bishop Moran of Ossory, to a second appeal to his clergy and people in behalf the College of Kilkenny, says: "Froude, with his usual boldness, asserts that in the twelfth century Ireland had become a "semi barbarous state, and that we are indebted to the Norman invaders for the introduction of the arts and sciences, as well as the revival of religion. This train of thought is entirely unfounded in fact. It is not a difficult matter, indeed, to prove that our fathers at that eventful period were far advanced in civilization, and were even the barbarous people. Some of the noblest architectural monuments that adorn our country date precisely from that period; such, for instance, is the Cormac's Chapel, in Cashel, the Cathedral of Lismore, the churches of Kilmalkedar, Roscrea and Monaincha. To that period also belongs the beautifully-sculptured cross of Tuam, which, with all our modern progress, remains still unrivaled at the present day. The many works of our Irish artists of the same period, in silver and gold; which have been preserved to us, are, there were the admiration of the most distinguished antiquarians of Europe; and what is remarkable, it was only a little time before the Anglo-Norman invasion that the school of Clonmacnoise attained its highest perfection, and it is precisely from that invasion that we must date its rapid decay. . . . If in such a state of society the barbarism of Ireland was reduced to (after the twelfth century), to what was it raised, it would have died like a flower of the desert, unnoticed and unknown; for it was not the warriors rude and bloody band that could preserve and cherish it, nor her yet ruder mind that could appreciate its excellence and beauty; and seed should be wafted to some more genial clime, to germinate and to be nurtured into vigor.

"I have already mentioned the name of the victorious monarch, Brian, and I will now merely ask what British sovereign was ever so much as mentioned the name of Brian which is not associated with the most splendid and munificent acts of patronage to the arts and sciences? Under his auspices, and those of his successors, the Irish Annals were compiled, the Psalter of Cashel, the Book of Armagh, the Book of Leinster, and many others were written.

Produce Market Report.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 1, 1877.

The closing report of December has been of an exciting character in all departments in of trade. Flour and grain seem to have been on the decline, and the latter has suffered very materially from the effects of the drought. Barley, Corn and Oats seem to have been in demand, but the receipts have been quite moderate, with no transactions of moment. Tobacco seems in strong demand for export. The fruit and vegetable market has been completely bare, and the week was ushered in by a glorious rain storm of about forty minutes duration, with a very moderate degree of wind. This all may be but the forerunner of a heavy rain to November, which will be a great benefit to agriculture.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

A GRANDFATHER'S STORY.

About sixty years years ago I was in Paris for the first time in my life. Bonaparte still lingered at St. Helena, and the adventurers, good, bad and indifferent in character, who had served in his armies had not yet lost all hope of the return of their idol, and consequently had not yet thought it worth while to settle down to thorough peace and quietness.

Young Paul Ferrand, whom I frequently met at the cafe, and who had served as a cadet at Waterloo, was sure that the Little Corporal would come back again soon. "You have not yet beaten him," he would tell me laughing. "You sent him to Elba, but he returned; you have sent him to St. Helena, and he will return again. We shall see."

Ferrand was an exceedingly nice fellow; and although he professed to cherish an unquenchable hatred for England and everything English, he had, by some means or other, become attached to Alice Rae, a young English lady of my acquaintance, and who had been living with her mother since the cessation of peace at Paris, not far from the abode of the ex-cuirassier. And he was always very friendly with me too. He would, it is true, chaff me by construing most unmercifully, but he was always pacific, laughing merrily, and never losing his temper and himself saying a little too much, he would arrest himself and apologize so heartily that I never could be angry with him. I was alone in the French capital, and had few friends there except Mrs. Rae, her daughter Alice, and Paul; and so it happened that I passed a great deal of my time in the society of these three. The mother, a woman still in the prime of life, and the widow of a King's messenger, was a connection of mine by marriage, and that fact gave me a good excuse for offering my services as escort whenever she and her pretty daughter thought fit to go to the theater or the opera. At such times Paul had a seat in the stalls, and between the acts he would come up to my box, to the delight of Alice, who was in love with him, and to the no small satisfaction of Mrs. Rae, who herself had quite a maternal affection for the young Frenchman, and did not in the least discourage his attentions to her daughter. If there was no formal engagement between the two, it was at least perfectly understood by all parties that as soon as Paul obtained got an appointment, for which at the time he was a candidate, he was to marry Alice, and I, though only a few years her senior, was to give her away.

One night the opera was crowded more than usual. A great singer was to appear, and a new work by a renowned composer was to be performed. But Paul Ferrand, sitting in the stalls, seemed scarcely to listen to the music or to notice the setting; and much more often were his eyes turned in the direction of my box than in that of the stage. Alice and her mother were with me; and as the curtain fell at the conclusion of the first act, Paul came to me. He was in high spirits, for he had heard that the minister had decided to give him the coveted post, and he expected to hear in a few days that his appointment had been signed by the King. We congratulated him; and as he left us to return to his seat, I whispered to him: "You'll be a happy man in a month or two now, Paul." He smiled, and shot the door.

We watched him as he threaded his way to his place. It was in the centre of the second row from the orchestra, and he had left his opera glasses on the chair in order to preserve his right to it; but during his absence a tall, military looking man had appropriated it and was busily using the glasses on one side. Paul approached the stranger with the utmost politeness, and I suppose—for naturally I could not hear—requested him to leave. The interloper did not deign to answer, but contemptuously looked up at Ferrand, as though to ask him what he meant by his intrusion. Paul pointed to the opera-glasses; but the stranger neither replied nor moved, but continued to appear as though he did not hear. I saw that matters were assuming a dangerous complexion, for to the new comer I recognized Victor Lacrojaen, an ex-Bonapartist officer like Paul, a notorious bully, and one of the most celebrated duellists in France. But what could I do? I could only sit still, watch against my will, and witness the inevitable consequences. I thought Alice would faint when Lacrojaen in the calmest way rose before the crowded assemblage and struck Paul in the face with his glove; but she recovered herself, and like a statue watched her lover pick up his opera glasses, bow to his insulter and without a word leave the building. There was some sensation in the pit and in the boxes; but the curtain again rose, and with a theatrical air grand round, mocking imitated Paul's parting bow, and resumed his seat. This was too much for poor Alice. She could not remain any longer; she must go home, and so, with some difficulty, I got her and her mother to my carriage, told the coachman to drive those home, and myself called a cab to Paul's lodgings. He had arrived before me, and was already writing when I entered his room.

"Of course," he said, as he saw me and came toward me with both hands outstretched, upon, my dear friend, will assist me. It is impossible to do anything but fight. Even Alice could not make me alter my conviction upon that point, the insult was so public."

"Suppose you leave the country?" I suggested.

"Then I should have to give up the appointment and Alice too. No, my dear fellow, I am a Frenchman, and I must fight; and you must arrange matters for me. If he shoots me, it cannot be helped; if I shoot him, I shall shoot the biggest scoundrel in Paris. I beg you to call upon Lacrojaen to-night. I have already discovered his address. Here it is."

"But must you really fight? It is absurd to fight with a professional duellist."

"Ah!" he said, shaking his head. "I am afraid it is cuticle, but I must fight; so please don't try and persuade me that I need not. And I will fight, too, as soon as possible. You can arrange everything for to-morrow morning. I must have the matter over. In a day or two I might be a coward."

By his look he implored me to go to Lacrojaen; and constituted as French society was at that time, I had no other course open to me than to do as he wished.

"If Monsieur sends from M. Paul Ferrand," said a man-servant when I inquired whether I could see his master, "M. Lacrojaen has sent to say that he has not yet left the opera. He has, however, sent this pencilled note, which I am to give to the gentleman who comes from M. Ferrand."

I tore open the missive. It contained two cards, one bearing the name of the duellist, and the second that of M. Fernand Delarsie, Rue Vivienne 18. Certainly it was an offhand way of acquainting me with the name and whereabouts of Lacrojaen's second; but as I wished to pick no quarrel, I walked on to the Rue Vivienne, and in a few minutes was ushered into the presence of M. Delarsie himself. This worthy was a young man, aged about three and twenty, and dressed in the very extreme of fashion. His ruffles were immaculate, and most symmetrically arranged, his lace handkerchief was steeped in essence; his gloves, which lay on the table, were the newest; his hat returned, at Lacrojaen's request from the opera—were small and delicate; his fingers were covered with valuable rings, and the hands of gold seals depended from his fob. He was unusually heavy and brilliant. He did not strike me as opposing particularly warlike; but nevertheless, after formally existing me, he at once touched upon the subject of my visit, and before I had been one minutes in his company, had arranged to meet Ferrand and myself at a certain spot, near to Auteuil at the time, at an early hour next morning, and to bring Lacrojaen with him.

"I don't think we shall need a surgeon," he said to me quite affably at parting; "but, if you please, you can bring one. In the affair my principal shot his man through the temples, and he died immediately. I sincerely hope, Monsieur, that your friend is a sharper."

"Confound the fellow!" I said to myself as I left the house and sought the residence of my own medical man. "I am afraid poor Ferrand is not such a consummate swordsman as Lacrojaen."

After seeing the surgeon, to whom I briefly explained matters, I called upon Mrs. Rae. She was doing her best to comfort her daughter, and I found her in the greatest possible distress. "Are they going to fight?" she asked me.

"My dear Alice," I said, "they are. I have done my best to dissuade Paul; but he says, and I am obliged to agree, that he must fight. Let us hope for the best. He has right on his side. Didier must be a coward dog. And you must remember that poor Paul is not an Englishman. If I were he, I would not fight; but as it is, the matter cannot be considered, and indeed every thing is arranged."

"You are to be with him?" said Mrs. Rae, looking as white as a sheet.

"Yes; they are to meet me to-morrow morning, and by breakfast-time Alice's suspense will be over. She must bear up."

"You must prevent the duel," sobbed the half heart-broken girl. "Cannot Paul let the insult pass? Bah no; it was so public."

"You can only hope," I said. "I will see you in the morning; but now I must go back to him, and see that he gets some sleep."

"Tell him," cried Alice, "that if he is killed I shall die. Come here directly when it is over. Good-night! He is fallen; you must tell me about it. I must hear every thing." She buried her face in her hands; and I, escaping from the unhappy girl, hurried to Paul.

He was still writing, and his hair was in disorder, and his face pale when he turned toward me. "I am so sweard," he said, "but I am saying good-by to my dear, dear Alice to-morrow."

"My dear fellow," I exclaimed, "you will shoot Lacrojaen and be married next month. You must finish your writing at once and go to bed. I will sleep here till to-morrow morning; so be as quick as possible."

He wrote for another half hour, addressed the document to Alice Rae, placed a look of her white hair in it, and after sealing it up gave it to me.

"Give that to her," he said, "if Lacrojaen kills me outright—and I know he will. If it were not for Alice I should not care; I should be glad to meet him. Now for bed."

He undressed; while I lay down on the sofa in the next room and lit a cigar, for I could not afford to sleep myself. Soon all was quiet, and I rose in to see Paul lying as quiet as a child, with a smile on his face. Probably, my assembly, I passed a most uncomfortable night than he did. Only with the greatest possible difficulty could I keep awake; and the hours seemed to linger forever. At last, however, daylight dawned, and I called Ferrand, who woke refreshed and in apparently good spirits. After a hurried breakfast we muffled ourselves up, placed a flask of brandy, some powder and bullets, and a brace of pistols in my pockets, and we called forth in the cold morning air; scarcely any one was abroad, except a few sleepy watchmen, who seemed to make very shrewd guesses at the object of our expedition; and through the silent streets we went for a mile or so until we reached the meeting place.

Lacrojaen and Delarsie were there before us, and my friend the surgeon arrived immediately afterward in his carriage, which waited near at hand. The pistols were produced and loaded. Lacrojaen chose one, and I gave the other to Paul; and then the two men took up positions at a distance of twenty paces from each other, and waited for Delarie to give the signal to fire.

"Stop!" cried the bully, as his second stepped back, "let the young hound listen to this. I am not trifling with him; I shall shoot him only where he wishes, for I am generous, perhaps!"

"If I do not kill you," said Paul quietly, "I prefer to die."

"Then I shoot him through the heart," coolly observed Lacrojaen. "It will teach others not to challenge me."

There was something to me unspeakably horrible in the way in which these last words were pronounced. I shuddered and looked at Paul. He smiled at me, and at the same time Delarie gave the signal.

There was but one report, for Ferrand's pistol flashed in the pan. The poor fellow turned round toward me with a dead eye and pale face, and with the name of Alice on his lips, fell dead. Lacrojaen turned on his heel, and departed quickly in company with Delarsie, while I shut the unfortunate youth's eyes, and kissed his cold forehead. Surely enough, the bullet had passed through his heart. He must have died almost instantaneously, for he did not move after he fell, and the last smile with which he had looked at me was still upon his face. It was a melancholy business in every respect. I had to break the news to Alice and her mother, and the task was so terribly overcome that I feared the shock would have some permanent effect upon their health. For my part, I was obliged to leave Paris as soon as possible, and Lacrojaen, I heard, went away and remained out of France till the affair had blown over.

I kept up a correspondence with Mrs. Rae, and was glad after a time to hear from her that Alice, though still terribly upset, had learned to look with a certain amount of philosophy upon her misfortune, and had to some extent recovered her usual health, if not her usual spirits. Meantime I settled down in London, and, unable to forget my Parisian habits, usually dined at one of the then much frequented taverns in Fleet street. The Cheshire Cheese, which was then in much the same state that it is now, was my favorite haunt; and there, six months passed by, I picked up a few pleasant acquaintances, among whom was an extremely well-mannered young gentleman named Barton, a son of independent means, good family and a first-rate education.

One day, after he had been dining with me, the conversation turned upon Continental manners and particularly upon duelling. Asa thing of my abhorrence of the system, I told my companion about poor Paul's death, a matter in which Barton appeared much interested. He asked me a good many questions about the parties concerned, and after expressing a considerable sympathy for the latter of Lacrojaen was a bloody villain, and a good-night. I went home to my rooms in the Temple, and the next day, on visiting the Chancellor's Court, found on Barton. He had left word with one of the waiters that urgent business had called him away, but he hoped to see me on his return. Weeks passed, and then months, and still Barton did not come back. I was sorry that I had begun to forget him altogether when one evening he dropped in to dinner as though he had only been absent for a day or two.

"Where have you been?" I asked, after I had heartily shaken hands with him.

"I've been to Paris," he said. "On arriving there I found quite a little more than you told me about Lacrojaen, for in fact I had thoroughly convinced myself that he was the bullying, cowardly scoundrel. I arranged for a series of lessons at a pistol gallery. Every day for a month I went and shot for an hour or two, and I became so perfect as to be able to hit a small coin every time at a distance of twenty paces. After that I called upon Lacrojaen, and left my card for him. He sent a friend to me, and we met upon the same spot, curiously enough, where he had killed your friend Ferrand. It will teach other bullies not to challenge me."

Whether he was or was not justified in the assumption of aiming or not, I cannot say; but, my dear fellow, I shot him as dead as a dog, right through the heart, and avenged poor Ferrand, at the same time ridding Paris of its biggest villain. I was a case of diamond cut diamond.

"Well done, Barton!" I exclaimed.

"Well," he said, "and let me finish the drama. We managed to keep the matter very quiet; and before leaving Paris I was able to call on Mrs. Rae, who is now at Boulogne, for I had a letter of introduction from a Parisian acquaintance. She, as I saw her first she knew nothing of the affair, but as I broke the intelligence to her and her daughter. I found Alice to be a pretty girl, somewhat spoiled by her long mourning, and not very much inclined to listen to me; but, my dear fellow, after a couple of long persuasive days we gave in, and now she and her mother are coming over next week. I believe you were to give Alice away. When she arrives you shall have a capital opportunity."

"And," I added, shaking my friend's hand warmly, "I shall be delighted to do so."

The British Bible Society reports an astonishing demand for the Bible among the Comanche. Over 60,000 have been distributed within the last few weeks. The excellent linen paper makes the best of gun wadding. As an illustration of my abhorrence of the system, I told my companion about poor Paul's death, a matter in which Barton appeared much interested. He asked me a good many questions about the parties concerned, and after expressing a considerable sympathy for the latter of Lacrojaen was a bloody villain, and a good-night. NEWS FROM THE SOUTHERN SEAS.

LARKINS, S. I., November 1, 1877.

EDITOR MONITOR: Having left Honolulu on the 5th of last April, I could not refrain my indirectly-made promise of giving you more items about it, but will give a few responding isle place. Lahaina is delightfully, though loosely, located on an open beach at the western end of the island of Maui, and covers an area of about two miles by one and a-half miles long by one broad. It is well sheltered at its eastern side by a range of mountains that rises proudly, roughly and boldly—as all mountains that have any self-respect do—to the clouds, drawing from them, and from the shine of the Pacific, which they arrest, the nutriment necessary for the scant vegetation that obtains on their summits, a short way down their sides. The mountains are about 5,000 feet high, and present a grand, imposing aspect, though made of wood—a characteristic of the mountains in these islands. Lahaina was, before the advent of the whites—an unfortunate one for the natives—a great resort of chiefs of this and the neighboring islands. Its embrageous and sylvan features (it is the best wooded spot on these islands), the delicious beauty of its nights, its immunity from cold winds and rains, the greatest shelter afforded by the dense growth of fruit and shade trees, and the profuse and abundant supply of cocoanuts, bread-fruit, papias and other tropical fruits, guavas, bananas and other tropical fruits, made it as Arcadia to the natives, who, in their primitive state, fully enjoyed its charms, and the one, and only one of them can claim so much of the land as his own. But they are a thoughtless and unprincipled race, and do not realize their many blessings for to-morrow it to day is provided for.

The first white settlers here seemed to have a good idea of "magnificent distances;" they build their houses far apart, as if desirous of isolation; and if it were a regular, lazy laid out town, two furlongs in length by one in breadth would suffice for its site, and give ample room for all the houses it contains. Now, in fact, their inclination makes its dreariness more depressing.

Lahaina was for a number of years much visited by whalers from the Arctic and other oceans, and it came as many as a hundred whaling ships used to lie at anchor in the roadstead—it has an harbor—indeed to some here by the abundance of best-calculative fruits, and the difficulty of procuring fresh provisions at sea. It was a busy, lively, prosperous place, all persons there making money easily; but a spirit of overcurious greediness took hold of the few storekeepers, and their excessive desire to make fortunes rapidly, and their unreasonable and, by their barefaced overcharging, caused the whalers to keep away; so that for the six months that I am here but one whaler came into these waters. Notwithstanding this lessons, some of the old traders are still endeavoring to make money in the same way. I was charged 6¾ cents for three small cakes of supposed-to-be writing paper, the manufacturer of which was so good that the moisture, it, it is to be hoped, did not endure the sheet as if it were filtering paper.

Some years ago it numbered 5,000 inhabitants; now, 1,000 could with difficulty be mustered. Dead dark decay sits like a death pall over it; and when the old order of life, business and animation are prevailed, silence and solitude obtain, with scarcely to disturb their reign save the falling of the cocoanuts, disturbing leaves, and the ever-recurring moan of the surges as they sweep over the breakers, beat the shore, and seem to sing a sad though earnest requiem for departed prosperity. Such is Lahaina; and such is the melancholy fate that befalls persons and places that, not content with reasonable pay for every honest commodities, seek to amass wealth by questionable means.

THE TRAINING SHIP JAMESTOWN

Sailed here about the 5th of last September, and, a few days after, I went aboard and found the boys in splendid condition, with an air of happiness and contentment pervading all. Their morale seemed superior to that of the boys of the previous trip though probably not so active nor expert, being new to the business. The ship was in a state of perfect order, and was considered look as bright and clean as a newly-minted dollar.

The training-ship department is an admirable one, and I hope our next Legislature will make an appropriation worthy the cause, and the wonderful liberality and munificence of a California Legislature, for it will be only advancing the public wealth and subserving the interest of our beautiful State. And in order to properly appreciate its benefits, a person should be on board the vessel some time, as I've been, where the ability of the system, the ability of her officers, the prompt and ready obedience of the boys, are sure guarantees of the success and usefulness of its movement.

All evidence of bloggery know the reply of Nunez, the Roman Augurer, who, on being asked, "Way not build wide around the infant city to defend it?" replied: "To honor, virtue and penitence of her citizens, for her best bulwarks." Yes, a reply come home to every land; and I feel that the most exacting financial moralist would concede to me that the reclaiming of even only fifty boys from hoodlumism, and making them good citizens and responsible members of society, would be cheap at an appropriation of $50,000. Less would paralyze it, and I hope an niggard appropriation will predispose such an injury as the movement.

Our hold-over Senators, Messrs. Sargent, Dorsey, Nunes, Rogers, McCarthy, Pierson, Craig and Howe, will, because of their recognized desire to advance the public weal, give the efficient aid of their practical knowledge, their great experience and their most strenuous efforts in securing a proper appropriation. And I hope our newly-elected Senators and Assemblymen—whomsoever they may be—will make a good record for themselves in the matter.

It is almost superfluous to say that to no better hands could the disposition of an appropriation be confided than those of Captain Glass; for, while ranking in himself all the traits of a true American gentleman, and exercising the utmost care, prudence and economy in all outlays for the vessel, he never withholds from the boys any necessary requisite conducive to their comfort, health and happiness; and he is ably seconded by his officers, Messrs. Burnett, Putnam, Towsley, Dale, Holmes, etc.

T. D. MURPHY.

THE LAST DAYS OF NAPOLEON.

FROM THE FRENCH OF NORVINS.

The year 1821 opened under alarming and fatal auspices. Napoleon grew weaker almost every moment; and yet it mattered not! With one foot already in the grave, he still contemplated the state of Europe, and dwelt incessantly upon her future, and the hopes he had entertained for her prosperity and greatness. He spoke of Italy as if he had cherished some grand and just designs for her greater political advancement, and bitterly regretted that he had been prevented from establishing an examinery and independent form of government in the Peninsula, with his son as supreme ruler.

In the month of February a comet appeared, visible at St. Helena, and Napoleon, on hearing of this occurrence, recalled to mind a similar event among the memorable days of his life. "Once more," said he, "I see my destiny traced with the torrents of fire. Such was the 17th of March, 1811. Count Montholon wrote to the Princess Borghese that this liver complaint, from which Napoleon was suffered for several years, and which he pencilled to, and proves fatal in St. Helena, has of late made fearful progress, and he cannot walk without assistance." The Count further added: "And this decline is certainly increased by sadness, and by privation at the sight of an unparalleled and determined opposition to an all-powerful and remorseless tyranny. Let any one only imagine the feelings of Ireland, were she to be thus forcibly deprived of her own soil, and given up to the tender mercies of Cromwell and his Puritan soldiers, and he will then form a correct idea of the state of mind in which Napoleon is now existing."

Almost everything around him obviously urged him to witness the phenomenon; but these astronomical researches were not to his faithful officers, to whom Napoleon, on this occasion, said: "You alone understand me," preserved silence on the subject. For some time he maintained the conviction that he would never escape the deleterious climate of St. Helena, and his prophetic words almost constantly avowed its baleful, while also pervaded the hearts of his servants. On the 17th of March, 1821, Count Montholon wrote to the Princess Borghese that "this liver complaint, from which Napoleon has suffered for several years, and which is pencilled to, and proves fatal in St. Helena, has of late made fearful progress, and he cannot walk without assistance." The Count further added: "And this decline is certainly increased by sadness, and by privation at the sight of an unparalleled and determined opposition to an all-powerful and remorseless tyranny. Let any one only imagine the feelings of Ireland, were she to be thus forcibly deprived of her own soil, and given up to the tender mercies of Cromwell and his Puritan soldiers, and he will then form a correct idea of the state of mind in which Napoleon is now existing."

Napoleon's last days were as memorable as many of his most glorious periods of his most remarkable career. Saddled of his rapidly approaching dissolution, he emitted those sublime and prophetic expressions to those who tried to dissuade him from this conviction. "Can you join this?" said he, pointing to the seed of the handful of corn that is in two and handing it to Mr. Montholon, "can you make it either, by science or by art, alive. "Ah, no; no remedy can cure me; I am now beyond all human aid. But my death will prove a blessing to France and to posterity. I would have liked to see my son. Perhaps he had grown up more worthy of God he deems!" Then, sweeping over the past and into worthy of Socrates, he added: "I die before the time; my terrible malady has been the constant companion of my pillow for months, and now it is about terminate. Assassins, like the other wretches, stab me! "The monsters! Are they not yet sufficiently satisfied with the tortures with which they have still cast me? Had they but sent me, I would have died a soldier's death."

The new dwelling intended for Napoleon at Longwood being unfinished, and not being expired of it, he said, "it will answer for my tomb." And indeed some of the material with which it was composed was afterwards used in the construction of the vault in which his remains were subsequently laid. At length a portion of the other rooms being supervised, and Napoleon fell into a lethargy which proves a prelude to his death. "Head of the army," which now sank on his cheek and pallid lips. These were the last words of the subjugator of Europe.

The Catholic Times says: "Senator Blaine was baptised a Catholic in his infancy by Rev. Michael Gallagher, if we are not mistaken. This venerable priest became an Augustinian in Philadelphia, and died a few years ago. Blaine was confirmed by the then Bishop of Philadelphia—Kenrick—in 1899. All his ancestors on his mother's side were Irish Catholics. His father was originally a Presbyterian, but became a Catholic some years before his death. He is the only one of the family that is not a Catholic. His wife is a Protestant; college, and there is where he lost his faith. His mother's name was Gillespie, and the Gillespies were one of the most remarkable families in Western Pennsylvania; remarkable for their old-fashioned Catholicity and force of character. This is what Catholics would call a renegade."

A Royal Funeral in Germany.

A Dresden correspondent of the London Times, describing the funeral of the Queen-Dowager of Saxony, says:

The royal funeral was solemnized in the Catholic court church, where the royal family of Saxony has its sepulchre. Several princes—among them the Imperial Prince of Germany—and other representatives of foreign courts arrived here for the occasion. At a quarter past six o'clock P. M. a brilliant though mournful party assembled in the church, which was hung with black and shut to the general public. The large passage which runs from one end to the other through the middle of the church was lined by a squadron of blue dragoons, a magnificent troop, of which every man is a giant. When the Majesty the King had made his entrance the Chœur "Miserere mei Domine" was sung. Before this words and died away the coffin, which had been brought into the church the day before, was filled with its pall of velvet, and borne in state by other servants through the church. First came trumpeters, who were followed by singers; after these marched the servants of the defunct, the medical attendants of the Court, the Lords of Corporation, a Privy Councillor and some chamberlains. Then came the Bishop, in his white mitre, a prayer-book in one hand, and a lighted taper in the other, surrounded by the clergy in white and black surplices. The coffin preceded by the Marshal of Queen Amelia's and King Albert's households, the pall, borne by twelve chamberlains, and the coffin, borne by twelve servants. Immediately behind walked his Majesty the King and his Royal Highness Prince George, sons of the defunct. Both carried, according to the custom of their country, drawn sabres; both were plunged in deep melancholy. The King and Prince George's suite was followed by the other princes. Among them the Royal Highness Friedrich Wilhelm, the Imperial Prince of Germany, principally attracted attention. The coffin and the princes were surrounded by a swarm of pages dressed in red velvet, and while silk, with long, waving, hanging torches. The procession made a striking though melancholy appearance. When it arrived at the altar the coffin was carried down into the vault, which was hung with black velvet, on which sparkled the royal crown. The princes alone witnessed the interment in the interior of the vault. It is understood that the Bishop knocked at the innermost door, whereupon a deep sepulchral voice answered, "Who troubles the quietness of the dead?" The Bishop replied in the affirmative, the usual answer was given, and the door was opened. The ceremony reminds us of the burial of dead Egyptian kings. The royal funeral service was performed with the singing of "Salve Regina." On Tuesday morning a Solemn Requiem Mass was celebrated, at which their Majesties, their royal highnesses, the Corps Diplomatique, and many others were present. On Tuesday evening the church was surrounded by silver chandeliers, and the Requiem Mass was performed on the occasion was by Cherubini's Requiem in C minor. The last rites from four to six o'clock, so that the winter is a season of the fashionable world of Saxony are ended.

THE WORLD'S DEBT.

WHY LETTERS GO MISSING.

Some idea of the extent of the immense business transacted through the General Post Office may be gathered from the quarterly statement of the New York branch, just published. The postal receipts and expenditures in that city are in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 per quarter. During the quarter just ended no money orders aggregating $4,000,000 passed through, and 195,000 registered letters and packages. Of these last, 32,000 were received from, and 20,000 were sent to foreign countries.

In handling such an enormous mass of matter as the foregoing figures imply, it might be supposed that many blunders would occur, and, indeed, such is the case. Blunders are few at the postoffice, yet the officials are daily troubled about delayed and missing letters, letters which should have contained enclosures, but didn't, and letters which haven't reached their destination at all. Nothing is more natural than that the simplest explanation of these should be conclusion that the post-office is to blame; but a glance at the figures in the quarterly report will at once let us into the secret of the difficulty. During the last quarter there were received at the New York office 1,115 registered letter packages, enclosing over $2,500, unsealed and unclosed; 47,500 letters sent to the Dead Letter Office for want of an address, or having no address at all; 10,000 letters held for postage; 25 letters improperly addressed; 116 letters were returned inscribed "not found;" 22,500 pamphlets and packages held for postage; and 2,000 letters unaddressed. If correspondents would carefully consider the foregoing figures for a little while, they would be more careful hereafter. No perfectly is everything systematized in the postoffice that blunders are of rare occurrance.

A NEW COLONY FOR VIRGINIA.—The directors of the Irish Catholic Colonization Society have just closed negotiations for securing a tract of land at Roseneville, Charlotte county, Va., consisting of about 1,000 acres, at $11 an acre, and on ten years' credit. There are on the tract a new mill, grist-mill, tannery, about forty small dwellings, and a large mansion, valued at several thousand dollars. The agent now negotiating for the sale of the latter to a religious institution, which proposes to use it for school purposes. The land is to be sold to colonists on ten years' time, at a slight advance, in lots of twenty five, fifty and one hundred acres. Colonists intending to settle thereon next Spring are now enrolling.—Leavenworth Torpinion. November 22.

HEINE'S OPINION OF THE ENGLISH.—Heine, the German poet, said: "Were again will I visit that delectable land (England) where all the men are like machines, and all the machines like men. The dog and the flea are the only free beings. When I was introduced to the Governor of Heligoland, and took leave of Englishmen stood motionless before me, without speaking a word for several minutes, involuntarily the idea came into my head to rock at him from behind to see if somebody had forgotten to wind him up. My heart stops within me when I think that after all Switzerland was an Englishman, and belongs in the most repulsive people that God in his anger ever created."

A POST-NUPTIAL ODE.

We used to walk together in the twilight,
His whispering tender words on sweet and low,
As down the green lanes where the dew was falling,
And thro' the woodlands where birds were calling,
We wandered in those hours so long ago.
But now no more we walk as lovers walk,
Adown the lanes—my love and I—oh, me!
The one is past for such romantic musings—
He holds the baby while I'm getting tea.

We used to sit—with lamp turned down—together,
And talk of love and fix divine effects,
When signs were long and misery the weather;
For nobler he than knight with knightly feather,
And I to him the incarnate of my sex.
Now, oh! when wintry winds howl round the gable,
I am seated in smoke, he pores o'er gold and stocks,
The fact ignored that past scenes the table
The lorelier of her sex our dancing socks.

Oh, when arrayed to suit my hero's fancy,
I tripped in most him as his welcome call,
He looked unutterable things—he dare n't say slowing
In food approval at my outward showing
His taste in lace, dresses, jewels—all!
Now if perchance we have the same income together,
When fireside invite or prima donna sings,
If where my robes should rest for the occasion)
And fixes the bills—and looks unutterable things.

O bygone days! when sweetness and sleight,
He called an angel as he pressed my hand!
Opposed their "darling" to his self-same fellow
By that same angel—grown a trifle yellow—
Calls me, "mother, dear," however, seared.
Mother! I understand—to come thing for nothing,
"Love after marriage is a beast soon myth,
At which who could have passed before the curtain
Turn up their noses—disenchanted wish!

The Count De La Poer on the Heroes of '98.

The Count de la Poer has written to the Tipperary Free Press as follows:

"I have seen by an advertisement in your paper that it is proposed to erect a monument to the memory of the patriot men who fell in '98—who so gallantly died, resisting an oppressive and cruel government. To some, ever unto this day, it will seem as almost treason to defend the conduct of those Irishmen who, in days now happily passed, resisted English soldiers, but it appears to me that those who condemn the actions of their forefathers in ignorance of the causes that induced them to appeal to arms as their only hope, it is, unfortunately, not the fashion, if one may so use the word, to study the history of Ireland—which is, in fact, the key to many of the wrongs, and the secret of the royal crown. The prince alone witnessed the interment in the interior of the vault. It is understood that the Bishop knocked at the innermost door, whereupon a deep sepulchral voice answered, "Who troubles the quietness of the dead?" The Bishop replied in the affirmative, the usual answer was given, and the door was opened. The ceremony reminds us of the burial of dead Egyptian kings. The royal funeral service was performed with the singing of "Salve Regina." On Tuesday morning a Solemn Requiem Mass was celebrated, at which their Majesties, their royal highnesses, the Corps Diplomatique, and many others were present. On Tuesday evening the church was surrounded by silver chandeliers, and the Requiem Mass was performed on the occasion was by Cherubini's Requiem in C minor. The last rites from four to six o'clock, so that the winter is a season of the fashionable world of Saxony are ended.

THE SCHOOL SYSTEM.

On the evening of October 30th Mr. William R. O'Donovan, lecturing before the "Liberal Club" of New York on the School Question. In the course of his remarks he quoted from the statistics of public education in this country, and complained in the terms of taxation for State purposes, and showed that while the bulk of the money expended on public education come out of the pockets of the wage of the working classes, the real beneficiary of the system secured to the wealthier portion of the community, who could well afford to pay for the education of their children, which they now get at the expense of the State. Mr. O'Donovan also showed that in communities where education was left to the natural results of competition, a higher average of intelligence was found to exist among the people at large than we have yet reached; and he pointed out that the tendency of free schools was to check individual enterprise, which, as the result of the system, has proved a total failure. At the conclusion of the lecture Mr. O'Donovan and the lecturer was fiercely attacked by some members of the "clubs," who accused him of ventilating "Catholic sectarian ideas;" but, inasmuch as they were not able to counter-argue him, they contemptuously pat forward by Mr. O'Donovan, their efforts only showed that they had mistaken their ground for a political meeting, and they lodged to a very "illiberal" and bigoted class of people.—New York Irish American.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean's Washington special of December 7 says: The story that the late prisoner is held in Stirling Bailly's camp has been proved to be merely a camp-fire story, but General Terry, in a letter to the War Department, gives it official sanction, stating that during his recent visit to Fort Wadsworth a half breed interpreter came to him and he had seen the pale face in Stirling Bailly's camp that his name was Martin Ryan, formerly Corporal in the Seventh Cavalry. He was captured in the action of Custer's battalion, June 25th, and several inefficient attempts to escape. The information had been forwarded by Stirling Bailly to Ryan and ordered away. The Indians keep him painted like an Indian and have married him to a squaw—a daughter of Spotted Eagle. His description Ryan corresponds exactly with that of Corporal Ryan of Company C, Seventh Cavalry, who was reported and supposed to have been killed in the Custer fight. Ryan had full confidence in their leader and the cause; and, if he wants further information, let him go seek it among Irish sheriffs, Irish police, Irish detectives, Irish secretary of State, requesting investigation and an application for Ryan's release. Accordingly Secretary Morris has written Sir Edward Thornton, at the British Legation, who in turn has communicated with the Governor-General of Canada, under whose supervision Sitting Bull now lives, and Major Walsh will be instructed to ascertain in some way if he is interested enough to ransom him. If true, to demand the release of Ryan.

Republican Fascesie in Italy.

The Democrats and Socialists are busy in Rome, and lose no opportunity of manifesting their power and progress. The great leaders among these Republican patriots died lately, and it was determined to make their funeral the opportunity of a Republican display. The departed heroes were Antonio Canocchi and Bernardino Fascioli. No priests or friars were part of the funeral train, but instead of the ministers of religion were bands of music and bodies of workmen, Freemasons and free thinkers. The funeral corteggio met in the Via della Valle, the residence of Canocchi and the headquarters of 11 men Freemasonry. On the bier was placed the traditional fasces surmounted by the cap of liberty, the emblem of the office held in 1848 by Canocchi, the office, namely, of deputy to the Assembly of the glorious Roman Republic." The funeral train had not proceeded far from the residence of the deceased, on its way to Campo Verano, before the authorities ordered the procession to halt, and commanded the removal of the "cap of liberty." The citizens refused to obey this order, and then a police agent, in plain clothes, ascended the funeral car, and took off the obnoxious cap, amid the murmurs of the mourners, who grieved at this outrage upon the conscience of Republicans. No disturbance, however, ensued. The corteggio then advanced and joined that of Fascioli, and passed on through the Corso and Piazza Colonna to the great ground of Campo Verano. Just before entering the burial ground, Parboni, the socialistic contractor, was seen in the funeral orations. He spoke of the virtues of the deceased, their Republican patriotism, their honorable poverty, and their glorious achievements. He then attacked the authorities for their conduct in the "time of liberty," said that no such insult had been offered under the Papal government, and warned them with the vengeance of the people, when the "cap of liberty" would be worn, not by the dead, but by the living. After the interment of the corpses, other Republican speeches were delivered.—Weekly Register, November 17.

GENERAL JAMES SHIELDS.

General Shields, the only living man who has represented two States in the Senate, spoke in Boston the past week, and displaying of rings he "begged of his countrymen to keep out of them for the sake of their race and the city in which they lived." He had a right to say this, for he was an Irishman himself, and he was a little proud of belonging to that old, gallant race. Yes, he was born on a mountain in county Tyrone, and was reared, "among the sheep and the goats," and he was left not only friendless, but almost friendless, but almost of any Irish boy ever came to this land that was lonesome and friendless he was that boy. Fortune and the favor of the American people elevated him afterwards to association with the first military men of his day, and with the first men in country or perhaps any other ever produced. Associated with General Scott, General Taylor, General Jackson, and other men of like with such statesmen as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun, Thomas Benton and Stephen A. Douglas. He what other country on the face of the earth could such a boy, who, when a child, came to this land, been elevated to such a position as that? He had lived to prove that a boy born in this country had trusted and honored could not only be a credit to the country, but a great country that adopted him and made him a citizen.

They should also know that their subscription to the paper from the postoffice renders them liable for the subscription price so long as they continue to do so. Persons have no reason to make for papers being sent after the time their subscription expires. If they wish their paper discontinued, by not taking it from the office the postmaster is bound to notify the publishers of that fact, and to have the paper stopped. We make this explanation for the information of those who receive papers which are ordered for parties, then they paid for it as long as ordered, but still continue to take it from the office.

Our agent, Mr. J. P. Croke, will canvass the city for subscribers to this journal during the winter months until he can resume his travels in the State. We trust he will be cordially received everywhere and be thoroughly successful in his mission. We ask the co-operation of all our kind friends.

CHRISTMAS

Next Tuesday will be Christmas Day, and, in accordance with long-established custom, we congratulate our readers and friends everywhere upon the happy recurrence of that great and holy Christian festival. We wish all of them a very merry Christmas, with peace prevailing over their households and plenty ever their board. May the memories which the day must call up in the mind of each one, be grateful and joyous, and the future look bright with golden prospects. May each one meet the care and heartfelt wishes for all our friends, and we are proud to say they are many. We think them warmly for the generous support they have given to our paper, and we know that if the time had been more prosperous, that support would have been even more liberal in a corresponding degree. We only trust that the coming year will be more fruitful still of good, and that when Christmas, 1878, comes round it shall be our pleasing duty to indulge in felicitations of a more thorough and unbounded nature than would harmonize with the state of affairs at present. Although it would be daily to pretend that our city and State are in prosperous as we should like them to be—for undoubtedly there is a great depression in all branches of business, and hundreds of deserving artizans and working-men are idle—still we feel no reasonable hesitancy that we here in California are anything like as badly off as the people in the Eastern States are. Really, it is only in comparison with the good old "flush times" in which Californians have been accustomed, when money was plentiful and labor could almost command its own price, that these days can be called dull or depressed. Individual cases of suffering and hardship, of course, there may be, and are; but anything resembling general or wide-spread distress does not exist, let the grumblers say what they will. And whatever amount does exist, be it much or little, is entirely of a fleeting and temporary character, which will disappear speedily if remedies are applied by those who have the power to use them. Meantime, every one who is blessed with plenty, and to whom Christmas comes as a time of joy and thanksgiving, should do what is within his means and ability to make others' hearts and firesides of his less fortunate neighbors. Christmas is essentially the ocean of charity, benevolence, and his divine Lord taught, in word and example, the birth of our common Redeemer. ☞ the time when all voices should sing with heart and accord, "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good will."

D. O. MILLS ON THE CHINESE.

Nothing more disagreeably surprises the intelligent and well-meaning citizen of California than the apparent utter inability of the Eastern press and the Eastern people to understand the Chinese question as it exists here. Despite remonstrances and explanations innumerable we find clever editors and distinguished politicians asserting that we are extremely unreasonable persons because we object to the Mongolians and want to send them back as their own country. Our deaths is attributed to the one fact that they work cheaper and are more submissive to employers than white men usually are. Evidently there is an idea in the East that workingmen here are paid exorbitant wages, and that a reduction would be advantageous to trade. How far this is from being the truth one, most unfortunately, be only understood by those who have resided for some time on the Pacific Coast, and are acquainted with the condition of our industrial classes. It is deplorable to see individuals, who should know something about the real state of affairs, led away by absurd prejudices, blinded to the public interest, and turning traitor to men of their own race and country.

We are impelled to make these reflections by a telegram from Washington which appeared in our daily papers of Tuesday last, detailing an interview which took place between Mr. D. O. MILLS and the President and Secretary of State on December 18th. The interview seemed to be of Mr. MILLS' seeking, and his only object was, apparently, to give expression to that gentleman's opinions on the Chinese question. He declared that the reports of Mongolian criminality and vice were unfounded or exaggerated; that the coolies were not an injury but a positive benefit to the Pacific Coast; and that the United States were bound to see that those heathens received all the protection due to them by the treaty regulations with China.

We have nothing whatever to urge against the last statement, because we, too, believe that our Government is bound to honorably fulfill the obligations towards subjects of all nations residing here and engaged in legitimate business. And it is, also, our conviction that the Chinese, unwelcome as they may be, should have proper protection for their lives and property, just the same as any other class of persons. We have always spoken out in condemnation of any violence or injustice towards them. But how Mr. MILLS can vastly his two previous assertions is more than we can imagine. They are in contradiction to all experience.

We do not know where Mr. D. O. MILLS got his ideas on this subject. Evidently he is of opinion that the workingmen should resemble the coolie, and be some kind of a slave or serf, toiling for starvation wages and living like a rat in a hole. We are not aware whether or not this distinguished friend of the Tartar was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, or whether he had always been very strong in virtue. Rather are we inclined to believe, however, that such erratic notions have come into his head since he got wealthy and became possessed of the aristocratic idea that other people came into the world to serve him and do his bidding. At any rate, his ideas upon the Mongolian question are directly at variance with those of at least ninety out of every hundred people in California. Mr. MILLS, of course, is free to hold whatever opinion he pleases upon every imaginable subject, and if he finds any pleasure in opposing himself to the general sentiment of his fellow-citizens, he is at liberty to do so. But, then, he must expect to be criticised, and that pretty sharply, by those who differ from him. We cannot afford to let his foolish utterances pass current as words of wisdom. We cannot afford to let his misrepresentations be accepted as truthful statements by the President or Secretary of State, or any Government officer whose aid we may require in shelving the Mongolian nuisance.

The press of California should with united voice declare that the Chinese are criminal and vicious to an alarming degree, that their presence in such numbers is an injury and an ever-growing danger to our State, that steps must be taken to get rid of them if California, and the city of San Francisco in particular, are to be spared the horrors of riot, amounting to positive civil war. Mr. MILLS has done mischief, or, at all events, shown a desire to do so, for he must be aware that an agitation is progressing here with the strong object in view of bad and deplorable condition of affairs, and less prompt and practical steps are taken to remove the Chinese. These are stern facts, and the man who either decries or ignores them is no true friend to the State.

LAND MONOPOLY.

Quite as bad or, if not worse than, Chinese degraded and pauper labor, is the deepening effects upon the progress of California, is the monopoly of land. We mean by the the stupendous and immense tracts of country, often many square leagues in extent, are held by individuals who do not cultivate them, or put them to any good use, but keep them for speculative purposes. These persons keep the land idle, and intend so to keep it, until the spread of population and the necessity of increased cultivation compel some one to give them a high price per acre for it. Most of these immense reaches were acquired by the purchase of old Spanish grants for a nominal sum; others were simply taken possession of by force, and still others purchased by lapse of time; there are very few of them, indeed, the acquisition of which has not been more or less tainted with fraud, forgery or wrong of some kind. In saying this, we are only stating what is perfectly notorious and within the personal knowledge of almost every old Californian.

Now these fearfully-acquired possessions, instead of being used for the benefit of the community, are turned into insufferable burdens and oppressions. In reality it is the people, and not the owners, who have to pay the cost of their idleness and unproductiveness. It happens in this way —here, let us say, is a man forming a hundred acres of land; he has toiled for years over it, spent thousands of dollars upon it, and has finally made every square yard of it fruitful. The consumer comes along and taxes it for its full value, fifty or a hundred dollars an acre, perhaps a great deal more. Just at the other side of his fence lies a tract of ten or fifteen thousand acres belonging to some wealthy merchant or speculator, who resides very likely in San Francisco or some other great city, perhaps away in Europe. There are no improvements upon the land; beyond the cost of fencing it even that is done, not a cent has been expended upon it; the wheat lies waste and barren. The consumer, in the discharge of his duty, assesses that huge tract at the rate of a dollar or two an acre, though this soil is just as good as is the small patch of land at the other side of the fence.

We reiterate that this method of taxation is neither fair or equitable, nor calculated to promote the public good. It puts a premium upon idleness, while it oppresses industriousness. It plays into the hands of the large ranch owners, and puts undue load of taxation upon the shoulders of the hard-working farmer. It is friendly to the man who does nothing whatever for the progress of the State, and inimical to the man who strives to increase its wealth. Fair play would suggest that both parcels of land, being of the same quality, should be rated at the same figure per acre; good policy would recommend that, if any discrimination be made at all, it should be in favor of the industrious and assist cultivator.

It affords us much pleasure to notice that already an attempt has been made in the Legislature to remedy this wrong and do away with this anomaly. Friday, December 14th, Mr. JOHNSON introduced the following preamble and resolution in the Assembly:

Whereas, It is the desire of all parties and persons that the monopoly of land should be broken up, and that the holders of vast amounts of the soil of our State should be legally forced to dispose of the same in small tracts to actual settlers; and, whereas, under our present system of taxation the owners of small lots of cultivated land pay more than their just share of the taxes of the State, and the owners of large grants, which are generally uncultivated, do not pay as much taxes as they should; and, whereas, these evils should be rectified; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to frame into the constitutionality of a law imposing the same rate of assessment upon uncultivated land as is imposed upon cultivated land of equal agricultural capacity; and if they find the same to be constitutional, to prepare a bill or bills to carry the same into effect, and report speedily the result of their deliberations to the Assembly.

We cannot understand what any person, having the welfare of the State really at heart, could find objectionable in this. There is nothing communistic in its meaning. It trenches upon no man's rights; it confiscates nobody's property; it makes no discrimination between any classes of persons; it makes one rule and applies to it all alike. Of the perfect constitutionality of the resolution we have little, if any, doubt. A motion was made to indefinitely postpone, another to strike out the preamble and refer the resolution only to the Judiciary Committee; and finally it was moved to refer the whole subject matter, preamble, resolution, motion to strike out and all to the Committee, and this prevailed by a vote of fifty-three against twenty-two. No matter more important to the State, or more deeply interesting to the people, could come under the notice of the Judiciary Committee or call forth the action of the Legislature. We shall follow with attention the fate of Mr. JOHNSON'S preamble and resolution, and scrutinize the conduct of the members of the Assembly with reference thereunto. We want to know whether all the professions made of devotion to the interests of the people made during the election times, are sincere or not. We confess to having some doubts upon the matter.

THE SENATORIAL CONTEST.

The Senatorial contest has ended in the triumph of Hon. JAMES T. FARLEY. The Democratic caucus he received the nomination upon the twenty-fifth ballot, having then a bare majority of one. But the rebelling votes were divided among three or more competitors, and as he had more than twice as many as his nearest rival, his victory may fairly be regarded as a substantial one. Indeed, Mr. FARLEY'S ultimate success was foreseen by many men on the first ballot, as a foregone conclusion and the sole chance of his defeat lay in the prospect of the members opposed to him concentrating their strength upon some one man. No such combination was made, probably no such combination could have been made, and the end of the struggle very naturally was the adoption of the venerable gentleman mentioned. The empty and unenthusiastic honor of a complimentary vote was given to Mr. EVERS by the Republican minority in their caucus nomination; with that distinction, such as it is, that estimable gentlemen must remain coalesced until the chances of political warfare put his party in the ascendant.

We think the Democratic party, as a whole, will be satisfied with the election of Mr. FARLEY. He is a man of more than average ability; he is an experienced legislator; his record, as a whole, is good. There seems to have been some suspicion started that he had come to terms with the great railway power, of which he was of one time so determined an opponent, and it was just half hinted that he would act in the future as the friend and ally of that grasping and avaricious corporation. This, we may say, was the basis of much objection to him, and it is not to be wondered at. There is nothing that the people of California are so uneasy about as the tremendous influence wielded by the railway companies, and they believe that whoever is friendly towards them cannot be well disposed towards the community at large. They forget that both the railways and the citizens have rights. Still, beyond doubt, there is solid foundation for some lack of confidence.

We trust that the Senatorial career of Mr. FARLEY will be such as to dissipate all suspicions on this head, and to prove him the true friend and faithful representative of the people in the national counsel at Washington. There is no reason why he should not be so. We do not know anything that the railroad magnates have to bestow or which he need be so very ambitious. Money is usually a great inducement; but Mr. FARLEY, as he says himself, is an old man, and he ought to be insensible to many temptations affecting younger men, who must look longer and deeper into the future. This, we must acknowledge, is bringing the thing down to a common level and ordinary argument; but it is not hurtful to base our anticipations upon that foundation, though possibly the gentleman himself might think he had reason to complain. But, then, over and above the common sense argument, we have the profound conviction that Mr. FARLEY is a highly honorable and thoroughly honest gentleman. We know he means just what he says, and we are satisfied he will act up to it. We take him upon the latest and purpose of the law words he spoke when returning thanks for his nomination, and we say that if he acts up to them consistently while in Washington, neither the Democratic party nor the people of California, as a whole, will have any reason to regret his election.

FATHER GLERSON'S LECTURE ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.

We are sorry that untoward circumstances have prevented us from procuring a fuller report of Rev. Father GLERSON'S lecture than that which appears in our columns to-day. The Call's synopsis, good as far as it goes, which we reproduce, does not do anything like justice to what really was the best discourse upon the prospects of achieving the national independence of Ireland that has ever been delivered in San Francisco. It was calm, compassionated, though highly emotional in parts, and as strictly argumentative as an address of the kind well could be.

With the opinions of the reverend lecturer we agree in the main, if not entirely. We have grown heartily sick and tired of the Home Rule excitement, which has produced nothing but an immense amount of windy oratory. To the gentlemen who are engaged in it we give all due credit for their patriotism, and we cordially respect also their patriotism. We have some of that intolerance perceptible so often, we regret to say, among advanced nationalists, as strictly argumentative as to condemn as meritorious any line of action not in harmony with our own ideas. So, widely as we differ from the Home Rulers, we respect them and applaud their conduct. That England will be aglad by even the most thrillingly eloquent speeches, either in the House of Commons or anywhere else, into making important concessions to Ireland, and the achievement of our native country's freedom postponed for another hundred years.

Therefore it is that we have always been so sensitive in respect of the character, standing and ability of the men who have assumed the lead in national movements. Therefore it is that we have deprecated so strongly everything that seemed an endeavor to bring about an ill-timed and ill-prepared rebellion. We are convinced that, under no possible combination of circumstances, could Ireland alone and unaided be a match for England. Nor are we very sanguine that a foreign war, even with a power as strong as Russia, Germany or France, could give the ardently desired opportunity, for it could not prevent England from pouring troops by the tens of thousands into Ireland. England was at war, and hard pressed, too, in 1798, yet she pinned more than a hundred and seventy thousand mercenaries' arms on Irish soil and crushed the most formidable insurrection ever attempted, not excepting that of 1841. And she can do it again if called upon. There is no use in disguising or suppressing this important fact.

No. The chance for Ireland, and its only practical and substantial one, will come when England herself is in the throes of revolution. That time may come much sooner than many imagine. There are avowed observers of political events who predict that the Prince of Wales will never be permitted to ascend the throne. Republicanism is spreading among the masses, and the mutterings of an approaching storm can be heard already. There is no appearance of contentment and loyalty, but it is terribly deceptive. The millions of toilers—who have been debased and brutalized, despoiled of everything godlike and manlike, by the insatiate avarice of manufacturers and capitalists, who are without religion, without morality—now know their power and are preparing to use it.

The French Revolution was bad enough and fearful enough, but it was only the quarreling of infants compared with the struggles and convulsions in store for England. Mammon worship will bring its awful penalties in this world, too. When that terrible time comes, as come it surely must, Ireland's opportunity will be at hand. Our countrymen should be prepared to take advantage of it. Organization and preparation should, therefore, be the watchwords of all true Irish Nationalists.

THE WORK OF THE LEGISLATURE.

During the past week both houses of the Legislature have done a large amount of work in disposing of several important bills. If the same energy is displayed for a few months, we think the Democracy will prove to be be proud of their representatives. When both houses are well organized, we trust, be continued in the same spirit. Some bills of merit and importance, relating to matters such as the Land Tax, Board of Public Works the San Francisco Police and School offices, were sent for examination to the various committees competent to pass upon them. Bills were passed dealing with force upon city railroads, appropriations for pool improvements, at the suggestion of Mr. MCCOPPIN, under consideration of the rules. In the House Mr. GEORGE H. ROCHNE had passed a bill to put the question of Chinese immigration to a popular vote. One of the principal things done during the week was the election of a United States Senator. We will not say there was no pecuniary or bad feeling imported into the contest, though each aspirant did his utmost to achieve success. Like honorable men, however, after the heat of the party at heart, they accepted their defeat cheerfully and rallied in good fellowship with the victor.

Our Senators from San Francisco, we are happy to remark, are showing an earnestness in their work which does credit to them to the gratitude of their constituents. We do not like to make distinctions that may appear invidious, though far from being framed in any such spirit; but we must say that Mr. MCCOPPIN is exhibiting an energy and watchfulness over the people's interests, which reflects high credit upon his constituency. Mr. BARSTOW is also showing himself a worthy colleague of the gentleman named in any such spirit; but we must say that Mr. MCCOPPIN is exhibiting an energy and watchfulness over the people's interests, which reflects high credit upon his constituency. Mr. BARSTOW is also showing himself a worthy colleague of the gentleman mentioned. The end crowns the work, and we are satisfied he will act up to it. We take him upon the latest and purpose of the law words he spoke when returning thanks for his nomination, and we say that if he acts up to them consistently while in Washington, neither the Democratic party nor the people of California, as a whole, will have any reason to regret his election.

MR. BARSTOW'S SCHOOL BILL.

Mr. BARSTOW has introduced into the Assembly "an Act to regulate the course of study and the use of text books in the public schools" of which we feel bound to speak a favorable word. It is the protest of common sense against the absurdly extended and complicated curriculum of studies now followed in the schools, and the injunctions supported by the State. "Isms" and "ologies" which the youthful mind hardly comprehend are studied—bless the mark!—to the detriment of more useful and substantial branches of knowledge. Misses and lads who cannot write two consecutive sentences in good readable English can cram through astronomy and geology, and logic. The natural and inexpensive spell is, that the children have a smattering of many things and know nothing well. They are turned out of their proper sphere in life and beyond the capacity of ninety-nine out of every hundred of them. The unwillingness of so many of the rising generation to engage in honorable manual labor is directly traceable to this absurd and mischievous system.

The higher branches of instruction, as they are called, can be availed of to any considerable extent, or practical purpose, only by the children of well-to-do parents who can afford to keep their young ones at school for any length of time they please. For people—meaning artizans and laboring men—want the assistance of their children as soon as they are grown enough to do some light work. Few can manage to leave them until they can read and write with any degree of facility and accuracy. So, in this way, the public school system really taxes the poor for the benefit of the wealthy, and this is flagrantly unjust. To speak the simple truth, the whole educational department is only an agency for squandering the people's money among the friends, pets and female, of the members of the various Boards. It would be a great blessing to the community at large, as well as an immense saving of the public funds, if the course of instruction were confined to the teaching—and that only efficient teaching—of reading, writing and arithmetic. Those who want any more should be compelled to pay for it.

The matter of text books, too, requires sharp looking after. We daresay it will be granted by every one disposed to fair play, that they should contain nothing objectionable or hurtful to the feelings of any religious sect or denomination. The only way to secure this is, evidently, to segregate from their pages everything complained of by the responsible head of any religious denomination. Otherwise, there must be dispute as to what is, and what is not, objectionable. We have not read Mr. BARSTOW'S bill, but if we rightly understand its purport, it is an excellent measure.

Lecture by Father Rooney, O. P.

In another column will be found the advertisement of a lecture to be delivered in St. Francis' church, Vallejo street, Thursday evening, January 3d, by Rev. J. A. Rooney, O. P. The subject will be "The Catholic Doctrine of the Real Presence," concerning which so many erroneous opinions prevail among Protestants and non-Catholics. We are quite sure that the reverend gentleman's discourse will be a splendid treat, and will reveal a vast amount of theological learning. The lecture is to be delivered in aid of the Presentation Convent Schools, Powell street. It cannot be necessary to say anything in favor of schools so well known, and doing so much good. Every parent in the city must see the necessity and propriety of supporting them. The expenses of these schools are great and the taxation is very heavy, so that the Sisters really stand in need of assistance. We would impress upon our readers that it is, in a certain sense, their duty to help the Sisters by attending the lecture. Father Rooney's reputation as an orator is second to that of no other man in the United States. Indeed, he is a worthy coadjutor of the gifted Rev. Thomas N. Burke. On his own merits his lectures must be well worth the attention of both Catholics and Protestants.

Missions by the Passionist Fathers.

The Passionist Fathers, who came to this coast on the invitation of Most Rev. Bishop Alemany, have given missions in Marysville, Colusa, The Willows, Red Bluff, Yreka, Shasta, Chico, Nevada City, Moore's Flat, Cherokee and Oroville. In all these places their instructions and exhortations have been attended by immense throngs of people. The good results, so natural to their zeal and devotion, have been apparent everywhere. The confessionals have been well filled, and communions extremely numerous, and even conversions to the true faith have not been rare. Indeed, there has been a veritable awakening of the religious spirit wherever these learned and pious missionaries have turned their steps. Their success is a matter of congratulation for all good Catholics.

LOVE AND REBELLION.—Kevin O'Doherty, a Young Irelander, was at this time a young medical student in Dublin. From addressing "Eva" poetry he took to addressing her prose.

NEWS FROM IRELAND.

LEINSTER.

DUBLIN.

The county of Wicklow, county of Louth, and county of the town of Drogheda, will, for the purpose of the next winter Assizes, be united to the county of Dublin, and form one county, under the name of the Dublin Winter Assize County. The next Assizes will be held at the Commission Court, at Green street, Dublin, on the 11th December.

KING'S COUNTY.

The man Hugh Quiellek, arrested for firing into the house of James Brereton at Mucknagall, a short distance from Banagher, and dangerously wounding a daughter of Mr. William Bourke, Derrynoose House, county Tipperary, took place. The new Sister took the name in religion of Mary Joseph.

The death is announced of Mr. Michael O'Gorman, of Templemore. Mr. O'Gorman was a thorough nationalist, and one of John Mitchell's proposers when that gentleman was triumphantly elected for Tipperary at the late election.

WATERFORD.

The splendid church for the Order of St. Dominic, in Bridge street, Waterford, is now all but completed, so far as the building itself is concerned, and will be a double ornament to the city, as well as highly creditable to the venerable Order for which it was intended.

The Waterford and Limerick Railway Company have in contemplation the construction, by railway, Waterford with Wexford. This will be a direct route along the banks of the River Suir, from the city to Bridge Hill, where a bridge for foot passengers, as well as the railway, will be erected, and from that point the line will proceed direct to Wexford, through a rich and most populous country—the whole distance from Wexford being but twenty-five miles, which can be run over by express train in three quarters of an hour.

The Rev. George Commins, O.C., St. Patrick's, Waterford, died, after a short illness, on November 23d, at the parochial house, Ladysloss. Father Commins, who was only in his thirty-fourth year, and who was generally beloved and respected, not only by his own congregation, but by people of every class and creed. His country and kindred were, like his charity, universal. He served twenty-five years in the sacred ministry. His remains were interred in St. Patrick's church on November 25th. He was a brother of Alderman Commins, ex-Mayor, and of the late Mr. P. Commins, T.C., and was widely connected in the city of Waterford.

The new iron vessel "Star of France," the property of J. P. Corry & Co., was launched on November 20th, from the shipbuilding yard of Messrs Harland & Wolff, Belfast. The tonnage of the new vessel is about 1,570; she is 250 feet long, with 36 feet breadth of beam; the depth of hold is 20 feet. The launch passed off most satisfactorily.

On November 23d a Home Rule meeting was held in St. Mary's Hall, Belfast, at which Mr. Biggar, M. P., presided. A telegram was read from Mr. Parnell, M. P., stating that he was unable to attend through illness. The meeting was addressed by Mr. O'Donnell, M. P., and others. Resolutions were proposed in the following effect: "That in the opinion of the meeting it is as useful to check the designs of a corrupt Parliament or a bad Ministry as to oppose arbitrary power; that one of the great evils of Irish social strife arises from the anomalous condition of the land laws, and that, in closing the establishment of a peasant proprietary in Ireland as the true Irish system is to be the only practicable and permanent solution on the land question." Another resolution declared that the present condition to which foreign legislation has reduced the country, and which the present meeting to sustain by every legitimate means those who are earnestly laboring to establish a native Parliament for Ireland.

On the above forenoon Gorry went to the landsmen bottle and drank a quantity after-wards telling his aunt what he had done. His relations reside in Belfast.

ANNAGH.

There was recently in Lurgan bridewell a man who gave his name as John Fegg, and who was committed for trial. John Fegg is a native of Belgium, and a great deal of interest was excited in the court-house in and decorating from the land and sea services of the world. He served in the Dutch army, in the army of the Pope, in the army to the Franco-Austrian war as a French soldier, and enlisted in the 108th Regiment in England, with which he went out to India. Hadsexerted from the British service, made his way from India to Europe, landed in in Derry some time ago a ship-wrecked sailor. From Derry he shipped to Belfast, then he walked to Lurgan and gave him-self up to the police. He can converse intelligibly in twelve languages, and can speak two or three with perfect fluency. CONNAUGHT.

GALWAY.

The proposed railway from Tuam to Claremorris, via Milltown, may be said to have emerged from its region of doubt, and to have entered the first hopeful stage of realisation. The preliminary notices have already be'n given, and shares have been taken to a large extent. Sir Arthur Guinness alone has promised to contribute ten thousand pounds, and his subscription brings up the list to over twenty-two thousand pounds. The construction of the line will confer a great boon on the counties of Mayo and Galway.

On November 21st a storm, accompanied by heavy showers of rain, swept over Ballinasloe and the adjoining districts. Slates were carried from the roofs of houses; hay-cocks, in several instances, were whirled by the storm; trees of long standing were torn from the roots; the roof of a house on the county Roscommon side of the town was blown off, but the inhabitants escaped without injury. The road leading to Aughrim was almost impassable at Islecapel owing to the floods. The low-lying lands between the workhouse and railway station were totally submerged, as also the callows land between the bridges at Leecester's Mills and Poolboy, so that approach to the town presented the appearance of a lake.

ROSCOMMON.

The resignation of Mr. Graham, for several years Inspector of National Schools in the Roscommon district, has been tendered and accepted by the Education Board.

—The first meeting of the Roscommon Hog Hounds was at Tulsk, on November 20. The attendance was large, and the run a good one, the deer leading them to Dunsmin.

MAYO.

Mr. Michael Geraghty, Westport Quay, has been presented by the Humane Society with a silver medal and testimonial in the Irish in Derry some time ago a ship-wrecked language, in recognition of his services rendered in rescuing some of the occupants of the ship Ellen Bowen, which was wrecked on a precipitous spot some time since at Mount Kelly House.

Lord Oranmore was vigorously hooted at the Claremorris Railway Station, November 17th, on the arrival of the Lord Lieutenant, on his way to the Spiddal Station for a short time, en route from Tuam.

The November 20th Miss Mary Mollohis (in religion Sister Mary Joseph). Miss Mary Judge (in religion Sister Mary Annunciata). Miss Margaret Joyce (in religion Sister Mary Margaret Alacoque), were received into the convent of the Sisters of Mercy, Mount St. Mary, Claremorris.

SLIGO.

The Sligo Independent of November 24th says:—"On Wednesday night and Thursday night a storm, accompanied by heavy showers of rain, swept over this town and adjoining districts. Slates were carried from the roofs of houses. Haycocks in the country districts suffered by the storm, which raged with unabated fury till Friday morning. Several were torn from the trees. Some lawlying meadows are totally submerged.

Mr. John Keony, who for twenty years has filled the position of conducting mark to the Sligo and Ballina steamers, died in Sligo, has decided upon leaving it, for the purpose of becoming a partner in the extensive grocery and bar business of Mr. P. Nolan of Ballina.

Monkey in Court.

On the arraignment of the prisoners in the Tombs Police Court, 26th November, a monkey approached the bar with the rest. He wore a scarlet coat, and a velvet cap trimmed with gilt lace. He pulled hard at the string by which an Italian held him; and, being led to the front of the bench, climbed nimbly to the railing that separates prisoners from the presiding magistrate. Steadying himself on that perch by embracing the iron with his tail, he turned his wry face toward Justice Flammer, obtained visibly, pulled off his cap and bowed with profound gravity. The gray hair bristled thick on the top of his head, and his face was wrinkled, so that he looked sagaciously like a very small and very old man.

"Who is this?" Justice Flammer asked.

"A prisoner," replied Dinner Hatton, "His name is Jimmy Dilon. I arrested him for assaulting Mary Shea."

"A monkey arrested for assault!" the Justice exclaimed.

Jimmy blinked his eyes, showed his teeth and bowed a good many times, as though the proceeding, as he viewed it, was very funny indeed.

"Where is the complainant?" the Justice asked.

Mary Shea stepped forward. She took her right forefinger out of a handkerchief and showed that it was lacerated. Mary Shea she was a neighbor of Jimmy in Baxter alley, that notorious adjunct of Mulberry street; that she kindly offered him a cake or candy; that he grabbed it greedily, and bit her finger.

Jimmy sat on the railing with his head on one side, and constantly taking off his cap and patting it on again, as though appreciative of the forgetting and remembering that he was to a court of justice.

"What do you think ought to be done with Jimmy?" said Justice Flammer.

"Why, sir," Mrs. Shea answered, "I think he ought to be locked up."

"But we can't imprison a monkey, you know. Your remedy is to bring a civil suit against the owner for damages."

"And who's there any justice to be had against the miserable brute?"

"I don't know of any law that makes a monkey criminally liable for biting."

Mrs. Shea was exceedingly indignant, and as she wrapped her hurt finger in her handkerchief, she exclaimed: "This is a pretty country for justice." Cancoo Dilly, the owner of Jimmy, may be an Italian, and was wildly fond of candy, and in his free, delight-ful unintentionally bitten Mrs. Shea.

"He is discharged," said the Justice.

Jimmy gleefully climbed a climb up the gas fixtures on the Justice's desk, and to sit on the glass globe. Town he reached to shake hands with his Honor; but, being replaced, he screamed loud and long like a human, took of his cap several times in a second, and bowed so low that his feet slipped from the railing and he hung by his tail. His owner carried him out of the room.—N. Y. Sun.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

"The cause of education be hegged!" he clamored, as he sat down on the corn-stalk in Shelby street.

He was 6 feet of thirteen. His pants were supported by a piece of wire clothes line, and his shirt was open at the neck and greasy, and his big flat feet appeared to be waiting for a thunder-shower to wash them clean.

"What's the matter with me?" he went on, as he rubbed his toes into the wet mud. "I don't believe to a letter diffing in and learning what there is to learn, and not letting other folks have a chance. Dere's plenty of other folks in this world besides me, and I don't believe to be a hog, and try to learn all there is to learn."

After a minute he went on:

"Don't I know how? Three times two are six, four times five are twenty, and four times four are eight. There is no correct as-pect to that! I went to school for a long time, and I know it as well as if I weighed a ton."

He rose up to throw a stone at a dog that was near, and after resuming his seat he went on.

"Mighty kinder wrestles me down, but I don't go round on jogerfy. What's the matter an island is entirely surrounded by water, or whether there sin't any water within ten miles of it? S'pose I'm going to buy and sell islands for a living? I don't see what's the use of my learning all the biggest river, do I? I'm going to keep a pig store, and when I'm rolling bales of pork around will I care about mountains and rivers? I've heard the boys go on about exports and imports, and sines, and cose, and copse, but what's them to me? If father wants a bag of oats, is he going to sell and ask me how the Island of Madagascar was discovered?"

The War at the Cape.

CAPE TOWN, October 23.—The whole colonial force, consisting of 500 Europeans, 1,000 Fingoes and 1,500 Tembus, simultaneously advanced in four divisions upon the Galeker at daybreak on Thursday, October 18. Major Elliott took the left, and reached the mouth of the Bashee river, occupying all the drifts, thus preventing the escape of the enemy into Moslo territory. The other three divisions, advancing from the north and west, effected a junction at Calleoli, thus completely hemming in the enemy. Aware of the necessity of securing their retreat, the Galeker attacked Major Elliott on the 20th in great force, but were repulsed with a loss of fifty men. There was no casualties on our side. Commander Griffiths, in his report, says: We have secured the whole country up to the Umtapa Bay road, above the Mzashi forest, not without fighting, in which two fathers named Gose, captains of the Fingo tribe, and also Fingoes were killed. There were also twenty-one Fingoes wounded and six Europeans. In one skirmish the Galeker lost seventy men shot dead and many wounded. The Imperial troops still remain in the colony. The Governor has been on a visit to Kiesma. Mr. H. M. Stanley, with six hundred and thirty followers, arrived for Majesty's ship Industry at Simons Bay on Tuesday, the 21st. He has at present sleeping with the Commodore at the Admiralty House, but will take lodgings. Mr. Stanley proposes to remain a few days and then leave for Zanzibar, having promised his head to see them safely home. From Zanzibar, he makes the most of his way to England, but by what route he has not decided. Three companies of the 13th, stationed at Pretoor, mutinied a few days since refusing to obey any orders given by one of the sergeant majors. After some difficulty the officers succeeded in quelling the disorder.

Sobering Beecherism.

"DISAPPOINTED CANDIDATES—Christopher Columbus and Joan of Arc having been warmly pressed by their friends for the honors of canonization, the committee to whom their case was referred has reported unfavorably. After the most diligent search among the records, nothing has been discovered about them. In fact, it is hinted, that the latter's eyes of Christopher's ardent were needlessly."

Worthy, again, of Beecher's organ. Filthy, it wishes to feel what is worthy of great respect. Such expressions as these Puritan would drag down to his own dishonored level the great Christopher Columbus. "Hinting" is easy. When men of common sense speak of the infamies of Beecher, they do not "hint" at their nature. But their is neither "hint" nor assertion to the disparagement of Christopher Columbus, either in his earlier or later years. The sole charge against him is, that he gathered up by Navarette, and copied without examination by Washington Irving, in his brilliant, and false, romance of the Spanish Conquest. Standing on the shoulders of Plympus, who supposes himself great, but, as regards Columbus, is but a vile cockney.

We have not occupied our columns with one line regarding the proposed canonization of Christopher Columbus—discussed by eminent personages. We think, with the Francisco Prior, who officiated at his first humble burial, that that will be a matter of an apostle, he life that of a martyr, and he death that of a saint." But, so long as it does not please God to work miracles in the unexpectable manner, by invocation of him, after his death, we do not look upon his saintly character, they stand without a rival.

A notable bill has doubtless by this time been placed upon the statute book by the Parliament of Victoria. We allude to the measure for imposing exceptional taxation upon the proprietors of large landed estates in that country. The various holdings are divided into four classes, at £1, £1 5s, and £1 an acre, and all holders of land of a higher capital value than £2,500 an acre are charged 2s per cent. upon that capital value. The recent victory of the Government at the polling booths rendered success to the measure in the Lower Chamber, but it was thought that the bill might possibly be rejected in the Upper. The latter body, however, remains seeking the frantic declarations of Sir Samuel Wilson and others—who affirmed that they might be forced to select for their residence "some cooper in which property is secure"—had just voted the second reading by 16 to 11 when —It is telegraphed from Richmond, Va., that a lottos from Rome states that the Rev. John J. Keane, of Washington, has been appointed Bishop of Richmond.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

—Rev John Garrity, a young priest of the Diocese of Springfield, died of typhoid fever at his father's residence, Chicopee Falls, Mass., on Tuesday, November 27th.

—Cardinal Messing left London en route for Rome, during the first week of November. After reaching Paris he contracted a severe cold, which developed into influenza so severe that dangerous consequences were apprehended, and the Bishop of Salford was summoned from England to his bedside. At latest accounts he was recovering slowly.

—The oldest Church in the Christian world is said to be at Orisonville, in the diocese of Algiers. It was erected A. D. 328, soon after the conversion of Constantinople, as has been recently ascertained from an inscription on the pavement of the church.

—The Manchester, N. H., Mirror says: A few years ago one might ride a week without finding a follower of the Pope owning a farm. Now any of as can polish to school districts peopled almost entirely by them. When one buys and settles upon a farm others follow, and in a few years they possess the whole neighborhood. Then, one by one, the old homesteads, the memories of New England ideas, the cradles of New England's men, are slipping from the hands of the Yankees.

—Monsignor Woodlock, rector of the Catholic University of Dunlin, and one of the canons of the metropolitan cathedral, has been appointed by his Eminence Cardinal Cullen one of his Vicars-General.

—The first Christian virgin whose name is recorded as having vowed herself to God made a profession of virginity and received the veil, is St. Marcellina, who received the veil from Pope Liberius in the church of St. Peter, Rome, on Christmas Day, 352. We hear of "Nuns of Virginia" in the first century, and from the days of the Apostles there have always been women who devoted themselves to chastity, poverty and the service of their neighbor.

—Rev. George Cummins, C. C., St. Patrick's, Woonsocket, died after a short illness, November 28, at the parochial house, Lady-lane. Father Cummins, who was only in the forty-eighth year of his age, was generally beloved and respected, not only by his own co-religionists but by people of every class and creed. His generosity and kindness were like his charity, universal. The lamented priest was brother of Alderman Cummins and of the late Mr. P. Cummins, T. C., and was widely connected in the city of Waterford.

—The Liberal and anti-Clerical party in Belgium are seriously disturbed by the extraordinary increase in the number of converts to Christianity in that country. In 1846 there were 137 religious houses for men, and 543 for women, containing in all 11,000 persons. In 1856 the number of religious houses had risen to 1,326, and they have continued in increase. Immense real estate is now held by those institutions. The Carmelite women have built a house on their estate at Chevremont at a cost of $200,000.

—The Dublin Freeman's Journal of November 19 contains the following telegram from Rome that has been received by the Irish Parliamentary party: "The Pope will be present on the occasion of the Consistory on the 24th of December, when two archbishops and three bishops will be nominated. The Consistory will be followed by a solemn Mass, at which the Pope will officiate. The Archbishop of Cashel will be present at the ceremony. Mr. Parnell's visit to Rome is considered to be a great success."

—The Rev. Father Hecker has been elected to the Archbishopric of Oregon, but has declined the honor. The Rev. Father Hecker is the founder of the Paulist Fathers, and has been advanced to the dignity of consecration in the course of nature. Father Hecker is a convert to Catholicity in that country. In 1846 there were 137 religious houses for men, and 543 for women, containing in all 11,000 persons. In 1856 the number of religious houses had risen to 1,326, and they have continued in increase. Produce Market Report.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 20, 1877.

The cry of drought or the fear thereof is no longer heard or felt in the land. The finest large fine feeding the past week was visited by reasonable and copious rains, which, with the aid of irrigating canals and drains, give to every appearance of most time and a golden harvest of grain and gold. The rains have had rather a depressing effect upon holders of wheat, many of them heretofore refusing to sell their Wheat until the rain set in, while now many of the largest producers show a desire to realize at once.

The markets usually at this season of the year are quiet, and the present forms no exception to the holiday rule. This is the time for balancing books and closing accounts for the past year, and hence no one is inclined to operate beyond current pressing trade requirements. Shipment of bread-stuff to Great Britain do not appear anxious to purchase Wheat, even at the very low rates of freight ruling to the United Kingdom—hence could a ship be obtained to load for a direct port. Thus far in the season shipments seem to show that those producers who have held with any considerable profit in the shipper, and it is said that Oregon cargoes, even at the large difference in freight, have paid better profits as a rule than those cleared from San Francisco; hence it is that several of our largest foreign commission houses have established branch houses at Portland, Oregon, and Portland, and judging from the past it is quite evident that large shipments of flour and wheat from Oregon will in the future set a more prominent part in the foreign exports than ever before.

FLOUR—Oregon continues to send in free supplies. Sales are reported of 1,500 bbls Stockmeadow superfine in the city for export at $4 00 bbls 6c, to 25. We quote current prices as follows: Superfine $4 00@4 25; Extra Superfine $4 50@4 75; Extra Family and Bakers, Extra, $4 90@5 00; Double Extra, Fancy Extras, command the extremes of the local market; $5 00@5 25 per bbl (all in cloth, if not otherwise).

WHEAT—We continue to draw free supplies from Oregon by steamer, owing to the low freights ruling. Exports to Great Britain are confined. Since the rain holders there more disposed to realize, hence more sales of a small character. The following are the transactions during the week: [illegible] shipped, free on board, [illegible] at $1 37½; good shipping do, $1 35; do do good milling do, [illegible] do do fair shipping do, [illegible] at $1 32½; 1,000 ctls do, $1 32½; 500 ctls Oregon milling, $1 35 @ ctl. Liverpool quoted: December 19th—7s 7d @ 7s 8d or average; 7s 7½d@7s 8d on spot.

BARLEY—Business in the grain continues to be very sluggish, and prices nearly nominal. Transactions for the week embrace the following lots: 250 ctls Bay Feed, $1 05@1 07½; 1,000 ctls Chile Feed, $1 07½; 500 ctls Bay Feed, $1 05@1 07½; 1,000 ctls Chile Feed, $1 05; 500 ctls good Bay Brewing, $1 12½; 500 ctls Coast Brewing, $1 12½@1 15.

OATS—Prices keep up some tolerably well, the very best selling at $2 2½ ctl. Sales in lots as follows: 500 ctls Gray Feed, $1 75; 500 ctls Oregon Feed, $1 90; 100 ctls Bay Feed, $1 80; 125 ctls choice mixing at $2 10@ ctl.

CORN—We continue to look in the domestic supply, and prices rule steady. Sales for the week embrace the following: 150 ctls Yellow Mexican, $1 70; 100 ctls do do, $1 72½; 100 ctls do do, $1 75; 100 ctls do do and Yellow, $1 70; 200

TELL ME WHERE MY BROTHER FELL.

[A Turkish soldier of noble birth, upon hearing that her brother was missing on the morning after a severe engagement, hurried to the scene of action, and for a time sought him in vain. At length a fellow soldier came to her aid, and finding over the wounded man, she could only recognize him by a well-known ring upon his hand. Falling on his breast, she pressed him, and died with him of a broken heart.]

"Fighting for his country's honor,
Pierced by shot or bursting shell,
Oh, my dear, my only brother,
Tell, oh tell me where he fell!"
Fiercely then a Turkish maiden
Rode 'mid the heaps of slain,
As she sought her fallen brother
On the gory field of pain.

Dark and dense the breath of reason
Flung its gloomy pall around,
And a storm of steaming carnage
Flowed from many a human wound.
Sabers, swords and bows in harmony
Talkers Sage all basted with blood,
Lifeless limbs and hissing lashes,
Marked the height of battle's flood.

Like the leaves in bleak November,
Corpses on corpse the fallen bar!
Side by side, the steed and warrior,
While the wounded chargers' neigh
Rose 'mong all the hill and valley,
And the rat'ning victors' cries.
Hovering o'er the field of slaughter,
Rose in concert to the skies.

Hither, thither, quick she hurried,
Slipping in the slimy gore—
Every where she heard a murmur,
Till her worry limbs grew sore.
Pause at last, she knew not whither,
Where, or how to guide her feet;
Could she rest where more were dying?
Would she seek for further meet?

Frantic, in despair she wavers,
Beats her breast and tears her hair—
Heeds! she stops, she always is there.
Some known voice she seems to hear;
Starts, her heary frame grow brighter,
By her side a form she spies!
'Tis the voice, but not the features—
Not the loved one sure that lies.

Let ugliest another whisper,
Lowly o'er his face she bends;
All in vain, her search is fruitless—
But she recognizes the ring,
Shortly, trembling, to his sister,
And her brother's ring she sees—
The best one, her fallen brother!
And the sighs upon her knees.

Lenses her o'er his bleeding bosom,
While her heary, heavenly hum,
Falling on his fevered features,
Gives his brow a moment's calm.
Close long locked and all is over,
"Brother, dear!" the maiden cries,
Prizes him where upon the forehead—
One last kiss—and by him dies.

SHEMUS DHU,

THE BLACK PEDDLER OF GALWAY.

A TALE OF THE PENAL TIMES.

CHAPTER III.

Thanks to the absence of Andrew Connel and his wife, We can now enter upon the history even of miserie in Galway without risk of injury to purse or head. But do not expect, reader, that by your solicitation I am about opening the dusty archives of the innumerable City Council of the Corporation of Galway. Indeed, we might insure you some choice specimens of their manner of government—facts and enactments touching the doctrine of forbearance for the stronf—as they may be—of the political or religious creed of your neighbor, and the necessity of listening to withdraw, ing that doctrine. In truth, this is not my formal intention in the present story. I will now only say, why old Judith felt so interest in O'Kane's son.

We have hinted that Connel was not always an inhabitant of Portaragh. Happy for him he had been. Among the recollections which the thoughts of our young, or life bring with them, none are more pleasing or more melancholy than those connected immediately with home and with our first friends. Home! happy or unhappy home! in memory's spell word, which amidst gaiety and pleasures, troubles and sufferings, constantly changes the character of our feelings, giving a transient light and joy! or softening, like a heavy hue on that of some, and throwing gloom and pain upon the poses of others.

Connel often experienced the latter change, for though his adopted neighbors were kind and generous, his thoughts often went back to the place of his birth, and to the early friendships which he had formed. Oftentimes, then conversation was at the highest among his evening visitors, and when his simple hearers wondered at the knowledge he displayed, so he gave his opinion on some subject of dispute, or interested them in the seasons of the world unknown to them—I mean of Galway—he was observed to start, and become sad and deeply silent. This was not understood by some—it was overlooked by the villagers of who loved Connel, and who had experienced amusement so well as benefit from his instruction.

Be this as it may, the rumors never reached him, and he felt happier with them than he had felt among his neighbors of the town, immediately before his departure from it. However, it was said openly, and Connel gave his sanction to the report, that he was obliged to leave Galway and a flourishing business of innkeeping, or some business of the kind, because he had been implicated with his fosterbrother and patron, a respectable merchant of the town, in some affair which gave umbrage to the religious feelings of the City Council; and that he, after his patron's exile and confiscation of property, some three years before the period of which we write, received protection from Firench of Moycullen, being at the time accompanied by his orphan children, a son and a daughter, the latter an infant in the arms of Judith the nurse.

It was on the day previous to the opening of our story that Judith, in the order of her weekly custom, visited an old acquaintance, whose dwelling lay some miles away in a thick wood that surrounded Portaragh.

Those visits were not made weekly to the same persons; for Judith, or as she was more commonly called, Judy Bawn, as upon women given almost an account of her fair complexion, or more probably from the white color of her hair, had many intimate acquaintances among the country folk. When it pleased Judy to make a particular visit, as on the present occasion, it behoved her to remain and partake of the boiled salmon and of the curds and whey of goat's milk, which were prepared to be prepared in a short time for her refreshment, the time naturally was spent in gossip though at the same time Judy was expected, or rather was pleased, to assist in the industry of the housewife, for the female ancestors of our peasantry had no idea, as at present, of making an idle visit.

"How is it, Judy Bawn," said an old woman, a visitor, too, who sat in a corner of the cabin, assisting to repair the meshes of a net, 'that Connel keeps up such long and intimate acquaintance with Shemus Dhu! We have heard, and that from people who know, that he is not over good; others may be pleased with him, but I don't like the looks of the man."

"Shemus, old neighbor," said Judy, letting the reel fall with which she had been busily engaged; "shame, that you at your age should judge from the looks of a man. But what for that? Do you think Connel would be his intimate friend unless he was trustworthy?"

"That may be as it answers your master's purpose best," replied the old woman, tauntingly, on notice of provoking being offended at Judy's insinuation about the looks of a man, although Judy had no sinister meaning in the word; "but I will say, and I don't care who takes it, that a time was when some of my neighbors would be less likely to thrive on the looks of a man than I. I am sure, mistress, we may think as we please."

"Ay!; but not to say what you think of your betters, good woman," said Judy, with a toss of the head, indica ive of the low place which her opponent held in her opinion.

"Oh! does it come to that, mistress?" retorted the old woman, throwing the ball of thread from her, and tying and undoing again with excitement the strings of her lower garment. "But, let me ask, Miss Bawn, who are my betters?"

Judy was prepared with an answer, and an answer which would confound the unfortunate woman who dared to question her superiority over the other matrons of the country, had not the woman of the house interfered, perceiving the issue so disreputable to her hospitality which the conversation was likely to produce.

"Judy is stout, other under her roof. We will eat our bread in good feeling, and to-morrow, when you think well of it, you may speak as you please. Here, Maurice, take this negress to Judy Bawn, and the other to Mary."

"Thank you," said Judy, whose wrath was suddenly appeased, not by the offering of the sweet potatoes and rotten cake, for we would not insinuate that so grand dame comfortege highly as to sacrifice her spirit and pride to the animal satisfaction of enjoying them in peace. But Judy had her own reasons for desiring to withdraw, during that doctrine. In truth, this is not my formal intention in the present story. I will now only say, why old Judith felt so interest in O'Kane's son.

"In truth, sooruseen, you may say that," said the old woman. "But you know people cannot help hearing what others say of their friends."

The tone of conciliation in which this was spoken satisfied both parties, and they were again on as friendly a footing as when they entered the cabin.

The rays of the sun were now playing horizontally through the openings of the wood, and as Judy had some distance to go, she prepared to depart, lest the sudden November night might overtake her on the way. The good woman of the cabin regretted that neither her husband nor her sons were at home to conduct Judy through the wood, for the wild deer, who now were beginning to come nearer to the villages, were sometimes troublesome to lone gravelers, especially to those of the weaker sex. Judy said she had no fears concerning them, and throwing her blue frieze cloak over her head and shoulders, she left the cabin.

For some time she was engaged with the recollections of her visit and conversation which it produced. "Am I not an old fool!" she thought, "to allow myself to be raved by the remarks of that silly creature! What if I let her know something which might injure Connel? Ah! I see I must not visit such foolish people so often; or if I do, I must not be vexed with them."

With this resolution, so creditable to her prudence, she arrived at a part of the wood where the path divided. For some time she was irresolute which path she would take. Both led to Portaragh, but then the nearer and more path led not as ever-good character, especially at nightfall, and Judy too strongly credited the stories of supernatural agency connected with it to entrust herself to its loneliness. For some time, as she picked her steps through the rocks and underwood of the longer path, she seriously thought on the course which gave her so much difficulty in her journey "Am I not an old fool," again she said, as she recovered from a stumble over a protruded rut, "to give myself such labor for nothing. I cannot say my five decades, or say prayers. God help me! ever these wicked rogues, who have I am home. Connel will have the old men with him, and the youngsters will be playing and flirting. The Lord forgive me for coming this way! I can't say my rosary this blessed night."

Judy's soliloquy would have gone on in the same strain if an accident did not occur, which we will relate in the next chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

We hinted that Judy was influenced to avoid the shorter path by her fear of something supernatural connected with it. Indeed, the part of the wood which she now entered was well calculated to excite her fears if gloom and loneliness alone would give them birth. She had descended a rocky hill, and the birch and ash were so thickly interwoven on each side as to give to the glen in which she was the appearance of dark night, though the sun had scarcely set. Before her arose another hill, over which her path led, having on its top such a dense clustering of wood that the idea never would have occurred to strangers that through these trees was the only egress from the ravine.

When Judy arrived at the bottom of the valley her meditations upon the folly of choosing this path in preference to the easier and shorter one, was interrupted by a noise as that of persons making way through the wood. She listened, and her first idea was confirmed by the voices which were approaching her. "Some robbers, or some persons whom I know," thought she, "I will wait them at any chance, whether friends or foes. It is better to have their company then not, in such a place." She was not a moment in doubt as to their moral character: for, two men, though in a dress different from that of any of her acquaintance, made their appearance from a high rock which was some yards before her left. The manner of the strangers, when they perceived the woman, was irresolute; and she, in turn, stood silent, in surprise. When they perceived that they were observed, they strutted towards her with the seemed indifference of people who care not with whom they meet. Judy believed them to be some young men of the town, who were led far into the woods by their game—though it was unusual for any to come so far for the mere purpose of sport. This thought of Judy's was supported by their dress and arms. Both were simply habited, wearing a close dark colored jacket, tightened about the waist with a rough girdle, from which hung their hunting knife and large powder horn, the latter containing both ammunition and provision. They wore close leather skull-caps, and loose canvas trowsers, strapped over the thighs to the muscular of calves.

Each carried a long gun; and one of them, the taller, held in a leather slip a magnificent deer hound. They were strongly made men, fitted for feats either of activity or strength. The taller, but the younger, seemed the superior. He was and fun, united with a recklessness of danger in pursuit. There was a jauntiness in his gait, and a lightness in his step, which showed that the cares of the world set lightly upon him, or that he wished that they should appear to do so. It was not long with his companion, who, from his appearance, was his senior by half a score years. His countenance might have been handsome when he was younger; but it was evident from first sight, to the most casual observer, that he was a man of strong and dark passion. His thick black hair, seeping from his cap, seeded his forehead. His dark eyes seemed unusually large, and heavy beetling eyebrows. His nose and mouth were handsome, but there was a constant motion on his lips, which took from the latter part of it giving any relief to his other sinister features. His bushy whiskers of the same color with his hair were worn in a formal cut, in perfect keeping with the dark expression of his entire countenance. Judy could not observe all this, but we are privileged to give the description.

Judy was surprised, but not much terrified, at the approach of the hunters. She had often seen persons in a similar dress, and on a similar adventure—as she considered them to be engaged—in the woods. Thinking, therefore, they had lost their way in the wood she approached them. When the hunters came up to her, the older person, who appeared to be the principal, accosted her—

"Good woman," he said in Irish, "can you direct us to the nearest and easiest way to the high path that leads to Galway? We have been in the woods since mid day, but not being acquainted with them we have gone astray."

"Willingly," said Judy, "you shall have my knowledge of the wood; but we must first come to the height before us. I will then direct you."

They ascended the hill in silence, and Judy pointed out the path which led to it to the right hand; at the same time, with such cautions and directions about bogs and cross paths, that head they put the question in earnest, they would be seriously inconvenienced by her directions.

"In faith, good mother," said the young hunter, "you tell us of difficulties we thought not of before. Had you not better, yourself, come and show us the way? Believe me, my friend here, for many reasons, will be thankful."

"Hush, Frank," said his companion in English. "At least in this part of the country let your wit rest."

"If my wit must rest, my dog, thank heaven for my sport, cannot. Fair play for Bessee, I say, and on his haunches, my man!"

These words were caused by the restlessness and snuffing of the noble animal which he led, and which, from the time they had ascended the hill, pulled strongly against its master's leading.

"Quiet, you young fool! what see you? Down, Bessee, down man!" were quietly used in the accent by his master. But when they stood upon the top of the hill a fine deer burst from a copse on the opposite side of the valley, disturbed from his lair by the noise of the party, or by that instinct which told him that danger was near. For some moments he stood erect, eyeing the party, and then snuffing the air, and tossing his head on high, he dashed towards the opening, from which the hunters had made their appearance. It would have been only the work of the instant to the younger hunter to unslip his hound; but his companion knew his talent, and held his hand.

"How now, D'Arcy?" said the younger stranger. "How is this, pray? Did you not tell me I should have sport, and why hinder it the entire day? An hour hence, you hindered me from firing at a fine stag; and now, when a prime buck appears, you will not even allow my dog to scent him. If you have other reasons for the journey—the devil! why not tell me at first! My mother, sister for the journey were amusement and pleasure."

"Hold now, not so fast with your reasons," said D'Arcy, as he was called, who seemed to know by what spring his companion's feelings could be changed. "What think you of the opinion of your comrades, if you hallooed your hound upon a deer of this season, believing it to be a beast of pleasure."

"By Jove," said his companion, replacing the string upon the dog's neck, with an action so cool that it surprised D'Arcy, "the man speaks truth. I am not angry with you for error, would hear to his face that he lied."

"Be that as you please, O'Reilly," said D'Arcy, "that believe me, Jo would have committed the error, had I not, for your character's sake, prevented you."

"Thank you," said Frank O'Reilly, in a dogged tone; "my character is safe, I hope, in my own keeping."

"Now in the bad humor again. Come, man, we will be judged. Woe say you, old mother, was the buck a pricket?"

Those who knew D'Arcy better than his unsuspecting companion, could know that the question was put with the test of the angler, who, after giving full line to his fish, finds it necessary to his power over it to hold it strongly; for in the rest of it he feels liberty it jerk out the hook. D'Arcy did not expect to get any information from the old woman; he believed she did not understand him. He was taken unawares, then, when O'Reilly replied in English. "Please you, my master, there was a time when I could answer your question. My sons now, God help the wife, fail me. I thought at one time that I was the fine creature throw his crest up, when he caught sight of his enemy there; this is a sign that he was a prime deer, and older than a year. I fancy the buck knew his game well; that dog is not used to start at a false scent." Judy spoke in English, but not in a foreign accent, but not his companion's.

"By my honour it is, old women," said O'Reilly, replying to the first part of Judy's speech, "you speak truly, whether you know it or not."

"Hush! Frank, for my sake," interrupted D'Arcy, with a look which soon silenced his companion's remonstrance.

"Ha! ha! So, old lady, you understand our words without intending it, I suppose. Thank your good fortune that you have not heard that which we wished not to be spoken. Now, good mother, to your own way, I hope."

"In whom hope you? But that less, I think, was never made for hoping to anything, or," muttered Judy aside, "whose feelings of self-esteem were great, and consequently became quickly excited by the disparaging tone of D'Arcy.

Old Judith, when answering D'Arcy thought that she spoke to an utter stranger. It was only when her last words of reproach called up a scowl upon his features, which brought their wrat expression into play, that the idea arose to her mind that she had seen that countenance before. Wonderful are the circumstances of recognition! The stranger perceived her scrutinizing look, and he turned hastily to his companion, who had called on before him. His action was so sudden that Judith had no time, but a strict scrutiny of his counten ance to satisfy herself that she had seen him before. She felt pleasure, and pain, as yet feared, when she saw the strangers stop on the path to which she directed them, and heard the older say:

"Did you observe the searching look of that old hag? By heaven! I fear she knows me."

"What of that?" replied his companion sharply, his feelings yet warm from D'Arcy's reproof to his sport. "I think it is now time, at this hour of the evening, to cease fearing the look of every old woman you meet. It seems," he continued, as he felt with bitterness the contempt, though not intended, conveyed by D'Arcy's silence, as the latter stood heedless of his remarks, "that you tread upon this ground, friend, as if you feared every turn in your path would bring before you a witness of some dark deed. You know best yourself, you are safe in my keeping," observed the good natured fellow, after a pause, when he saw D'Arcy's features countenance undergo a change indicative of a pleasing termination to some strong exertion of memory. "But I must say, you should have let me more into your secrets, and I should not then have blamed your hinderance of my sport. But whither back again?"

"Wait me here, O'Reilly," said D'Arcy, "it will be with you soon. A new light burst upon me! I will go after her, and know more of her, and her friends." This saying, he turned towards Judith, who awaited him with an anxiety as highly wrought as his own.

"Thank heaven," said or rather thought Frank O'Reilly, "I feel not the stings of a guilty conscience! Poor fellow! there is something weighty on his memory. I am censured by my relations for being over in but not his companion's.

"By my honour it is, old women," said O'Reilly, replying to the first par of Judy's

Mass every Sunday in a fresh pair of Vernchoyle's trowsers. The neighbors began to talk about it and to pity Mulligan. Indeed, some members of Father Ky's flock complained upon the cruel humiliation practised on a good-natured husband. The Priest, however, did not see the cruelty. "On the contrary," he said, "if we are to test Mrs. Mulligan's love by the high stand and of the purity of our great and noble mineral, the very post of love, Mrs. Mulligan is a noble example of devotion; for does not Thomas Moure declare in his sweet and dulcet notes that

"The heart that has truly loved never forgets,
But fondly loves on to the CONTRARY."

Monkeys by Wholesale.

An American consular officer, now in Washington on leave of absence, relates a very funny occurence which came under his observation during his official residence in Liverpool. A successful and wealthy shipowner, having devoted some time to the business of money-making, than to the cultivation of any of the unnecessary social ilelements of the intellect, was considering by his business associates a little "off" in his nethegraphy. He sent an order to Bombay, and, among other things, was for two monkeys, which he wanted to present to some friends; but departing the six great powers of Europe spend five hundred millions annually on their armaments; the withdrawal of three millions of men from active service, and a pressure of twelves a much greater pecuniary loss to those countries, and to mankind in general, than even M. de Girardin seems capable of estimating.

A soldier, he says, costs England $503 40, which, for an army of 106 000 men, makes her military expenditure $53 256 160 per annum. A soldier cost the French Republic only slightly more, but takes her army annuals to 440 000 men, and thus raises her military expenses to $112 913,-208. The Czar pays a little over $235 a head for his soldiers, or 575,000 men, and the regular army to pay, and the total cost of the Russian army for a single year is estimated at the enormous sum of $137,-681,925. The German government pays a little over $225 14 for each of its soldiers, of whom it has about 412,000, costing the Empire $92 764 603. Italy pays less than $181 20 a head for her soldiers, who number in all, 230,000, and her total army charge $87,176,085. The Austrian army seems to be intrinsically the cheapest of those kept up by the great powers. Each man in it is supposed to cost only $174 30, which, for an army of 273 600, gives a total of $47,705,914.

To these sums might have been added the amount annually expended by the great powers upon naval armaments, which may be roughly stated at $6 000000 for England, $5 000 000 for France, $24,000 000 for Russia, $7,800 000 for Germany and Austria, and $3 000 000 for Austria, making a total of $135 000 000.

Statistics account, as M de Girardin points out, the present situation of Europe can scarcely be better described than in the words of Montesquieu, who wrote in 1748: "The state of affairs in the Monarchies of Europe: it has seized our princes, and has made them keep up an inordinate number of troops. The disease has its paroxysms, and necessarily its remissions; for as soon as these exertions are made the increased the number of what it calls its troops, this remedy immediately produces the effect of the disease, and the good effects which are daily springing from them, are not inclined to look with their children's eternal salvation by sending them to godless schools, even though free in all while the respectable portion of the non-Catholics, who are fast becoming convinced of the evils of the public school system, will hardly be inclined to support them because the Bible, and Moody and Sankey's dogmas!, no school, and not of the curriculum. Verily the days of Puritan supremacy and intolerance are fast passing away.—Mollet's Illustrated Weekly.

THE THREE KINGS.

Three kings came riding from far away,
Melchoir and Gaspar and Balthazar;
Three wise men out of the East were they,
And they traveled by night and slept by day,
For their guide was a beautiful, wonderful star.

The star was so beautiful, large and clear
That all the other stars of the sky
Became a white mist in the atmosphere,
And the wise men knew that the coming was near
Of the Prince foretold in the prophecy.

Three caskets they bore on their saddle-bows,
Three cassets of gold with golden keys;
Their robes were of crimson silk, with rows
Of bells and pomegranates and fleurdelyses,
Their turbans like blossoming almond trees.

And so the three kings rode into the West,
Through the dusk of night over hills and dells;
And sometimes they suddenly sank the star,
And sometimes talked, as they passed in rest,
With the people they met at the wayside wells.

"Of the child that is born," said Balthazar,
"Good people, I pray you, tell us the news,
For we in the East have seen His star,
And have ridden far—and have ridden far,
To find and worship the King of the Jews."

And the people answered: "You ask in vain;
We know of no king but Herod the Great!"
They thought the wise men were men insane,
As they spurred their horses across the plain
Like riders in haste and endless quest.

And when they came to Jerusalem,
Herod the Great, who had heard this thing,
Sent for the wise men and questioned them;
And said: "Go down unto Bethlehem
And bring me tidings of this new king."

So they rode away; and the star stood still,
The only one in the gray of morn;
Yea, it stopped, it stood still of its own free will,
Right over Bethlehem on the hill,
The city of David where Christ was born.

And the three kings rode through the gate and the guard,
Through the silent street, till their horses turned
And stopped as the star stood still and stared—
But the windows were closed and the doors were barred,
And only a light in the stable burned.

And cradled there in the scented hay,
In the air made sweet by the breath of kine,
The little child in the manger lay—
The child that would be King one day
Of a kingdom not human, but divine.

His mother, Mary of Nazareth,
Sat watching beside His bed of straw—
Watching the even flow of His breath,
For the joy of life and terror of death
Were mingled together in her awe.

They laid their offerings at His feet;
The gold was their tribute to a King;
The frankincense, with its odor sweet,
Was for the priesthood, the Paraclete,
The myrrh for the body's burying.

And the mother wondered and bowed her head,
And sat as still as a statue of stone;
Her heart was troubled, yet comforted,
Remembering what the angel had said
Of an endless reign and of David's throne.

Then the kings rode out of the city gate,
With the star in their train, and followed it fast,
Rejoicing to find their journey late
Had ended in peace, and their anxious hearts
And returned to their homes by another way.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

A CRUSADER'S CHURCH.

The London Athenæum says that Lieut. Kitchener has sent home an account, with plans, of a newly-discovered Crusaders' church near the Mount of Olives. The following is an extract from a report just received from Jerusalem on these and other points:

"The road from the Mount of Olives to Bethany crosses a narrow ridge of rock which joins the Mount of Olives to the hill above Bethany; on this narrow strip the remains of a church have been found and discovered, dating probably from the twelfth or thirteenth century. Tradition has long pointed out the spot as the place where our Lord mounted the ass for His triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The church itself is an almost square block of masonry or rock covered with paintings! it measures four feet three inches by three feet six inches, by three feet ten inches high, and its position in the ridge is curious, being on the north side, probably between two columns of the nave. Tnis square block is supposed to be either a relic, a relicine, or a portion of the rock cut out and ornamented, being the exact place where our Lord mounted the ass. The paintings, of which pen and ink sketches have been sent home, are well described by Mr. Drake as figured. On the south side is the raising of Lazarus; on the north are the disciples following the ass, the first one bears a sword, another of persons standing in a row, but it is too much defaced to make out clearly. It is to the west that the most interesting remains, though, if he does expect strangers, friends or foes, he will receive them kindly."

"One question more, Judy, and we part for this night," said D'Arcy hurriedly, and with rising anger, "How does Fergus?"

"To be sure we must not forget should treat his sister, sooruseen," Judy, showing more confidence into the reply than she had yet ventured to do, "Fergus is well, and has grown strong like a young bullock. He will presently be able to follow the chase, and to ride a horse without a saddle."

"Ha! ha! old woman, you cannot deceive me," cried D'Arcy. I know more than you fancy I know. Enough; you have no confidence to me. Think seriously upon this. You yourself will not gain by it, and you will not lose by it. Remember, I am the same, and will be found the same, as you look so dark at it. They say there are reasons for your taking a strange one, though the other had been with us for years. But Saint Columb! you are changed wonderfully, now. Many long years have passed, and many troubles have gone over my head—though, thank heaven, I am the Virgin, I am now comfortable with Connel—since I dandled you in my arms. You old not prom.-e then, God bless the man! to be the dark, strong man that you are now. May the same God bless you, and preserve you from any evil sight, but you are changed beyond my recollection!—Too Lord be praised, who would think that the weak infant

And the sheelnauls old creature would have continued to praise the manner of her finger until, for now she was on a theme too much related to her own heart, in an Irishwoman, had not D'Arcy interrupted her.

At the same time, taking from his side pocket some gold pieces, he put them into the old woman's hand.

"Judy, my friend," said Judy, it is but a small thing. It is only an earnest of what I feel bound to give you for your former kindness to me."

"Well," said Judy, "I will keep it but not from any love of your gold. Take it to yourself again—though if you look at cross, once, I will keep it for your sake."

"Hold it to the poor, or to the priest, Judy," said D'Arcy, suddenly, "if it be not that you do with it. But you must take it. Now, my friend, we must be time wears fast. I must be with O'Reilly. You know I am not in the shelter under Connel's roof. Tell me—your son will serve me, Judy—tell me, were those strangers sent for the last few days?"

The suddenness of the question surprised Judy. She had not time to consider how far the speaker was interested in her answer, or far from the way shining she owed more kindness, and for whom he fel- more pity, would be the answer.

"I know of none," she stammered out at a hazard.

"Tell me, then," said D'Arcy, quickly, "does Connel expect any?"

"I don't know his mind," said Judy, "although, if

THE CHINESE QUESTION AND THE EASTERN PRESS.

It must be evident to anyone who pays attention to the writings of the Eastern press upon the Chinese question, that there is some indisposition at work which neutralizes the exertions of the people on the coast, and maintains a false idea about the antagonism to coolie labor. For the misrepresentation of those who, like D. O. MILLS, make money out of the Mongolian hordes, we are, of course, prepared; and we can reply to them by simply pointing out where considerations of self-interest come in. Every man is willing to plead his own cause before the bar of public opinion, and no those who derive profit from the presence of the Chinese, either directly by employing them, or indirectly by lowering the wages of white men, will naturally try to prove that the degraded and purported labor is a great blessing to the country. But any person gifted with ordinary intelligence will at a glance discover the partizan and unreliable nature of such pleadings, and estimate them at their proper value. Where, however, newspapers laying claim to independence, and wielding immense influence upon public sentiment in the East, take up the same perverse ideas and give them the form of editorial endorsement, it is plain there must be some hidden motive impelling them to do so—some secret spring which presses them in that direction. We believe their conduct can only be accounted for by the lavish outpouring of money on the part of persons who are concerned in the maintenance of the Chinese system.

[illegible] who are instructed to, and liberally paid for, using every means to defeat the efforts of the friends of the white workingmen. The Chinese are infinitely better organized and go about their work in a more business manner than the Caucasian labor party in California. They do not indulge in wild talk or make threats against anybody. They put their money where it will do the most good, and the Americans do their wire pulling in Washington and elsewhere. The result of this prudent policy is that their side of the case is far the better understood and far better advocated throughout the East than the cause of the Americans and work ingmen. There is only one way to counteract the mischievous propaganda, and that is by getting an authoritative pronouncement of opinion from the representatives of our people in our State Senate and Assembly, and forwarding it without delay to the National Capital. We earnestly trust that our legislators will take this advice and act upon it promptly. They can well aware that a power is growing up in this city and throughout the State which will do serious harm, perhaps irremediable mischief, to the prosperity of the community, if some means are not taken to restrain its use by the presence of the Mongolians. This is a most serious matter, and we fear its gravity is not sufficiently recognized by the Federal Government. It is beyond controversy that if the authorities at Washington ignore the openly and plainly expressed wishes of the people of the Pacific Coast, no effort will be made to remedy the grievance complained of by violence, and scenes may be enacted which would forever disgrace San Francisco and California. If the paling humanitarianism which the present Administration seems to prefer to patriotism, is allowed to guide the conduct of the Government towards this State, we fear loyalty will be at a discount before long. Again we call upon our legislators, Assemblymen and Senators, to do their part by protesting against the falsehoods and misrepresentations of the advocates of coolie slave labor. They could not begin the New Year better than by passing a strongly-worded resolution on the matter.

[illegible]THANKS.—We return many sincere thanks to Rev. Father Lake Tormey, of Carson City, for his courtesies on behalf of THE MONITOR, and his generous remittance. His willingness to lend a helping hand to the spread of Catholic journalism is not a bad indication of his zeal and as tively in the sacred cause of holy faith. The Sisters tender their hearty thanks to the patrons of the Fair for the generous courtesy with which they lent their aid to the ladies who collected donations. Also to the ladies who had charge of the tables, and to the following gentlemen through whose active and efficient services such unexpected success has been attained: Messrs. Agnew, Regan, Fay, Carew, Gadsby, Hall, and Hill, assistance of Jas Mason.

Favors likewise are gratefully acknowledged from Mr. Murray of Lakeville, Mr. Barron of Mount Eden, and Mrs Griffin of Truckee, all of whom enclosed a check, awarded to the Fair large quantities of provisions for the entertainment table.

The Sisters desire to express their sincere thanks to Gustave Mahl for a case of champagne donated daily during the Fair; to Mr. Brunner, of Platt's Hall, for courteous attentions, liberal allowances on bill, and a donation of $30; to the Spring Valley Gas Light Company, for a liberal discount on gas bill.

It is gratifying to remark that valuable and appreciated donations from other sources were too numerous to mention, as would be desired if space allowed.

Messrs. KEAN & O'LEARY, who characterize kindness, provided gratuitously the brandy and cider for the orphans' Carnival supper.

To each one of their kind benefactors the Sisters and orphans very cordially wish a happy and prosperous New Year.

An Honest Indian Agent.

[From the Portland Catholic Sentinel, Dec. 19.]

Major Edmund Mallet, agent for the Indians of the Talmlp Agency, Washington Territory, who resigned some months since, left for his home in Oswego, New York, a few days ago. After spending some time in Victoria he proceeded to San Francisco on the steamship "City of Panama." Intelligent, energetic, upright and courteous, Major Mallet made an enviable record as an Indian agent, and it was with regret that his many friends there, as well as the Indians of the several reservations comprised in the agency, parted with him.

From a correspondent we learn that the Major's parting with the Indians at Talmlp was very affecting; the Indians wrapping at the last every Chinese immigrant in the arms of two hundred and fifty dollars, is also excellent, and there is very little doubt it would put an end to the coolie difficulty altogether. The Australian colonies, when threatened with a Mongolian invasion, did something of the same kind, and saved their country from disaster, if not from positive ruin. We should not hesitate to follow their example when our vital interests are menaced by the same danger. Even the Constitution should not be allowed to stand in the way of a complete settlement of this serious question.

Presentation.

The Rev. M. D. Slattery, now pastor of Napa and its missions, on his departure for his new field of labor was made the recipient of a check for a very handsome amount, presented by the gentlemen of St. Mary's parish, Sacramento, where the Rev. gentleman has been for the past few years an excellent pastor, and by his teachings and example as a Catholic priest, and his genial disposition in social life, has made for himself hosts of friends, who availed themselves of this opportunity to show their appreciation of his services while among them, and to congratulate him on a promotion his great ability so eminently qualifies him to fill. The good people of Napa may congratulate themselves by the acquisition of Father Slattery. The worthy residents of Napa, too, should be congratulated upon receiving such a devoted and able pastor. We are certain the interests of religion and morality will be well promoted by Father Slattery in his new field of labor.

We regret very much that a paragraph, originating in one of the daily papers, which did not give to W. S. O'Brien, Esq., due credit for his manifold donations to public charities, crept into the columns of THE MONITOR through inadvertence last week. Its untruthfulness was made manifest by the acknowledgment from Bishop Francis, of the Female Orphan Asylum, which appeared in two issues past, and is made further apparent by the list from Rev. Father Crokx, of the San Rafael Orphanage, which is printed in our pages to-day. Mr. O'Brien never parades his benevolence, and it is only just to him to say that he much than fulfills the obligations imposed upon him by his wealth and position.

Hon. J. R. Lathrell's Resolution Concerning the Chinese Evil.

In the House of Representatives, December 10, Mr. Lathrell, on leave, introduced the following joint resolution relative to Chinese immigration, and modification of the "Burlingame treaty:"

Whereas, under the provisions of the treaty made between the United States and China known as the "Burlingame treaty," which took effect February 6, 1870, all Americans agree: Chinese immigration were no longer restricted, and immigration into the United States of the most degraded of the subjects of that vast and populous empire was not only permitted but encouraged; an unprecedence of nearly eight years has clearly demonstrated that the workings of these provisions of that treaty have been disastrous to the laboring classes of our Pacific States and Territories; have tended seriously to retard rather than develop the resources of that much favored country; have brought there hebs of thousands of servile coolies, establishing a system of slavery in our midst more pernicious and degrading than ever before known to the history of the world:

With these slaves come hordes of abandoned women of the same class, of the lowest and most degraded cast, who are bought and sold like cattle in the market, and hired out for the vile purposes of prostitution, polluting every city, village and hamlet of the land, degrading the youth and tainting the moral atmosphere of our communities.

These slaves, owned by organizations known as the "Six Companies," are maintained upon a mere pittance, not exceeding ten cent. per head per day, one-half of which and are, hired for wages upon which a free man would absolutely starve.

With this system of slavery, free labor cannot compete. The individual coolie has no family to support, no interest in the community with that which affords him bare subsistence; while, upon the other hand, the ambition of the free laborer is to build up himself a home, and rear therein a family, which ruling idea is the very spirit of our system of government. This and he can never subsist in competition with servile labor. Whose laboring men and women complain to employers of the insufficiency of their wages, they are told to look at what that Chinamen will board themselves and work for forty cents per day. Every industry suffers by this all-pervading competition with the degraded coolie, whose deficiency of education and social habits, unskilled labor, whose mind, however, is not improved by his new associations. Hideous to his prejudices, his presence is regarded as a positive affliction to our theory of government, our laws and our religion.

For this blighting curse there is no compensation, and for those reasons the people of the Pacific States and Territories demand, in behalf of the laboring man and the welfare of the country—in behalf of our race, civilization and good morals—protection from the degrading effects of Chinese or coolie slavery.

It is the duty of the representatives of the people to remove the evil; therefore,

Be it solved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That its treaty-making power of this government is earnestly requested to take immediate steps to modify our treaty with China so to absolutely prevent the further importation of servile Chinese subjects in our shores.

It is a matter of much debate whether the amendment or abrogation of the Burlingame Treaty would have any effect upon Chinese immigration. Some persons assert that, inasmuch as all the Mongol hordes who come to our shores take advantage of the treaty, which took effect February 6, 1870, all barriers against the immigration into the United States of the most degraded of the subjects of that vast and populous empire was not only permitted but encouraged; an experience of nearly eight years has clearly demonstrated that the workings of these provisions of that treaty have been disastrous to the laboring classes of our Pacific States and Territories; have tended seriously to retard rather than develop the resources of that much-favored country; have brought there hebs of thousands of servile coolies, establishing a system of slavery in our midst more pernicious and degrading than ever before known to the history of the world.

Belligerent Protestants.

The Protestant church of St. James', at Hatcheon, London, an edifice recently rendered famous by the proceedings of Rev. Mr. Tooth—was on Sunday, December 9th, the theater of a riot. At the morning service the church was nearly filled by persons who were strangers to the locality, and who appeared to approve of the manner of conducting the service, the hood and stole of the officiating clergyman, the swinging of censers, the intoning of psalms, the crucifix, candles and flowers upon the altar, and generally the use of Catholic emblems of devotion and the imitation of Catholic ceremonial. Round about the church outside a force of three hundred roughs were disposed, and the procession turned out to be anything but needless, for just as the service was concluded, and the mass of the congregation came pouring out, a rush of men made a push through the ranks of the police, dashed into the church in the face of the astonishing crowd, and proceeded to smash choirs, benches, and shelves in pieces, while ladies shrieked and fainted, and panic reigned supreme inside and out. It took the police some time to clear the church of the rioters. After that came the troublesome task of clearing the street. It is said to be able to say that no life was lost in the conflict, for the sight of a crucifix sets upon an orthodox British Protestant as the sight of a scarlet coat on a wanted bull, and we know how the latter scientific is in the habit of conducting himself when he feels that he has cause to be out of temper.—Dublin Weekly News, December 15

Santa Inez College, Santa Barbara County.

Conducted by the Christian Brothers.

This institution is located on a beautifully wooded plain on the east bank of the Santa Inez river. It is admirably sheltered by the San Rafael mountains, a chain only a few miles in a direct line from the Pacific Ocean, and about twelve miles from Gaviota Landing. The Parkins line of steamers, the only regularly at Gaviota. For salubrity the climate is unsurpassed, and the scenery in the vicinity is most beautiful. The Brothers have just taken charge of the institution at the request of the Grand Most Rev. Archbishop. But a small number of students can be received, and they must be from eight to sixteen years of age. For further particulars apply at St. Mary's College.

CHRISTMAS TREE FESTIVAL.

St. Domitile's boys' and girls' Sunday School held their Christmas Tree Festival last Monday at Aldack's Hall, Bush street, near Dupont.

The Festival opened with prayer. Then were sung by the scholars hymns suitable for the occasion. Next in order were literary exercises, speeches, recitations, etc. Then came the stripping of the Christmas tree of the toys, books and religious mementoes attached, and the distributing of them to the Sunday School scholars, of whom there were about two hundred and fifty present. The whole affair passed off pleasantly, the children enjoying the fun hugely.

TELEGRAPHIC JOTTINGS.

—The New York Herald's London special of December 30 says: A great anti-Russian meeting, composed largely of workingmen, was held yesterday afternoon in Trafalgar Square. This was made a pretext for a pro-Russian gathering in other part of the same place. Each of the crowds possessed all the elements of a mob, and the display of three Turkish flags in the first assemblage precipitated an attack by the second. More than six thousand people were present. The collision was so great at the Turkish meeting that speaking could not be heard. The Russian flag suddenly appeared in the crowd, and a fierce fight, lasting one hour and five minutes, ensued, led by a stout faced man, who bowled like a Heebi-Bazouk. The Anglo-Turks charged en masse upon the Russian party. The standard-bearer was soundly thrashed, and the Muscovite flag destroyed. The forces of the horny-handed friends of the Czar soon rallied, and they drove by assault the position held by the Turkish police-barriers behind one of the Edward Landseer's lions. The reserves pressed on to support the assaulting party that a retreat was impossible. It was a serious business, however, for the men in front. The Turkish standards were totally destroyed, and the victors glared for a few moments at the seething crowd before them, apparently anxious to know if there were any of the obnoxious flags near at hand. The wounded were not butchered. They were only jumped upon playfully, and kicked about the face and head. The assemblage soon broke up, a majority audibly Turkish that the Russophiles were compelled to withdraw. As the minority slowly disengaged itself from the mighty, received cheers burst forth from the triumphant Turkish party, cheering soon became tumultuous, and thousands joined in the shouting to the scene out of Mr. Marin's Lane, the Strand, Cockspur street and Whitehall. Red flags a foot square were waved from sticks, or held aloft upon canes. New flags were procured from some neighboring locality, and the British and Turkish sentiment over the streets echoed upon tall staves side by side. It was a peaceful demonstration, and resulted the stormy scenes immediately preceding and following Guildhall. The police interfered three hours after the meeting had been dissolved, and two arrests were made. Nobody of any prominence was present, and the meeting has no political significance.

—The London Observer of December 30 says: We believe the Government, up to a late date, intended, immediately upon the reassembling of Parliament, to introduce a series of resolutions declaring certain general principles in regard to the attitude to be taken by the Executive in connection with the Russo-Turkish war, and specifying in what way those principles were to be applied. If Parliament approved the resolutions, the Government meant to occupy Gallipoli, and to act accordingly, but to obtain vantage ground with a view to possible contingencies. How far this programme may be still followed, of course depends on the next fortnight's events.

—A special dispatch to the Daily News of December 30 from Plymouth reports that the whole Channel fleet, and all commissioned ships under repairs, have been ordered to be ready for sea by January 15.

—The New Times, of St. Petersburg, reproduces various reports current in foreign newspapers that England intends to occupy Gallipoli, Constantinople and Bosphorus. The New Times considers all this equivalent to a declaration of war.

—The Agence Russe adds that the British Government has not yet decided what the measures would be, but they cannot be those stated by the New Times, as it would be impossible to take such measures without a declaration of war. Relative to reports concerning English mediation, the Agence Russe points out that according to international law mediation is only possible when accepted by both belligerents. Russia, though always ready to treat, has never overthrown the Porte might address to her and will do everything to show that she had any intention of attempting mediation.

—The London Times' Paris correspondent of December 30th says: Any exaggerated construction at first placed on the conference undertaken by England, ceased some days ago, and the Powers are now fairly launched into the war. Happily it is to be known at night that England simply accepted the invitation to the Conference as to whether she would accept peaceful overtures, to be made by Turkey."

—LONDON, December 29.—Give no credence to rumors of early peace on any terms short of extinction of the Ottoman Power. The indecisive contests continue abundant that the Russians intrude on gain her point, even at the risk of a war with England. The object of Todt is the meaning of the Czar's call for another million of men. Ignatieff is the real Lord Derby in his attempts at peace. He is willing to grant terms, Russia may possibly yield her purpose to negotiate directly with Turkey, or not at all. But the Russian Czar is by the Czar on army of the Balkan indicates his intention to be ready to guard himself in the event of war with England. The is indeed evidence of his intentions and what possible contingency he anticipates. Meantime, private information is received that active preparations in public are now being made in England directly to be pressed as rapidly as the weather permits. There will be no new campaign, but a prolongation of the present one, until Turkey falls irretrievably.

—The Chicago Journal's Washington special of December 31 says: The few Democratic Senators here ritually discredit the so-called antibushy announcement by Bayard. Washington that the Democrats have decided to sustain the President's nominations as against Cooklin, Kellogg and Chamberlain unprobably and incongruous. It is said on the other hand that Bayard not actuated by high motives. Democrats have a certain number of Democratic votes. Some of Secretary Matthews' friends declare that he will be a candidate for Congress from Cincinnati, and that the President will use his influence to elect him, being anxious to have him in Congress.

—The Chicago Journal's Washington special of December 31 says: A Republican Congressman proposes to introduce a resolution in the House calling upon the President for information regarding the opinion of Attorney-General Devens, and to have been given last April when the Hawley Commissioners were in New Orleans arranging a compromise between the political parties. It is charged the Commission sent a dispatch to the President asking the opinion of the Administration as to what would be a fair basis for legislation. The President submitted the question to Attorney-general Devens, and he furnished the President with a written opinion, which was submitted to a full Cabinet and approved by them, and then telegraphed to the Commission, which proceeded to recognize the Legislature upon the basis proposed. The opinion now prevalent was that fourteen Republican members of the Legislature should be unseated and their places given to Democrats who claimed to have been elected, and that five Democratic members should withdraw and their places given to be filled by Republicans. This is a statement made by a Republican Congressman, who says he knows the inside of all that transpires.

—The Chairman and several prominent members of the House Committee on Appropriations have returned to Washington, and are industriously engaged in gathering and preparing information for use in the preparation of the annual appropriation bills, several of which are to be ready for action soon after the reassembling of Congress. The following are the expenditures contemplated on the Pacific Coast: Oakland harbor, $200 000; Wilmington harbor, $50,000; Sacramento and Feather rivers, $20,000; Lower Willamette and Columbia rivers, from Portland to the sea, $150,000; Upper Willamette, $50 000; Upper Columbia and Snake rivers, $50,000; canal at the Dalles, Columbia river, $500 000; for fortifications at Fort Point, $100 000; Alcatraz, $50,000; Benicia, $50 000; Mare Island Navy Yard, general repairs on building and grounds, $7 850. No specific estimates are made for work at this or any other Navy Yard, but the Department has authorized the expenditure of money contributed by its various bureaus among the Navy Yards throughout the country as occasions may arise. The estimate for the dock site in the California Surveyor-General's office is $2,000,000. The Department earnestly urges this and similarly increased amounts for Oregon and the Pacific Coast Territories as indispensable to bring up arrears of business. The estimates for maintenance of the Naval force and their salaried employés, on the Pacific Coast are in accordance with the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year. The Secretary, however, transmits information that the estimates for the Naval Station at San Francisco require an increase of $500 for fuel, $600 for lubricating, and $1,140 for watchmen, etc. The Secretary recommends an appropriation of $276,000 for wages of workmen and engineers, and $125 000 for the purchase of materials and incidental expenses of the San Francisco Mint. The estimates of the Carson Mint are the same as last year, namely, $80,000 for wages and $12,000 for materials and incidental expenses.

—General Dorcohesbout, Chief of the Ministry, in receiving the Mayor of Bordeaux January 2nd, emphatically d clared that neither his Ministry nor his Cabinet ever contemplated a coup d'etat.

—The London Post of January 2d publishes a paragraph in an official form to the effect that the Cabinet yesterday by unanimous assumed that Russia's answer had shaken the peace to overtures. The paragraph points out that England, when communicating the Russian answer to the Porte, will be requested to accompany it with advice; therefore, it will be very material for England before taking this step to inquire as to the conditions which Russian commanders have been instructed to demand. It is understood that Russia has replied that she will accept peace overtures, to be made by Turkey."

—The Pope has authorized Cardinal Chigi to negotiate with Great Britain for the removal of the existing difficulties which divide the Catholic Hierarchy in Scotland.

—The New York Herald's correspondent at Rome telegraphed that Gamberta had an interview with Minister Decazes on Sunday which probably he accorded an audience by King Victor Emanuel.

—A dispatch from Rome of December 28 says: Nobody believes that the present Ministerial arrangement will be permanent. It is said that Rattazzi has consented to a dissolution of Parliament.

Produce Market Report.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 3d, 1878.

The closing days of December furnished comparatively little throughout our visitors, and where the produce could not previously turn his furrows he is now enabled to give out now the seed to his heart's content. Already more acreage has been planted in grain than ever before. Much of the grain is well up and everything is now exceedingly promising for the husbandman. Until within a week past we have had a very warm winter, but the past few nights have been previous cold with many white frosts, and even ice covers the pools of standing water.

FLOUR—We quote current prices as follows: Superfine at $3@3 75; Extra Superfine, $3 25@3 75; Extra Family and Bakers, Extras, $3 50@3 75 white for family-dressed Extras, such as Stockton Gem, Golden Gate, Genesee, National City Mills, Sperry's Stockton City Mills, Starr Mills Vallejo, command the extreme of the local market; and $4 (bbl) 25 per bbl cash in store afloat or else)

WHEAT—Our receipts and exports of this grain for the first six months of the harvest year show a very considerable falling off as compared with the corresponding period last season, the exports of 1877 being unprecedented. The farmers of the Pacific slope are a peculiar people, and many of them are very wealthy, and will not part with their grain in ware houses until well assured of position rates of a good harvest in the near future. We have only the following sales to record: 600 ctls Oregon shipping on the wharf at $1 42½; 800 ctls Chilean, on private terms; 1,400 ctls shipping alongside, $2 37½; 300 ctls Sonora, $2 42 50. Liverpool quotations Jan. 3d, 12s 6d@12s 10d on average; 12s 10½ for choice; Imports 41 000 sacks of 100 pounds each from Portland; Exports 1,000 sacks to Victoria and 1,000 sacks to Nanaimo; 1,000 sacks shipping, $2 35; 1,500 ctls superfine, $2 35; 3,000 ctls do, $2 37½.

BARLEY—The market continues very sluggish, partly by reason of the uncertainty of all stock supply entitled to the export trade, and perhaps also partly by reason of the coming harvesting. We have only to note sales as follows: 1,000 ctls fair light Chevalier, Yerba Buena, $1 42½; 800 ctls dark Coast feed, $1 40; 1,300 ctls fair Bay harvesting, $1 40.

OATS—We continue to draw our chief supplies from the North. The market is accordingly quiet and prices rather weak, ranging according to quality: Select 800 ctls Coast feed at $1 90 per central.

CORN—The market remains as before, well supplied with new crop Southern, the only yield of local importance of late years, considering the expanse of the season's planting. We note sales as follows: 600 ctls large Yellow at $1 37½ @ ctl; 600 ctls do at $1 37½ @ ctl; 1,000 ctls small round, $1 70.

RYE—The receipts are light. Sales from the wharf good at $1 37½, from store, $1 40@1 50 asked.

BUCKWHEAT—We quote: Fair, 1½@1½c Wanted.

MIDDLINGS—Wheat, brown, 2@2½c; Chandler, 2½@3c; Barley, 1½@2c; Timothy, 6@8 ½ c.

BUCKWHEAT—Is quoted at 2½@2¾c actual at $1 50 with a sale of 500 ctls at this rate.

BRAN AND MIDDLINGS—The spell price is ruling low, $17 50@18 50 ton, respectively.

CORNMEAL—We quote from ground California at $2 per 100 lbs and for Eastern at $2 50.

OIL CAKE MEAL—The mill price is $44 ₱ ton, for sales from store prices are higher.

GROUND BARLEY—The mill price is $20@ ₱ ton.

HAY—The supply is imported free, and the market very firm at $17@18 for common stock; $17@18 for good, and $19@20 a ton for choice.

BEANS—The market is firm, with an upward tendency. We quote Bayos, 4½c; Butter, 3½@3 White, small, 4½@5c; Pea, White, 4½@5c; Lima, 4½@5c; Pink, 4½@5c; Red, 4½c.

POTATOES—Are very scarce and tendency to rise. We quote Early Rose, Sacramento, at 1½@1½c; Early Rose, Petaluma, 1½@1½c; Early Rose, Stockton, 1½@1½c; Burbanks, 1½@1½c; Peerless, 1½@1½c; Garnet Chile, 1½@1½c; Reds, 1½@1½c; Sweets, 1½@1½c; Rivers, 1½@1½c; Early Goodrich, 1½@1½c; Snowflakes, 1½@1½c; Mercers, 1½@1½c; Peachblows

THE OLD YEAR'S VINDICATION.

The Year was ready to die;
He deemed that his work was done,
When he heard the world's unending cry
Arise as the voice of one:
So he gathered his breath for a last reply
To all that assailed the sun.

To the Rich he sternly said:
"False waiters, silent be!
I grudge not the fruit of hand or head,
But not of my gifts, give ye,
That so, when you come to die hour you dread,
You will not be loath for me."

And then to the Poor he spoke:
"I never have earned your bale!
Who e'er fell beneath the crushing stroke
Of a hand not ruthless Fate,
I heeded up the heart when the forgot broke,
Though slowly, out all too late."

He said to a hopeless Lover:
"Chide not with me, poor soul,
For how could my stirring flight discover
The Rose heart's lying goal?
And have I not wove a date to honor
Where none else deep waters roll?"

To a Poet then he said:
"Thy shaft of blame has erred;
I sang you sad (see ruby brow),
And have I not kept my word?
As I rose not neither crossed nor dead,
With a mere thin lay from sheltered."

Yet, because then hast kept the faith
In good, though ill was ill,
And to cause that hast sought to make it such,
Though thine own was deeper still,
My spirit, promised by dying, saith,
Mortal high as the sacred Hill."

In a whisper he spoke once more,
When his life was ebbing fast:
Hoped, when my winged hour was wafted o'er
Some believe of all the past,
I have brought thee sooner that tranquil shore
Where no faith need meet at last.

Therefore, give earnest heed
To these latest words of mine—
Vain for Labor to wrench seed,
Vain for Wisdom to scatter seed,
Vain for Valor to sweep and bleed,
Vain to strive but vain to die,
If He whose One is eternity
Withhold the second Eden."

ALDERSHOT, Feb. 21-22, '77.

DEAR PADDY—I received your letter, and is gave me great pleasure to know that you and your wife are in good health and do beg, sir, I would be very happy to hear from you if you would send me a paper with as much as the newspaper will hold conveniently, hoping you will have a good funeral and a fine day. I want you to let me know all things concerning the room.

Dear Paddy, as regards Hennessy, I am very glad he wasn't on smoke for you. He wrote to me asking me to give him a note to get it from you, and I told him I wanted it myself, and if any one was to get it you were the map, if it were only in remembrance of me; besides you deserve whatever he may get. I am determined to use it myself, and if there is any possibility of getting it back I will bring one, and I am going on furlough.

Dear Paddy, you need not be afraid but I will make away with any letter that is of any consequence. I will burn them when I read them. I want you to let me know how John O'Sullivan is getting on, and also John O'Connor, and if they are in good health, and all things concerning the same, how things are going on, and if there are any improvements going on since I left home, and how are my members.

Dear Paddy, I was only given three weeks' leave. Above is what I got the week again. He cheated about five or six since I left him. Let me know how you are getting on and yr. wife and children also how Bill Lane is, and remember me to him. I am in the best of health myself. I must now conclude, remaining your faithful servant,

JOHN WALSH.

Direction as usual.

God save Ireland.

ALDERSHOT, March 7, '77.

Dear Paddy—I received your letter and am glad to know that you and your wife and child are in good health. I was never so much surprised in my life as I was when I read your letter. I never thought that Bill Lane would be the person to do the disagreeable he did. I had a dream some time ago similar to what you state in your letter the night before I got it.

Dear Paddy, you must not make the best of it now, as you were not time enough for him. At first perhaps the organization would go as just as well. Let me know if he have any of the traps or if they are all safe under your command. Also let me know what did John O'Connor say to it or if any of the head members said anything to him.

Dear Paddy, I got the paper, and am glad to hear that yr had such a good funeral, that is, Colonel O'Mahony's funeral. I suppose you go to Bransby-lane room now. Let me know how are you getting on there, or if you are progressing anything since I left home.

Dear Paddy, I am getting on very well myself. I am stronger I could wish to be. I don't suppose I will see you before next October or November, when I will get a furlough. I must now conclude, remaining your obedient servant,

JOHN WALSH, G. J. Rs.

ALDERSHOT, March 16, '77

Dear Paddy—I received your welcome letter, and I am glad to hear that you and your wife and child are in good health. I am in the best of health myself, thank God for all his goodness. I am glad, very glad, that all the traps are safe and out of all danger. I read all accounts about the O'Mahony demonstration.

Dear Paddy, I am very thankful to you for sending me the papers, and if there was any paper here anyway interesting I would send it to you. Bill Lane took a harder nut to crack than he thought in you. I am very glad that he hasn't got any of the traps as of his society, but I don't half care as long as they are safe. Dear Paddy, I am surprised when I think of Bill Lane asking for the traps after the dagreeable act he done. However, sir, it may be as it for the best. Dear Paddy, I am going to be married on the 4th of April, that's in the town of Aldershot. I got the two papers. I would be very thankful to you if you would send me one of the Irish World paper if you got it now at all. Dear Paddy, I must now conclude, remaining your faithful servant,

JOHN WALSH.

Hoping you will write soon again.

ALDERSHOT, April 22-3, 1877.

Dear Paddy—I received your kind and welcome letter, and am glad to hear that you are in good health, and I am glad to hear the rose me for not writing sooner. I was in hospital the last fortnight. I got a cold, but I am all right now, thank God. I came out on yesterday. I received the paper you sent me, and I am very thankful; and as regards Bill, he did not write to me, and it is all the same if he did. You have the management of the traps, and you can do just as you please. He will have a wall if he will believe. I will mention to get it to him. Dear Paddy, I am not angry for your showing the letters to Bill Lane. I would say the same before his face. Dear Paddy, I said in the letters, so if he write to me will give him an answer; but it's the best of my opinion he is not. I will write to him at all. Dear Paddy, I am very glad to hear that the cause is going on in Ireland, and I suppose

NEWS FROM IRELAND.

LEINSTER.

DUBLIN.

On December 1st Aldermen Tarpey was reelected Mayor of Dublin.

On December 1st two Brazes belonging to the steamer "Tralee," lying at John Rogerson's quay, Dublin, accidentally fell into the river when about stepping to the quay. Two sailors named William Gaynor and William Lawlis, belonging to the ship "Adelaide," succeeded, after about ten minutes, in getting the men out of the water, but they were in such an exhausted state that they died before they reached Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, to which they were promptly conveyed. The names of the drowned men were James Horan, a native of Belfast, aged 30 years, and Arthur Craven, a native of Dublin, aged 50 years.

The Nation of December 8th says: "The movement for erecting a public memorial of Balfe, the great composer, in Dublin, has, we are ashamed to say, had anything but a successful issue. At a meeting of the memorial committee, held a few days ago, it was stated that there was only £60 to the credit of the fund! Could anything be more, at least, obscure have been subscribed long ago. Making the best of the matter, the commendable have received, in accordance with a wish expressed by Madame Balfe, to place a bust of her illustrious husband in the National Gallery, and at once to select a sculptor of eminence to execute the design. It is to be hoped that no Irish sculptor will be chosen."

WEXFORD.

A meeting of the Wexford Corporation was held in the Town Hall on December 1st, for the purpose of closing the Mayor for the ensuing year. Town Councillor Wilson proposed the present Mayor, Alderman Walsh, be re-elected for the ensuing year. Town Councillor J. Devereux seconded the motion. Alderman Vizzy having put the motion, it was carried unanimously. The Mayor thanked the Corporation for the honor conferred on him.

KILKENNY.

A special meeting of the Kilkenny Corporation was held on December 1st in the Tholsel, for the purpose of electing a Mayor. The two candidates for the office—Aldermen M'Carthy and Meagher—having been duly proposed and seconded, a poll being demanded was taken, there voted for Mr. M'Carthy 13, and for Mr. Meagher 11. A vote of thanks was then passed to the outgoing ex-Mayor, Arthur M'Mahon, who has rendered opinion from all sides in the community to be dignified conduct during the year of office. The High Sheriffs were then nominated by the Council for next year, the gentlemen selected being Messrs. Thomas A. M'Mahon; George Hamilton Rowan, and Alderman O'Donnell.

A worthy Irishman, Mr. John Brennan, of Clough, departed this life on November 26th, aged 68 years. LIMERICK.

An election of Mayor of Drogheda took place on December 1st, at noon. Up to the last moment uncertainty prevailed as to the "coming man." A large number of burgesses were present in the Council Chamber of the Corporation, and much interest in the coming event was displayed. The result was that Councillor Robert May was elected by a majority of six over Councillor Michael Cullen. On the motion of Mr. Lee, seconded by Mr. Curtis, the names of P. St. George Smith, Esq.; George Keegge, Esq., Ogderry, Louth and Drogheda, respectively; and Thomas McEvoy, Esq., Ballmartine, were unanimously approved of to be submitted for the sheriffalty.

An influentially-attended meeting was held in Drogheda on December 6th, for taking steps to present an address and testimonial to Rev. T. Allen, on the occasion of his removal from St. Mary's, Drogheda, to the pastoral charge of Oldcastle, county Meath.

Some weeks ago the ship "Jessica and Joseph," of Drogheda, Finegan master, coal laden, left Neath for Drogheda. Since then nothing has been heard of vessel or crew, and it is believed that she has foundered at sea. Her owners in Drogheda—Messrs. W. Jones, M. Preston, C. Tighe, W. Kelly and J. Kelly—were unlearned, on that vessel and cargo are a total loss. Notwithstanding this awkward event, they have subscribed a sum of money for the widows and orphans of the lost sailors, which the people of Drogheda are now taking upand swelling with their contribution.

MUNSTER.

The Queenstown Chamber of Commerce was elected on December 5th. It appears that the concern got into debt to the amount of £50 and as the mercantile community of Queenstown would not come to the rescue, Mr. W. Cummins, who had made himself liable for the rent, has closed the doors and removed the furniture.

It is intended to construct a tramway from Bandon to Kilmacsimon, about six and a half miles from the former town, down to the Bandon river, and at the point up to which it is navigable from the sea for ships of any burden. The project is one which was first mentioned two years or so ago by the present owing to some difficulties that cropped up. The right, however, has now been purchased by several of the principal promised standing, who have formed themselves into a company to be called the Irish Steam Tramways Company (Limited); and when some technical matters have been arranged the work will be immediately undertaken.

The exceedingly great quantity of rain that has fallen interferes very much with the hunting season all over the South of Ireland.

There is a proposal to withdraw the contract establishment Spike Island, Cork Harbor, to one side use as a lunatic asylum for neighborhood of Cork. The suggestion emanates from the military authorities of the district.

A medal of the Humane Society was presented at the Cork Police Office, on December 7th, to sub-constable Mansfield, for having saved a child from drowning in the river at Union Quay a short time since. Mr. Tuthington, who made the presentation, remarked that since he had been a Governor of the society he had distributed 160 medals in Cork, and these hearties were awarded to members of the constabulary.

The celebrated Blackwater Fishery case, the Duke of Devonshire vs. Neill, came up on December 4th in the County Court Kenmare, for the 8th time, for trial. The case is by contested case, it is almost unnecessary to repeat once again, that the Duke of Devonshire claims £6-ary on the Blackwater from the sea at Youghal to Lismore.

A great popular demonstration was held in Fermoy on the night of December 8th, when the result of the Casey trial became known. From an early hour in the afternoon preparations were being made for an immense bonfire, and upwards of sixty tar barrels were produced, as well as old boats, canoes and divers other materials combustible, which were consigned to the flames. At eight o'clock the pyre was ignited, and numerous small bonfires were lighted in the city, and was visible for many miles. Shortly after the inhabitants began to turn out and cheer after cheer testified their sentiments on the new verdict in an unmistakable and popular triumph. Having formed a torch-light procession, and listened to the remarks of a number of speakers, the multitude dispersed quietly as the fire abated. In Mallow and Killworth the street was also illuminated in a substantial popular demonstration, and the bills were ablaze with bonfires. At the meeting of the Killworth Board of Guardians, Mr. W. H. O'Sullivan, M.P., paid a warm tribute to the courage and fortitude with which Mr. Casey had borne the brunt of the poor tenants, and remarked that the result of the trial had settled the land question than all the agitations of the past three years.

LIMERICK.

At a meeting of the solicitors practicing at the Limerick Quarter Sessions Court, held on December 5th, a memorial was received to send a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor, praying that Mr. J. Hardiman be appointed to the office of Registrar to the County Court Judge, on the ground of the great satisfaction and marked ability which he has had for a period of fifteen years, discharged the duties of Deputy Registrar of the Rolls, and adding that, in the interests of the public, to be not represented by a new officer under the Act.

Geoffrey Keating, the historian), one of the old county attorneys, and the last apparently of them, died last week, aged 78 years. Mr. Keating, George Hall, Croom. He was greatly esteemed by the people, a large concourse having accompanied his remains to the ancient churchyard of Tubrid, the burial place of his ancestors. He served his time to old Mr. Worrall, of Limerick."

On December 3d two men were traveling in an ordinary cart along the highroad near Scariff, when the horse took head and dashed forward at a terrific pace. Michael Brennan, who held the reins, was dragged under the animal's legs and literally kicked to death. When subsequently discovered the bowels were protruding, and the body was otherwise horribly disfigured. Death appeared to have been almost instantaneous. The second man, James O'Brien, was violently thrown out of the cart and one of the wheels rolled over his breast and head. He lies in a critical condition.

KERRY.

Mr. Gladstone has replied to the address of the Kerry Tenants' Defence Association. He says: "Whatever measure should arise, while he continues to hold a seat in the House of Commons, when it includes the vital interests of Ireland, will not fail to receive his attention. He will endeavor to be governed in relation to it by the same principles of equity, in application which he esteemed contingent, as he has heretofore sought to apply to the construction of Irish measures.

The life of the late Bishop of Kerry, (Right Rev. Dr. Moriarity), is being written by the Very Rev. Denis Neville, of Cork.

The death is announced suddenly, in Tralee, of Mr. Charles McCarthy, an old and respected resident and classical teacher, who was found dead in his bed in that town on December 3d.

Mr. William T. Nolligan, solicitor, Tralee, on behalf of the Misses Clifford and two sons, who, with a person named Heffernan were charged with the offence, John Mangan, his two sons, and Heffernan were present. It appears that Heffernan, though cautioned, admitted that old Morgan offered him three pounds to perpetrate the deed. The result of the inquiry was that the two young Mangans have been released, while the father and Heffernan have been remanded to the County Jail, where they have been lodged. Heffernan has been committed to the Winter assizes at Cork.

ULSTER.

ANTRIM.

A case, which created a great deal of interest, was investigated at Belfast Police Court, on December 5th, when Mary Ann Bellesh was charged by a branch of the Lord's Day Observance Society with working on the portion of Sunday which is not a work of necessity. The defendants were convicted and fined. An application will be made to the Court of Queen's Bench to set aside the convictions squashed. During the hearing of the case it was given in evidence that two men were brought headed dough into Bellesh's premises last year, because he would buy his cake from a Sabbath-breaker.

Mr. James Montgomery, schoolmaster who was well-known in Belfast as a large employer of labor and a considerable shipowner, died, on December 7th, at his residence, Wolfhill, in the 68th year of his age. CONNAUGHT.

GALWAY.

Archbishop MacHale paid a visit to the Tuam workhouse on 30th November. He was received with great respect and enthusiasm by the paupers, and imparted to them his blessing. He also conversed for some time with the officials, and promised to visit them again in a short time.

A dispute arose in a public house in Maugeard street, Galway, on November 27, between a young blacksmith named John Finneran, whose father keeps a forge in the Claddagh, and some country people. Finneran, when outside the door flung a stone at the persons with whom he had been quarreling, and it struck on the head a man named Michael Lestir, from the village of New Castle, who was only a peaceable spectator on the skirts of the quarrel. He received so severe an injury from the blow that he died, on that morning, from the effects of it on 24 December. Finneran was arrested and awaits his trial for homicide at the coming Winter Assizes.

MAYO.

Mr. Parnell, M.P., and Mr. O'Connor Power, M. P., left Dublin, December 7th, on a visit to Mayo, but there will be no formal meetings, as both gentlemen have decided, in the interest of national unity, not to deliver the speeches of Parliamentary policy pending the meeting of the forthcoming National Conference.

The Foxford new Catholic church is rapidly progressing, and the building now stands over fourteen feet above the surface of the ground. The tower has risen in close jointed rock work of grey granite. The doors, windows and pedestals are in readily cut and chiseled limestone. The building, when complete, will present a handsome appearance. The church is being erected, and on a range with the building, by the second and voluntary subscription of Archbishop, Esq.

CLARE.

Mr. Peter O'Connor, of Cahirsiveen, has presented a piece of land on the site of the Kilgobbin cathedral, at the cost of £2 000. The prominent feature of these belfries is that they are played by automatic machinery, like a barrel organ. Figures of the 12 Apostles and 24 secular airs can be performed. The former include the Adeste Fidelis, Tantum Ergo, O Salutaris, Lauadate and the Te Deum; and the latter include "Ireland's Hell," "Erin go Bragh," "Rule Britannia," "Auld Lang Syne," and such rollicking melodies as "Finnigan's Ball," "Off to Philadelphia," "Will You Follow Me, Mary Anne?" and "Paddy Whack." The people of Sligo are justly proud of their steeples.

On December 7th five men, named respectively Barthy and James Conlon (brothers), Barthy and Michael Cunnaneen (brothers), Thomas Walsh and Peter Walsh, were lodged in the Ennis County Jail, being committed on the charge of having, on November 27, killed a young man named Lestir. It appears that a few nights previously the prisoners and Lestir were at a fair in the village of Corofin, Whitefield. Lestir, in his dispositions, stated that he was struck by the prisoners and others and left the scene insensible. When on his road home he was met by several of those thirty persons, who, he says, were amongst them, and was attacked and beaten by them. He was left with some of the prisoners last night, but when he would not join some secret society.

LEITRIM.

The Rev. Charles O'Farrell, P. P., of Cloone, died November 10th. Father O'Flynn studied at the Grand Seminaire de Bekeuia, where he acquitted that profound knowledge of theology which earned for him the respect not only of his brother priests, but also that of the six Bishops under whom he labored. He was ordained priest on the 22d of December 1827. After his ordination he spent four years on the "French mission." After laboring earnestly as one of Cloone parish he was recalled to his native diocese. Immediately on his return he was appointed curate of Drumshambo, but after a very short time there was removed to Kiltoom, where he remained from 1832 to 1849. In 1849 he was appointed pastor of Cloone, where he labored zealously up to a short time before his death. The manner of his departure at his obsequies on the 10th, not only of the people of his own parish, but also those of the neighboring parishes is a proof of the high esteem in which he was held. High Mass was celebrated by Rev. J. J. Quinn, C. C. (Leitrim), and Rev. David Tiernan, assisted by the Rev. J. J. Dowdall, C. C., Gortlitra, as deacon, and Rev. Thomas Hourihan, C. C., Drumreilly, as sub-deacon. Rev. James Gallagher, Curate-in-Charge, as deacon, acted master of ceremonies.

LECTURE ON THE REAL PRESENCE OF CHRIST
IN THE
Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar.
BY REV. J. A. MOONEY, O. P.

SUBJECT IS REALLY AND SUBSTANTIALLY PRESENT AS TO HIS BODY, BLOOD, SOUL AND DIVINITY, WHOLE AND ENTIRE, IN EVERY VISIBLE CONSECRATED HOST; AND IN EVERY PARTICLE OF EACH FRACTION OF THE HOST WHEN BROKEN; AND, IN LIKE MANNER, IN THE CONSECRATED CHALICE, AND IN EVERY DROP WHICH IS DERIVED FROM THE MASS IN THE CHALICE.

"The bread that I will give, is my flesh for the life of the world."—John, xlvi; 1 Cor. xi.

Beloved Brethren: There is no doctrine of the Catholic Church so strongly and richly surrounded and defended by Scriptural proofs as that of the Real Presence of our Lord in the Holy Eucharist, and yet there is no article of our faith that is so wantonly and bitterly opposed by the enemies of our holy religion. This, our adorable Redeemer, this glorious, life-giving and divine, and so divinesan the members of Christ's body —His Church—that our enemies leave us alone unmolested in order to weaken faith in the great mystery, and rob us of the richest treasure God has left us—Himself under be Eucharistic species. But their efforts are vain and futile. We have only to open the sacred pages of Holy Writ, and argument the most powerful and convincing will shine forth to defend our grandest doctrine and dissipate the quibblings of our heretical enemies. The Fathers of the Church will rally in a solid phalanx to defend the doctrine they so gloriously preached, and which many of them sealed with their blood. Give me, in the explanation of this grand theme, your undivided attention. The subject itself and the arguments I will use, deserve your closest attention. I will enter into the annals of the Church—the storehouse of God's truth to men—and will select the most powerful weapons to defend the most beautiful and consoling of our doctrines, and prejudice and error will have no powerful objections of its opposite. Scripture and tradition, as understood by the infallible Church, are our Rule of Faith. I will place the rule before you in all its simplicity, and you will see how

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

As they are well aware that the solution of the Chinese Immigration and Coolie Labor question is one of the most important—if, indeed, it is not the one of paramount interest to the working classes—on the coast, and to all in its broad bearings, the Republicans are now endeavoring not only to prove upon a clear record for themselves, but also to show that it is the Democratic party which has not a good record on it. A few material facts and arguments from the pen and utterances of the Democratic party and its representatives and leaders, and from the leaders and representatives of the party in opposition to the Democracy, will suffice to convince the reader that the Democratic party has always and consistently a fair or modified record on this vital and foremost question of the campaign—so far as Californian and this whole coast is located—and that the Republican party is in accord with those who would invite and welcome Chinese immigration and extend to the Orient the franchise of suffrage.

In the speech in Platt's Hall, in this city, the chief Republican mouthpiece of the campaign excitingly referred in the action of the California Legislature of 1852, in which it was proposed to introduce Chinese labor in this State on account of its cheapness. He did not mention the fact that that Legislature was composed of a round dozen of Whigs as well as Democrats, and that the Chairman of the Committee which reported favorably on the proposition, R. N. Wood, was a Whig. But he was obliged to admit that it was at last a Democratic authority which defeated it. But there are other facts in connection with the legislation of that day worth any of these impertinences by a understanding of the whole subject, as Mr. Pitch was very careful not to refer to. In the first place, the bill contemplated only a few specific classes of coolies, viz: those who were under contract to labor for a term of years, and who were brought here by the Chinese by the leading Republican statesmen in Congress, February 8, 1870. During a debate on the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, an amendment to it was offered in the United States Senate, as follows:

"But hereafter, no person born in the United States and fortunate not to need, shall not be deemed or made civil or political inferior."

The debate on this amendment was practically, and the Democrats and Republicans took issue strong ground upon it—the latter in opposition to it. Senator Yates of Illinois Rep. said:

"I fully concur, Sir, [Senator] Doolittle, that it would be unwise on this very day, by a vote of twenty-eight States, to have declared that there should be no restriction upon suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. I differ from Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Doolittle] in saying that the Constitution is unalterable as suffrage, pure and simple."

Senator CAMERON of Pennsylvania (Rep. declared himself thus:

"I am in favor of the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because it does not prevent the States from exercising their discretion. Suppose, Sir, a State should say to-morrow, by a vote of two-thirds, that the freedmen who came into Pennsylvania and New York and Indiana and Illinois, and Iowa, and broke the bonds and went into the free States should those States, should be prevented from becoming citizens.

And Senator MORTON of Indiana, who is now here as Chairman of the Chinese and Immigration Committee, and expressed his sentiments in these words:

As the naturalization laws now stand, Chinamen, Japanese, Africans, and all other races of men, may become citizens of the United States only. I believe more than it will be consistent, and it will be harmonious with the principles of our Government to extend by the adoption of this amendment the important and valuable right of voting to those who have not already that nationalization laws.

There can be no other fair interpretation given to the language of Senator MORTON than that he favored the admission of the Chinese to citizenship by negative process of naturalization, just as the alien-born from Europe are admitted to the sacred right. And on the final vote every Republican Senator, with a single exception, voted in favor of the Chinese, and every Democratic Senator voted against their admission to citizenship.

If what we have already presented, of a Legislative, State, Congressional and National character, is not enough to demonstrate to the Democrats to party opposed to the Republican party their Chinese migration, coolie labor and the naturalization of the Chinese, we will add here a few extracts from the utterances of distinguished Republican leaders and the industrial organs of that party to the same purpose.

Ben Wade of Ohio, at Senator, during his visit to California a few years ago, made a speech in which he advised our people to remove all restrictions on the Chinese laborers. He had, he said, conferred with the heads of the Six Companies in this city, and would soon thereafter offer suggestions to them and to the people East as to the best way to encourage the emigration of Chinese, who were, he declared, the best operatives he ever saw.

While on his tour as Ambassador of the Emperor of China, ANSON BURLINGAME, in a speech in New York City, said:

I say that there is a subject on which there does not seem to be any difference of opinion, and that is the question of the Chinese on this coast. The Democratic party, as well as the Republican party, is in favor of the Chinese coming here. Every State convention that has spoken has declared in favor of it. The Democratic party, as well as the Republican party, wants to get the advantage that will be derived from the introduction of labor, but they want to get it in a different way. They want to get it as a commodity, as they want to get a ton of coal or a bale of cotton. They want to get it by the shipload, and to have it landed on the wharves, and then to have it sold to the highest bidder. We want to get it in a different way. We want to get it as we get our emigrants from Europe, by the individual, and to have it come here and settle down and become citizens of the country. We want them to become voters, and as voters to stand upon the same platform that we stand upon. We want them to participate in the blessings of our institutions. We want them to enjoy the same religious liberty that we enjoy. We want them to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and we want to protect them in that worship. We want them to have the same right to worship God in their own way that we have to worship Him in our way. We want them to have the same right to educate their children that we have to educate ours. We want them to have the same right to acquire property that we have to acquire property. We want them to have the same right to dispose of their property that we have to dispose of ours. We want them to have the same right to be represented in the courts of justice that we have to be represented there. We want them to have the same right to pursue happiness that we have to pursue happiness. We want them to have the same right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness that we have to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We want them to have the same protection for life, liberty and property that we have for life, liberty and property. We want them to have the same right to defend life, liberty and property that we have to defend life, liberty and property. We want them to have the same right to defend life, liberty and property that we have to defend life, liberty and property. We want them to have the same right to defend life, liberty and property that we have to defend life, liberty and property.

AN ANCIENT IRISH POEM.

NOT THEIR MASTERS AT IT.

The following sharp was composed in 1691 by Fleby O'Sullivan, author of "The Catholic History of Ireland," 1560–1618, in Latin, on the death of his protector:

What shall we love to their last sleep are borne,
Their memory sweet, their deeds of glory true?
Who the sad lot my speech hath to mourn,
Brothers by every tie of friendship's love,
Through Time's love swiftness the primitive tone
Of man's brave-rooted mingles with my own.

The lamentation of Aodhlus Ivore

By Feiros' tomb Eamoria wore her head;
Alone, unrifled lit the hungry grave,
The pensive mother of Eochaid sprung;
The pensive mother Ector dead bemoan—
Ah with his virtues interwoven with her groans.

Beside his father's grave, with modest grace,
Aodhus, the first in war, by science wise,
Received the thunderous sentence of their fate.
Her thighs or great a glory to possess
Camilla evaded in song his brother's doom—
The valiant-evil by the puissant brother's sword.

Mid spotless glades, in monarchy mood,
Gaiva enshrined in verse his parent-sons;
With Faiviol heard the Romans sound aloud,
And hid the world what his great sire had done—
Nine bloodily, either, brother, all maybe shone
His well-opened hayride heaped upon their name.

But if in any couple of lessons pause
May smile for us of lowly faith sold,
Then thank made sure, who does for us care dead,
To our fate gracous transit in Mary Wro.
Our sure deprecations win for us mercy herself,
Rushed all to crowd through His mouth.

Maiden passing with the stars would mate
His court in Heaven, priest of Maccabius;
The seraphic Powell, Cherubic Dominic,
Who soldiery host with visible stood nations,
Mary's queen salute in his honour season,
To his imperial brother, still remains.

When envious fate on St. Ambrose bows bestowed,
His accepted his favoured sweet mother;
Augustine bade us how his own heart grieved
For Monica herself, as pure as hall;
Jerom paged mankind to holiness sweet
Her spirit with angelic human meet.

Who why should I meet numerous notice?
Yet, country this by my sad-thoughts compel;
With whatever action, whose characters
Would my heart's sorrow to the world be freed;
The Queen's throne in endless choice to meet!
I count the days of all that I loved best.

Of adorable Godhead of many hundreds
Just four my parents' ashes dwell in stones!
When Eusebia had their eldest predecessor the sixth
Who spoke in Synod with the Fathers there,
The weary men out back to heaven here
Blest friends, whose wanderings were for us to store!

Another parent of the Word around,
Gallant strange Basils, trained my willing mind,
Jerom, that where on entrance more kind,
Two brothers, and no blush history of Ireland
Found one life joined, their works a position bear;
Under a damsel's cry a hundred other hearers
Honour Theodore Clark, with entire shift.

Unfolded all their noblest hold in toil!
Who, my heart, Eusebius with great pen!
Ah! Jerom's name shall ever be loved;

— The Pioneer Brothers, of Sherman Island, have had four scraps of alkaline lands this season, with a total acreage yield of about six tons to the acre. They have already sold one scrap, and if the rain holds off, we can number crop this fall.

— The Western Free Press of Saturday says: A very fine improvement has just been completed by Pinard on his Sullivan property, in the shape of an extended pond. It is in admirable form, three hundred feet long, one hundred and one hundred and ninety feet broad respectively, in the corner is an island of about one hundred feet square, which will be covered with tree tops in a few days.

— We are informed that a company of the most capitalists have located a fine silver claim on Spaniards fork of Kern river, Kern county, where Gold Bar, owned by Gen. Beale, is situated, and propose working it by means of the power dredging machine, some of the kind that has been used on the Yuba river, and which has proved a perfect success, and effected. These machines, it is thought, will completely revolutionize the mining interests so as to make the river beds more profitable and the management of property.

— Trains are to be run on the Bay Shore Railroad, between Oakland and Martinez next week. It is intended to connect the line with the California Pacific at Fairfield and also to connect Oakland with Benicia, on the shore route, so as to avoid the heavy grades through Livermore Pass. The road is already completed from Benicia on the main line of the Central Pacific to Antioch, and also finished as above described from Oakland to Martinez, opposite Benicia. Between Martinez and Antioch there is an unfinished gauge of about fifteen miles, which cannot be completed until certain questions now subsisting between the Contra Costa Company and the Company regard this line as an important link in the railroad system of the Pacific Coast. They estimate that the cost of transporting grain from the San Joaquin Valley to tide water by the rail will be materially reduced when the above line is opened. The maximum grade from the valley district of the San Joaquin and the Joaquin Valley is San Francisco, via Martinez and Oakland, along the margin of tide water, is ten feet to the mile. The track is at no time more than twenty miles from navigable water, and nearly all the lands contiguous to the road are owned by parties who would be materially benefited by any measure that would tend to cheapen the cost of transporting their grain to market. The road will be laid with a double gauge track, so that the Livermore Valley may be determined hereafter to move produce over the Livermore Pass line, if found to be the best route. The selected line of road for this year will be of advantage to the locality.

— The Los Angeles Republican says: The major-domo of the Tejon Ranche is trying the system of raising vaquero's wages, and we understand the result is satisfactory that he expects to discard the herding of sheep for all time to come.

— At Los Angeles, October 30, at 4:15 P. M., there was a slight hail-storm, followed by rain, accompanied by thunder and lightning. Total rainfall, 2 100th of an inch.

— Judge Sepulveda has decided that the term of August, 1866, to the city of Los Angeles, is valid.

— Judge Eugene Fawcett, in the District Court of Santa Barbara, October 29, rendered judgment in the case of Sherrill (Government) against Ellis, Jones and Saling with $100 for violation of law in appropriating part of the salary of his subordinate Deputy Sheriff, Dowell. The two officers are alleged to have continued over some $300, were fully proven.

— The passenger train on the Utah Central Railroad, going south on the morning of October 30, when near Farmington, was thrown from the track by a broken rail placed there by the wind. Two passenger and mail cars were overturned, but the engine and tender passed over safely. The officers were uninjured, but the express messenger was severely bruised.

— The Pioneer brothers, well-known miners, have discovered good diggings on the north fork of the American river, R. C., about twelve miles above Telegraph City. Their claim is 200 feet square, and they expect to take out $2,000 or $3,000 the fall.

— Says the Napa Register of Wednesday: An equal temperature prevailed in this valley as in Napa yesterday, from the thermometers in minister to the spirit. and grades at 45 above Mason, the coolest morning of the season. Some slight differences are alleged to have continued over some 1000

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

A GRANDFATHER'S STORY.

About sixty years years ago I was in Paris for the first time in my life. Bonaparte still lingered at St. Helena, and the adventurers, good, bad and indifferent in character, who had served in his armies had not yet lost all hope of the return of their idol, and consequently had not yet thought it worth while to settle down to thorough peace and quietness.

Young Paul Farrand, whom I frequently met at the cafe, and who had served as a captain at Waterloo, was sure that the Little Corporal would come back again soon. "You have not yet beaten him," he would tell me laughing. "You met him in Elba, but he returned; you have sent him to St. Helena, and he will return again. We shall see."

Farrand was an exceedingly nice fellow; and although he professed to cherish an unquenchable hatred for England and everything English, he had, by some means or other, become attached to Alice Rea, a young English lady of my acquaintance, and who had been living with her mother since the conclusion of peace at Paris, not far from the steeple of the ex-captain. And he was always very friendly with me too. He would, it is true, abuse my countrymen most somerotically, but he was always particularly good natured, and whenever he could amicably paying a little too much, he would arrest himself and apologize so heartily that I never could be angry with him. I was alone in the French capital, and had few friends there except Mrs. Rea, her daughter Alice, and Paul; and as it happened that I passed a great deal of my time in the society of these three, the mother, a woman still in the prime of life and the widow of a King's messenger, was a connection of mine by marriage, and that has given me a good chance of serving by services as escort whenever she and her pretty daughter thought fit to go to the theater or the opera. At such times Paul had a seat in the stalls, and between the acts he would come up to my box, to the delight of Alice, who was in love with him, and to the no small satisfaction of Mrs. Rea, who herself had quite a maternal affection for the young Frenchman, and did not in the least discourage his suggestion to her daughter. If there was no formal engagement between the two, it was at least perfectly understood by all parties that as soon as Paul should get an appointment, for which as the time he was a candidate, he was to marry Alice, and I, though only a few years her senior, was to give her away.

One night the opera was crowded more than usual. A great singer was to appear, and a new work by a renowned composer was to be performed. But Paul Farrand, sitting in the stalls, seemed unready to listen to the music or to watch the acting; and almost more often was his eye turned in the direction of my box than in that of the stage. Alice and her mother were with me, and as the curtain fell at the conclusion of the first act, Paul came to me. He was in high spirits, for he had heard that the minister had decided in favor of him the second post, and he expected to hear in a few days that his appointment had been signed by the King. We congratulated him; and as he had to be back to his beat, I whispered to him: "You'll be a happy man in a month or two now, Paul." He smiled, and shot the door.

We remained him as he threaded his way to his place. It was in the centre of the second row from the orchestra, and he had left his open glasses on the chair in order to preserve his right to it by not doing so. He observe a tall, military looking man had appropriated it and had coolly put the glasses on one side. Paul regarded the stranger with the utmost politeness, and I suppose—for naturally I could not hear—requested him to move. The interloper did not deign to answer, but sourtingly he coiled up at Farrand, as though to ask him what he meant by his intrusion. Paul pointed to the open-glasses but the stranger scarcely replied more than he had continued to appear as though he did not hear. I saw that matters were becoming a dangerous complexion, for in the new opera I recognized Victor Lavigliere, an ex-Bonapartist officer like Paul, a notorious bully, and one of the most celebrated duelists in France. But what could I do? I could not sit still, and look against my will, and witness the inevitable consequences. I thought Alice would faint when Lavigliere to the end some way rose before the crowded assemblage and struck Paul in the face with his glover but she recovered herself, and like a statue watched her lover pick up his opera glasses, bow to his insulter and withdraw a word from the building. There was some exclamations from the audience; but the disorder again rose, and with a theatrical air good rested, mocking imitated Paul's parting bow, and resumed his seat. Tuis was too much for poor Alice. She could not remain any longer; she must go home, and so, with some difficulty, I got her and her mother to my carriage, told the coachman to drive them home, and myself waited quietly to Paul's lodgings. He had arrived before me, and was tenderly writing when I entered his room.

"Of course," he said, as he saw me and came toward me with both hands outstretched, "you, my dear friend, will second me. It is impossible to do anything but fight. Even Alice could not make me any reparation upon that point, the insult was so public."

"Suppose you leave the country?" I suggested.

"Then I should have to give up the appointment and Alice too. No, my dear fellow, I am a Frenchman, and I must fight; and you must arrange matters for me." If he should die, it cannot be helped: if I shoot him, I shall shoot the biggest scoundrel in Paris. I beg you to call upon Lavigliere to-night. I have already discovered his address. Here it is."

"But must you really fight? It is suicide to fight with a professional duelist."

"Ah!" he said, shaking his head. "I am afraid it is suicide, but I must fight; or please don't try and persuade me that I need not. And I will fight, too, as soon as possible. You can arrange everything for to-morrow morning. I must have the matter over. In a day or two I might be a coward."

By his look he implored me to go to Lavigliere; and consolidated as French society was at that time, I had no other course open to me than to do as he wished.

"If Monsieur came from M. Paul Farrand," said a man-servant when I inquired whether I could see his master, "M. Lavigliere has sent to say that he has not yet left the opera. He has, however, sent this pencilled note, which I am to give to the gentleman who came from M. Farrand."

I tore open the missive. It contained two cards, one bearing the name of the duelist, and the second that of M. Farrand Dalcrois, Rue Vivienne 16. Certainly it was an offhand way of acquainting me with the name and whereabouts of Lavigliere's second; but as I wished to point no quarrel, I wished on to the Rue Vivienne, and in a few minutes was ushered into the presence of M. Dalcrois himself. This worthy was a young man, aged about three and twenty, and dressed in the very extreme of fashion. His ruffles were immaculate, and were symmetrically arranged, his long hands: ished was stooped in consequence, by which lay on the table—for he had only just returned, at Lavigliere's request from the opera—Pare small and delicate; his fingers were covered with valuable rings, and his bosom of gold seals depending from his fob was unusually heavy and brilliant. He did not bother me as appearing particularly entitled to my attention. After formally saluting me, he at once touched upon the subject of my visit and before I had been two minutes in his company, had arranged to meet Farrand and myself at a certain spot, dear to duellists of the time, at an early hour next morning, and to bring Lavigliere with him.

"I don't think we shall need a surgeon," he said to me quite affably at parting; "but, if you please, you can bring one. In his case one cannot be too careful about his nerves through the pumpion, and he died immediately. I sincerely hope, Monsieur, that your friend is as sincere."

"Confound the fellow!" I said to myself as I left the house and sought the residence of my own medical man. "I am afraid Farrand is about to make such a convenient murderer as Lavigliere."

After seeing the surgeon, to whom I briefly explained matters, I called upon Paul, whom I found in bed and fast asleep. I was loth to disturb him, but my friend immediately shavered in his carriage, which waited near at hand. The pistols were produced and loaded. Lavigliere chose one, and I gave the other to Paul; and then the two men took up positions at a distance of twenty paces from each other, and waited for Dalcrois to give the signal to fire.

"Say!" cried the latter, as the second stepped back, "that the young hound Dalcrois is going to fight a duel with a man who has shot him only where he wishes, for I am generous, parbleu!"

"If I do not kill you," said Paul quietly, "I prefer to die."

"Then I shoot him through the heart," coolly observed Lavigliere. "It will teach others not to challenge me."

There was something to me unspeakably horrible in the way in which these last words were pronounced. I shuddered and looked at Paul. He smiled at me, and at the same time Dalcrois gave the signal.

There was but one report, for Farrand's pistol flashed in the pan. The poor fellow turned round toward me with fixed eyes and pale face, and with the name of Alice on his lips, fell dead. Lavigliere turned on his heel, and departed quickly in company with Dalcrois, while I stood the surgeon in his brief examination of Paul's body. Sorely enough, the bullet had passed through his heart. He must have died almost instantaneously, for he did not move after he fell, and the last smile with which he had looked at me was still upon his face. It was a melancholy business in every respect. I had to break the news to Alice and her mother, and the two ladies were so terribly overcome that I feared the shock would affect them permanently. My own grief was of a more violent and less affect upon their health. For my part, I was obliged in hurry to England as soon as possible, and Lavigliere, I heard, also got away, and remained out of France till the affair had blown over.

I kept up a correspondent with Mrs. Rea, and was glad after a time to hear from her that Alice, though still sadly broken, had learned to look with a certain amount of philosophy upon her misfortune, and had to some extent recovered her usual health, if not her usual spirits. When I married Lucy and settled down in London, I had to forget my Parisian habits, usually dined at the Clarendon, and at times on many a hundred wealthy ships used to lie at anchor in the pool—it has no harbor—indeed to come here by the abundance of the Ocean Steamship Company, I passed up a few pleasant acquaintances, chief among whom was an extremely well-mannered young gentleman named Barton, a member of the Stock Exchange, good family and a first-rate education.

One day, after he had been dining with me, the conversation turned upon Continental manners and particularly upon duelling. As an illustration of my observations of the system, I told my companion the story of Paul's fate, and to which Barton appeared much interested. He asked me a good many questions about the parties concerned, and after expressing a remarkably strong opinion as to the fact that Lavigliere was a blackguard, bid me good-night. I went home to my rooms in the Temple, and Barton to his chambers in the Cheshire Cheese, round on Barton. He had left word with one of the waiters that urgent business had called him away, but hoped to see me on his return. He never passed, and then months, and still Barton did not come back; and I reckon that I had begun to forget him altogether when one evening I met him in the street, as though he had only been absent for a day or two.

"Where have you been?" I asked, after I had heartily shaken hands with him.

"Oh, I have been in Paris," he said, arriving there I found out a little more than I had told me about Farrand's affair, and when I had thoroughly convinced myself that he was the bullyboy of you pulsated him, I arranged for a series of lessons in pistol practice. Every day for a month I went and shot for an hour or two, until I was so positive to be able to hit a small coin every time I fired, and consequently felt myself quite equal to myself as to my predecessor. I took a bet at the opera; it many have been on some box lobby, and won it. The opera was pointed out to me. He set to work to practice with the pistol in order to speak to a lady in another part of the house. I demanded as quickly as possible and took his place. He returned, and asked me in an overbearing tone to move. I refused. He insulted me. We exchanged cards, I chose the small sword, and on the same spot, curiously enough, where he had killed your friend Farrand. Before the signal was given I said: "M. Lavigliere, you are very wrong to come and go to bed. I will sleep here till to-morrow morning; so be as quick as possible."

He wrote for another half hour, addressed the document to Alice Rea, placed a lock of his hair within it, and after sealing it up gave it to me.

"Give that to her," he said, "if Lavigliere kills me outright—and I know he will. If it were not for Alice I declare that I should be glad to meet him. Now for bed."

He undressed; while I lay down on the sofa in the next room and lit a cigar, for I could not sleep, and was determined that I was quiet, and I made it to me Paul lying as quiet as a child, with a smile on his face. Probably, my generosity, I passed a more comfortable night than he did. Only with the greatest possible difficulty could I keep awake; and the hours seemed to linger forever. At last, however, daylight dawned, and I called Farrand, who woke refreshed and to appearatively good spirits. After a hurried breakfast we mailed ourselves up, placed a flask of brandy, some powder and bullets, and a brace of pistols in my pocket, and we sallied forth in the cold morning to meet our foes.

LAHAINA, H. I., November 1, 1877.

EDITOR MONITOR: Having left Honolulu on the 8d of last April, I could not redeem my indirectly-made promise of giving some more items about it, but will give a few respecting the place. Lahaina is delightfully, though loosely, located on an open beach at the western end of the island of Maui, and covers an area of about two and a half miles long by one broad. It is well sheltered at its eastern side by a range of mountains that rise proudly, roughly and boldly—as all mountains that have any self-respect do—to the clouds, drawing from them, and from the mists of the Pacific, which they arrest, the sustenance necessary for the most vegetation that obtains on their summits, a short way down their sides. The mountains are about 5,000 feet high, and present a grand, imposing aspect, though made of wood—a characteristic of the mountains in these islands. Lahaina was, before the advent of the whites—as subsistence can for the native—a great resort of whales of this and the neighboring islands. Its anchorages and syrtes facilities (it is the best wooded spot on these islands), the delicious beauty of its sights, its immunity from cold winds and rains, the graceful shelter afforded by the dense growth of fruit and shade trees, and the profuse and abundant supply of cocoanuts, bread-fruit, pepins or mamm apples, mangoes, guavas, bananas and other tropical fruits, made it Arcadia to the mariner, who, in their primitive state, fully enjoyed it; but now, what a change! Scarcely one of these can obtain a touch of the land they adore. They are a languishing and imprudent race, and do not realize their loss, and care not for to-morrow if to day is provided for.

The first white settlers here seemed to have a good idea of "magnificent distances;" they build their houses far apart, so that a large proportion of the land was a ragged, lazy laid out town, the foriorge is brought up in breadth would suffice for its size, and give ample room for all the houses it had to some extent preserved her moral health, if not her royal spirits. When I arrived as the sister the cadle was carried down into the royal vault, which was hung with black velvet, on which sparkled the royal arms. The procession was ordered in the following manner: First came the Royal Hawaiian Band, followed by the Royal Household, the Chief Justice, the Cabinet Ministers, the Governor of Honolulu, the Diplomatic Corps, and many others of minor importance. Then came the hearse, with eight horses, covered with black velvet and surmounted by a crown, the imperial globe and the sceptre, the latter two emblems of royalty. The pall-bearers were surrounded by silver candlesticks, with lighted wax figures. The reception rang on the occasion was by Church Royal. The mourning will last from four to six months. The Royal Band performed some of the fashionable world of Saxony are entitled.

OUR SCHOOL SYSTEM.

On the evening of October 30th Mr. Wilbur, the Superintendent, addressed the "Liberal Club" of New York on the School Question. In the course of his remarks he quoted from the statistics of public schools and the census, as exemplified in the returns of taxation for State purposes, and showed that while the bulk of the money was raised by a general property tax, and but little from the hard-earned wages of the working classes, the real benefits of the system accrued to the wealthier portion of the community, who could well afford to pay for the education of their children, which they now get at the expense of the State. Mr. O'Donovan also showed that in communities where wages were low, the average results of competition, a higher average was attained, at a less expense to the people at large than in those in which it ranked; and he argued strongly against the idea of compulsory education, which, so far, in this country, has proved a total failure. At the conclusion of the discourse the position of the lecturer was severely criticised by certain members of the "club," who accused him of having violated "Catholic hereditary ideas!" but, lessons out so they were not able to controvert any of the facts and figures produced by Mr. O'Donovan, their efforts only showed that they had mistaken their ground and that, practically, they belonged to a very "illiberal" and bigoted class of people. New York Irish American.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean's Washington special of December 7 says: The story that a white prisoner is held in during Bull's camp has been supposed to be merely a camp-fire story, but General Terry, in a letter to the War Department, gives it official sanction, stating that during his recent visit to Fort Welch a half-breed interpreter informed him that he had seen the pale face in Sitting Bull's camp; that he came was Frank Gerard, formerly Corporal in the Seventh Cavalry. He was captured in the action of June 25, 1876, and has made several unsuccessful attempts to escape. The interpreter had been detained by Sitting Bull calling to Ryan and ordered a way. The Indians keep him painted like the Indian and have married him to a squaw—a daughter of Spotted Eagle. His description of Ryan corresponds exactly with that of Corporal Ryan of Company C, Seventh Cavalry, who was reported and supposed killed in the action referred to. General Terry credits the whole story, and suggests a movement for his release. Secretary McCrary has not yet considered the subject. The story of Stein, requesting investigation and the negotiation for Ryan's release. Accordingly Secretary Evarts has written the Edward Thornton, at the British Legation, who in turn has communicated with the Governor-General of Canada, under whose supervision Sitting Bull now lives, and Major Walsh will be instructed to ascertain to some if true, to demand the release of Ryan.

A Royal Funeral in Germany.

A Dresden correspondent of the London Times, describing the funeral of the Queen-Dowager of Saxony, says:

The royal funeral was solemnized in the Catholic court church, where the royal family of Saxony has its sepulchre. Several princes—among them the Imperial Prince of Germany—and other representatives of foreign courts arrived here for the occasion. At a quarter past six o'clock P. M. a brilliant though mournful party assembled in the church, which was hung with black and shut to the general public. The large palace which rises from one end to the other through the middle of the church was lined by a squadron of blue dragoons, a magnificent troop, of which every man is a giant. When he Majesty the King had made his entrance the Poem "Miserere mei Domine" was sung. Before the sounds had died away the coffin, which had been brought into the church the day before, was lifted with he pall of velvet, and borne in funeral procession through the church. First came trumpeters, who were followed by clergy; after these marched the servants of the defunct, the medical attendants of the Court, the Master of Ceremonies, a Privy Councillor and some chamberlains. Then came the Bishop, in his white mitre, a prayer-book in his hand, and a lighted taper in the other, surrounded by the clergy in white and black surplices. The coffin was borne by the Marshal of Court, Amalie's and King Albert's Knights, the pall, borne by twelve chamberlains, and the coffin, carried by twelve servants. Immediately behind the coffin walked the King and his Royal Highness Prince George, sons of the defunct. Both carried, according to the Catholic rite, burning candles in their hands. Then followed the clergy. The King and Prince George's suite was followed by the other princes. Among them was the Royal Highness Friedrich Wilhelm, the Crown Prince of Prussia, who principally attracted attention. The coffin and the princes were surrounded by a square of pages clothed in red velvet, and white silk, with wigs, carrying flaming torches. The procession made a striking though melancholy picture. When it arrived at the altar the coffin was carried down into the royal vault, which was hung with black velvet, on which sparkled the royal arms. The solemn mass was performed in the presence of the princes of the royal house, the ambassadors, the imperial clerks and the representatives of the Saxon Government. The mass was succeeded by other services, and the procession was reformed in the same order as before. The coffin was borne to the Georgen Hall, where it remained till Monday, when it

CHRISTMAS.

Next Tuesday will be Christmas Day, and, in accordance with long-established custom, we presume our readers and friends everywhere open the happy reason of that great and holy Christian festival. We wish all of them a very merry Christmas, and hope that nothing over their households and plenty over their board. May the memories which the day must call up to the mind of each one, be grateful and joyous, and the hearth-lights with which golden prosperity flash are our most sincere and heartfelt wishes for all our friends, and we are proud to say they are many. We should be sorry to think that any one would suppose they have given to our paper, and we know that if the means had been more plentiful their support would have been more generous, that support would have been given. Next year will be a promising day for us. We only trust that the coming year will be more fruitful still of good, and that when Christmas, 1878, comes around it shall find the people of California in better enjoyment of a more thorough and unmingled content than could have been with the best of fellows in prosperity. Although it would be daily to pretend that our city and State are as prosperous as we should like them to be—for undoubtedly there is a great dispression in all branches of business, and hundreds of deserving artizans and workingmen are idle—yet it would be unreasonable to assert that we have in California any misery so badly off as the people in the Eastern States are. Really, it is only in comparison with the great old "times" when the whole Californian heart was enamored, when money was plentiful and labor could almost command its own price, that these days can be called dull or depressed. Individual cases of suffering and hardship, of course, there may be, and are; but anything resembling general or wide-spread distress does not exist, let the groundless alarm of any one say what it may. Our very amount does exist,—be it much or little, is entirely of a fleeting and temporary character, arising from a most complex if remedies are applied by those who have the power to use them. Meantime, every one who is blessed with plenty, and to whom Christmas comes as a time of joy and thanksgiving, should do what is within his means and ability to make cheerful the home and freedom of his less fortunate neighbors. Christmas is essentially the season of charity, benevolence, and kindliness of feeling towards all, to blessed memory of the birth of our once poor Redeemer. It is the time when all voices should sing with heart and sound, "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good will."

D. O. MILLS ON THE CHINESE.

Nothing more disagreeably surprises the intelligent and well-using citizen of California than the apparent inferiority of the Eastern press and the Eastern people to understand the Chinese question as it exists here. Despite numerous and explanations, both communicative, we find Eastern editors and distinguished politicians asserting that we are extremely unreasonable persons because we object to the Mongolian and want to send them back to their own country. Our dislike is attributed in the one case that they work cheaper and are more submissive to employers than white men usually are. Evidently there is an idea in the East that workingmen here are paid exorbitant wages, and that a reduction would be advantageous to trade. How far this is from being the truth can, most unfortunately, be seen every day in the streets where have resided for some time on the Pacific Coast, and are acquainted with the condition of our industrial classes. It is deplorable to see individuals, who should know something about the real state of affairs, led away by absurd perversions, intended to the public interest, and tortured traitor to men of their own race and country.

We are impelled to such these reflections by a telegram from Washington which appeared in our daily papers of Tuesday last, containing an interview which took place between Mr. D. O. MILLS and the President and Secretary of State on December 15th. The interview seemed to be of Mr. MILLS' seeking, and its only object was, apparently, to give expression to that gentleman's opinions on the Chinese question. He declared that the reports of Mongolian criminality and vice were unfounded or exaggerated; that the cooties were no real injury but a positive benefit to the Pacific Coast; and that the United States were bound to see that those treaties received all the protection due to them by the treaty regulations with China.

We have nothing whatever to urge against the last statement, because we, too, believe that our Government is bound to honorably fulfill its obligations towards subjects of all nations residing here and engaged in legitimate business. And it is, also, our conviction that the Chinese, nowsoever as they may be, should be no proper pretext than for their lives and property, just the same as any other class of persons. We have always spoken out in condemnation to any violence or injustice towards them. But how Mr. MILLS can verify his two previous assertions is more than we can imagine. They are to contradictive to all evidence, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to examine into the constitutionality of a law imposing the same rate of assessment upon property of every kind used as a means of conveyance of passengers and freight (except agricultural implements) and if they find the same to be unconstitutional, to prepare a bill or bills to carry the same into effect, and report speedily the result of their deliberations to the Assembly.

We cannot understand what any person, having the welfare of the State really at heart, can find objection to the passage of such a bill. There is nothing communistic in the enacting. It touches upon no man's rights; it confiscates nobody's property; it makes no discrimination between rich and poor, class and class; it makes one rule and applies to it all alike. Of the perfect constitutionality of the resolution we have little, if any, doubt. A moment's reflection will convince any person, another to strike out the preamble and refer the remainder only to the Judiciary Committee, and if that favorable report be made, it will be finally passed by the Assembly. Nothing is wanted but a general sentiment of the people in favor of the measure, at the suggestion of Mr. MCCARTHY, under consideration of the rules. In the Senate, also, a bill of the same purport has passed a bill to put the question of Chinese immigration to a popular vote. One of the principal things done during the week past by the members of the Federal Union, for the purpose of testing the sentiment of the people, was

On December 1st Alderman Jarley was re-elected Mayor of Dublin.

On December 1st the Emmets belonging to the steamer "Leda," lying at Sir John Rogerson's quay, Dublin, accidentally fell into the river when about stepping to the quay. Two seamen named William Haynes and William Lewis, belonging to the ship "Semaline," succeeded, after about ten minutes, in getting the men out of the water, but they were in such an exhausted state that they died before they reached St. Patrick Duke's Hospital, to which they were promptly conveyed. The names of the drowned man were James Hearn, a native of Belfast, aged 25 years, and James Cranny, a native of Dublin, aged 30 years.

KILKENNY.

The National Convention has begun. The movement for erecting a public memorial of Hoche, the great conqueror, in Dublin, has, we are exhausted to say, had anything but a successful issue. At a meeting of the committee held a few days ago, it was stated that there was only £20 in the credit of the fund. One thousand pounds, at least, should have been subscribed long ago. Among the best of the names the committee have received, for which we are with a wish expressed by Madame Hoche, to place a bust of her illustrious husband in the National Gallery, and at once to search a sculptor of eminence to execute the design. It is to be hoped that no Irish sculptor will be chosen.

SHEMUS DHU,

THE BLACK PEDDLER OF GALWAY.

A TALE OF THE PENAL TIMES.

CHAPTER V.

The strangers who had taken leave of Connel, were again returning. The Lord of danger that had escaped him, and the agitation of his manner, described to them by those who had met him the cabin, determined them, after some consultation, to return. When they entered the cabin again Connel stood in the same moodified posture, with his eyes fixed upon the fire. He seemed not to be aware of their return. For some time the silence was embarrassing, except by the whispers of the party. Judy seeing the indifferentism of Connel, was the first to take upon herself the guidance of the villages.

"In truth, and it becomes you well Connel," said she, in a tone of reproof, "to look there so like a fool, while your son, perhaps, waste your help. Come lads, if he does not care, the old nurse, who suckled them and rocked them, will seek Fergus far and near."

Judy was remarkable for speaking with a tone of authority, especially where she thought there was a necessity for her interference; but at the present moment her deportment to speak loudly was heightened by an eye for her foster child. It is probable that Connel would have witnessed without emotion the whispering of his neighbors, and the preparations of the young men to seek his son, (some of whom had already lighted the log deal torches, and called their hounds), though he alone felt the great anxiety—the interest of a father in a son's safety—had not the old nurse's voice been raised in her last sentence to the slightest degree.

Judy's last resort for the safety of Fergus would have been the mention of D'Arcy's threats. She was aware of the feelings of Connel and of D'Arcy towards each other and she feared the powerful passion of the former, if driven to extremes, for she still had a lingering all about for her first foster child; not but that in certainty of danger, she would have sacrificed that affection to the safety of Fergus, who, knowing no mother from his cradle, had transferred a child's love to mother—the purest and strongest under Heaven—to his old nurse, the guardian of his infant days.

Connel, after some reflection, exclaimed: "She speaks truth, by Heaven! we will seek him, lads!" and then in the same tone of vehemence, as if struck by some bitter thought, he said—"No, remain here, you! I will go alone." His decision and action were of the same instant. He seized one of the lighted torches and rushed from the cabin.

The surprise of his neighbors—none of whom ventured to follow him—had scarcely time to be expressed to each other, when he returned with as much anxiety, but with more calmness in his appearance.

"By my faith," he said, "there are men approaching. What, if they be the——— boy, sir, that cannot be."

Connel was interrupted by the sudden opening of the door, and his son, accompanied by a stranger, entered. Connel's son was surprised at the unusual warmth of his reception by three persons present. The young men with rough, though sincere gratification, welcomed the escape of their favorite from danger; and when he did thank their affection, through wondering at its expression at that moment, he was embraced by his old nurse, who, with threats of joy, such as these—"mo lanin!" "mo rún!" "mhoia machree!" hung about his neck, and at length sobbed herself to quietness. When the young man had disengaged himself from the distressing attention of the old woman, he inquired for his father.

"Where is Connel," he said, looking around; "I thought he was here when I entered."

Connel, at the entrance of his son, had retired to a darkened corner of the room, not less thankful for the safety of his son, but now anxious to discover the character of his companion. During the detention of his son by Judy, he endeavored to catch a view of the stranger's face; but the latter was muffled, and by the fixity of his person and eyes which he kept in the same position from his entrance, he appeared in effect to shut was passing around him. Some of the older villagers—to whom Connel spoke—left the cabin. They were followed by the rest, who were reconciled to their accidents from the cabin by Judy's assurance, as she shut the door on them, that in the morning she would tell them all." When the family of O'Keane were left to themselves, Connel welcomed his son, and bade the stranger—who was still standing in the middle of the floor—to approach the fire. The stranger started, and looked around him, but perceiving that none were in the cabin except those before him, and two females, probably servants of the family, he undid the clasps of a great coat, heavy with rain, and the soil of travel, and seated himself on a low bench, which Fergus placed near the fire for him. The first attempt at conversation was made by the stranger.

"My good friend," he said to Connel, "I have to thank this young man—who, I find is your son—for my comfortable shelter on this stormy night."

"He would be no true son of mine, sir," said Connel, in English—it was in English the stranger spoke—"if the stranger found not sentence from him."

"I believe so, indeed—I believe it now, though a few days since I had doubts about the fidelity and hospitality of your peasantry," said the stranger, with a deep-toned voice. "But tell me," he resumed, quickly, "I had not time to ask my young guide, is this part of the country free from the visits of the Galway exhibitions?"

The eagerness with which the question was put disconcerted O'Keane. He had remarked, at the entrance of the stranger, his rapid examination of the countenances of the villagers. He had perceived his short thought and silence, and the glimpses of his countenance, which he could during the imperfect light of the cabin, had him the effect of a sudden suspicion of his motives. Connel, however, answered that he would answer that of the country. Connel had some experience of the world, and was from habit keen observer. He must perceived that there was an uneasy expression on the face of the stranger without being able to answer in his simple inquiry, O'Keane was too experienced in habit-es. He saw him there, therefore, as one whose peace of mind was bruised, if not destroyed, by some heavy weight of memory. How often do we are among the crowd there who, to the careless and light observer, appear at ease, while the experienced will see in their calmness, not nature's ease, but the hardihood and fix who himself has suffered, will recognize in the sigh and the start, and the stern word, half uttered, the kindred of a wounded spirit, though calmness suddenly again settle on the countenance, and give the show of peace. Just so the dangers of the dark wave are seen when a cloud passes over the moon, and the waters sleep soundly after—and the deep lines in horizon under the original ones of the sweet light.

From the moment Connel had a full view of the guest he believed him to be a sufferer; and, as sufferings, not any matter whether merited or otherwise, has a strong hold upon the young bloo of the generous, the good fellow's heart opened to him, and he was determined at any risk to be his friend. Then a new pleasure arose from his determination to assist him; perhaps he was persecuted by the same whom Connel believed to be the oppressors of his country. The pleasure of that thought was exquisite to him; the first impulse to the act of kindness towards the stranger was given by his human feelings; but now it became a sacred duty, when connected with his hatred virtues—love of country and religion. With such opinions of his guest's position Connel assured him again and again of his security in Portarogh.

"For the last eighteen years," he added, "since I became a dweller in the part of the country, I have been happy in not seeing the oppressing which marked the visits to other parts of the country of the blood-thirsty soldiers. But I should not blame them so much. It is their masters, the hunters after our blood—who set them loose upon us. Young man, I could tell many a time and oft of the cruel barrge your heart. Well, if they only allow peace to our religion, we will let our just hatred sleep in the cold grave with the bones of our forefathers. We had remarked, at the entrance of the stranger, his rapid examination of the countenances of the villagers. He had perceived his short thought and silence, and the glimpses of his countenance, which he could during the imperfect light of the cabin, had him the effect of a sudden suspicion of his motives. Connel, however, answered that he would answer that of the country. Connel had some experience of the world, and was from habit a keen observer. "What proof have I of his guilt? None that amounts to certainty. He promised to bring me help. He swore there was no danger, and the moment we landed we were attacked. He urged his defence—I will believe that he was. Would to heaven I had believed the lights which I heard of his treachery, and then the old man's blood would not be heavy upon my heart."

At the moment he perceived that he was speaking louder than was prudent. He raised his eyes and they met Connel's, which were fixed upon him. What was there in the stranger's look which could disturb Connel? He winced under its inquisitive glance. Doubt, and inquiry, and wonder were mixed strongly in that expression. His eyes were turned to the ground. He raised them again. Yet there was the same look of the stranger.

"O! my God of heaven!" thought Connel, "can it be so? No! no idea to toss up! Yet, there again, it is father's look to glimpse."

He arose suddenly; he stretched out his hands towards the young man—who had also silently, started at the wildness of Connel's manner—and asked, with a tone of deep supplication:

"In heaven's name, say who are you, young stranger!"

CHAPTER VI

The words and energy of Connel were calculated to cause misgivings in the mind of a person in more secure circumstances than those which our hero found himself in. He observed the quick approach of Fergus and the women towards the wood. A fear of hidden treachery arose suddenly in his mind, and he hastily grasped a pistol, which was concealed beneath the covering of his outer dress. He relaxed the grasp when he perceived that the family of Connel stood in the attitude of those looking with wonder from the old man to himself, but without any evidence of evil intention. The picture which presented itself to the latter was a most delightful one, being transferred to a stage better suited to display the grandeur and the beauty of its chief actors. The bright glare of the blazing wood fell upon the weather-beaten face of the old man, giving a tinge of gold to his silvered hair, now disturbed from its usual settled state by his excitement. A change had entirely came over him. The wildness and determination of his eye had sunk in a milder, though still ardent expression of earnest. The energy of his manner was lost to the suppleness expression of his stooped posture, and his hands, a moment before raised by the passion of his distinction against his supposed enemies, drooped below his breast. If you could forget the personal dignity—he effect of which was only weakened by his present posture—you might well fancy him an aged and sedate deterring the wildness of youth from some dark deed.

The attitude and countenances of the other persons were in accordance with the stranger stood erect before the light. There was suddenly wonder in his eyes, and his parted lips—but only for a moment, did his countenance fall into its former calm. He looked from father to son, and then the whole power of his keen eyes was concentrated upon the former. He looked to find the native of Connel's quiet race.

The stranger's age could not be more than twenty-five, although he appeared more advanced in life, owing to the dark hue, weather had given to his complexion. This appeared—that is, that he had felt the influences of a more severe climate than that in which he was reared—from the contrast of the remarkable fairness of his forehead with the bronze color of his lower features. His height was something above the common; and he seemed rather attired than in the stranger's look which could disturb Connel? He winced under its inquisitive glance. Doubt, and inquiry, and wonder were mixed strongly in that expression. His eyes were turned to the ground. He raised them again. Yet there was the same look of the stranger.

The stranger's age could not be more than twenty-five, although he appeared more advanced in life, owing to the dark hue, weather had given to his complexion. This appeared—that is, that he had felt the influences of a more severe climate than that in which he was reared—from the contrast of the remarkable fairness of his forehead with the bronze color of his lower features. His height was something above the common; and he seemed rather attired than in the slight though well-formed figure. When first introduced to the reader he wore, perhaps to avoid notice, a cap of frieze without peak or other ornament than the common head-covering of the peasantry; but now his hair of glossy black fell unconfined about his forehead and neck. His other dressing had nothing, at street notice; it was of coarse gray cloth, and its make was well adapted to the ease of the pedestrian as his strong material was to his defence against cold and rain; still there was in his entire dress, that which, escaping the vulgar, could tell to a person conversant with the fashions of the time, that its wearer had some claims to a higher rank of life than at first sight appeared.

We must leave the stranger and Connel in their wonder to describe the spectators of the scene. While the stranger and Connel engaged with his father in their first conversation, Fergus was seated on a low stool in a distant part of the room, at one moment assiduously washing the feelings of the speakers, and again answering in a low voice the eager inquiries of a beautiful girl, who leaned with the confidence of a sister upon his shoulder. This was Iris Eveleen, or "Eveleen of the dark hair," on whom he doated with more than fraternal fondness.

"You have told me," she said, in a tone of sweet persuasion, running her delicate fingers through his long curls that fell around her brother's neck, "what you met him by chance, and yet you say that he may be the person you suspect him to be. Ah! Fergus, I see you don't wish me to know these things. You and my father are changed toward me since that dark pedlar has been last here."

"Hush, dear Eveleen, don't let my father hear you say this. I have no secret, at least none about which you would care, and as for the peddler, though I have never spoken to him, I suspect him."

"Ah! but you have secrets," she replied, not with the purpose of exercising the influence which she knew she possessed over her brother, but feelingly, though her manner was joyous. "You have, indeed; I know it, Fergus. Come, now, don't look so gloomy. Tell me who you and my father like the peddler so much, though all other people hate. Well, well, you don't hear me. I see, I see, must be serious! I, too, can be serious."

And here she whispered something into her brother's ear, which made him start from his seat and say, "You, Iris, Eveleen! you could not have seen D'Arcy, and if you have, he could not say this to you."

Eveleen answered, but with an altered tone. The laughing expression of her deep blue eyes was changed; and she pressed the hand that was playing with her brother's hair, and looking him full in the face, she said, "do you, too, could make me believe it by your manner, yes I cannot blame you. Strange thoughts have lately arisen in my own mind."

Eveleen communed with herself. She withdrew her eyes from her brother's face to look upon the stranger's, at the moment Connel arose, and she her brother, with one impulse, rushed toward.

Fergus O'Keane was distinguished among the young villagers, not only for beauty of face, and symmetry of figure, but for that which young men prize more—for his strength and agility in all their manly exercises. This itself would give him an influence among the young of his acquaintance, but he had more pre-eminent claims—he had the good of the old inhabitants, who often pointed him out to their sons and daughters as a model of prudence and wisdom, of docility and obedience. Connel's great influence among his neighbors certainly reflected upon his son; yet it was not from it alone that Fergus derived his clear fame. He had been sent to the University of Salamanca, and that fact had won for him the esteem of the priest, a learned man, who devoted his leisure moments to the instruction of pupils as docile and apt should occur, among their respective companions, have an influence which none others enjoyed. Fergus' own natural disposition confirmed this advantageous power. He was the peace-maker among the young, and his father was also consulted for his opinion. Perhaps he was indebted for this to his own reserve. If you could forget the personal dignity—he effect of which was only weakened by his present posture—you might well fancy him an aged and sedate deterring the wildness of youth from some dark deed.

The Three Statues of Lourdes.

Three statues commemorate the principal events in the marvelous apparitions at Lourdes.

The first statue represents the Blessed Virgin teaching Bernadette the sign of the cross. The Irish Rifle Team Hombug.

The City Council, at its last meeting, took charge of the Rotten Shield, which was won for the third time at Wimbledon in last July by a team of eight riflemen from Ireland. The shield was carried into the city of Dublin, and the members of the team were escorted by a procession of the City Council with a speech as graceful and genial as the Lord Mayor for by the way, is known who know and value the Major's social qualities. We do not desire to say a word against such complimentary ceremonials, so long as they are not carried to excess. We do not mean to the present case, we cannot but think it harmful that, in this country, where the people are so deeply depressed by British law, a few Irishmen, allowed by grace and favor to bear arms, and grouping themselves together in what is called "The Irish Rifle Association," should be allowed to form forth before the public, and proceed to fire at a mark, as if the people had no grievance of the sort we have just referred to. Major Leech enlarged on the "Irish" himself and friends had made up their minds to qualities necessary to those who would success-fully engage in rifle competition with men of any other nation the Irishmen is no way deficient; also, he said he might claim for the Irish that they had not been in this matter altogether unworthy to represent the Irish race. Lord Mayor Dawson, in his commander, which adds "The casualties on our side amounted to one man severely burned by a sentry, and three dragoons slightly scared article, it would seem, to be a sort of missile in use among the Chinese. One English paper had some enough to proclaim against the Irish Rifle Association, in which this great British victory was described, and to remark that if things went on at this rate there would be no more left for otherwise as such as the gentlemen of Wellington, if in future years anything of that kind should take place.

But now England is at it again. Turks and the Russians are not to take a hand in the fighting and all the glory in themselves. England means to let everyone see that she can kill men of her own or another in some part of the world. She is at war—in Afghanistan, Jowaki and Afreedie, and is fighting them in magnificently. A correspondent of the Times, writing from Calcutta gives a glowing account of the splendid equipment, discipline and efficiency of the army now being won by British valor in the Jowaki mountains war. "Both the Jowakis appear, those," he says, "have just whipped our case. The tribes have been encouraged to say stand against artillery, and the complete distribution of Jemmu and Hari, and of the other forty hundred hamlets in their territory, with the exception of some few, burned by the several sang-queenie that have taken place, 300 Orakzais are said to have been killed, and Kraile great Azaal, as well as other kraal whose hundreds of several families, surrounded and burnt. Over 1200 Orakzai troops were on the scene. Kraa on minute of 600 and Gagaoba on the neighbor, has 5,000, the Gakas number as many more; and these are various other tribes, some of which promise aid to Mr. Shepstone has asked for reinforcements, and they have been forwarded to him, and if necessary more troops will be sent. We are cautious in the use of the term when less been placed at his disposal, for the purpose, I may say, of his own safety. I am glad to hear that Cetewayo and his people are being raised. They will render, I have no doubt, very valuable assistance."

Reflection on the frolicsome of the Cape of Good Hope is not necessary to suggest-ed-lated feud between the Galekas and the Fingoes. The latter were once a race of slaves. They are the descendants of the aboriginal Kaffirs, who were driven out of the country by Umlela in the early part of the present century. The fair territory of Natal, which before that title had been unlikely populated by peaceful and prosperous tribes, was laid waste by the Zulu invaders, and such of the inhabitants as escaped by a series of the ruthless destroyers fled to the south, and were reduced to the captives and slaves of the warlike race living on the Cape frontier. The name Fingo is a corruption of the word Mfengu, which signifies outcasts or exposed persons, and was given to the fugitives by the Kaffirs. Being treated as slaves, when British rule asserted and established itself over the Kaffraria, these people gradually came under the protection of the British Government, and have since then been formed into a distinct tribe. Loyal, industrious, and open to improvement, the Fingoes have proved a valuable acquisition to the settlement, and upon the SUBSCRIBERS will please specially look at the printed label on the margin or wrapper of their paper; the date thereon shows when the subscription expires. They should also know that their taking the paper from the postoffice renders them liable for the subscription price as long as any one issue is due. Persons have no excuse to make for papers being sent after the time their subscription expires. If they want their paper discontinued, they must so inform the office the postmaster is bound to notify the postmaster of that fact, and to have it stopped. We make this explanation for the information of those who make the excuse, when asked for payment, that they paid for it as long as ordered, but still continue to take it from the office.

Our agent, Mr. J. P. Croke, will canvass the city for subscribers to the journal during the winter months until he can resume his travels through the State. We trust he will be cordially received at every house and be thoroughly successful in his mission. We ask the co-operation of all our kind friends.

THE NUMBER OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

One of the difficulties attending the proper settlement of the labor question now agitating the city, is the uncertainty as to the number of persons actually in want of assistance. It seems almost foolish to talk of remedial measures before a good idea is had of what there is to be remedied and what is the extent of it. At present nobody appears to know, though a great many guesses are made. Some assert that there are two thousand mechanics and laboring men out of employment; others maintain that the number is greatly exaggerated, being at least twice too much. But the real issue to be decided is not how many persons are unemployed, but how many are in want and need assistance. It is plain that not all who are out of work stand in need of public charity. Many workingmen have money saved whereupon they can support themselves and their families until better times come, and they should not be taken into account. Indeed, it would be an insult to offer them any assistance. But the unfortunates who suffer from want of bread must certainly be looked after and provided for. It is no business of the State or of the municipality to create employment for any number of men; but it most assuredly is the duty of either or both to take care that no one shall perish of hunger. And this brings us directly to the consideration of the wages to be given to the men. In the discussion in the Board of Supervisors the other evening, some of the gentlemen declared it would be "degrading labor" to offer less than the current wages. This argument is altogether wrong. Too work proposed to be done is not one of necessity. It is a special thing to be done because of special reasons. There is no intention on the part of the Supervisors, or of any one else, to reduce wages or to set up a standard of remuneration for workingmen. They have only to declare how much is considered right to receive for doing a certain amount of labor. A dollar per diem may not, and in fact, ought not, always to be the second in order. If they want more paid for it, they will keep him from starvation. And now, therefore, the thing for the authorities to do is for more to relieve distress than to set up principles of wages. The first is their plain and manifest duty; the second is, strictly speaking, no concern of theirs at all. But this they cannot do intelligently or wisely until reliable information concerning the number of persons who have good claim to assistance is known. Steps should be taken without further delay to get it, and then no time should follow as speedily as possible. Loss of time will only aggravate the evil, increase discontent, and make a restoration of general prosperity more difficult. Let, then, the authorities at once begin their part of the business.

THE FOLLY OF VIOLENT LANGUAGE.

It must now be evident to every intelligent workingman that the persons who use violent language at meetings, making threats of boycottism and murder, can be no true friends of the unemployed. The very first effect of such folly is to tend to make the men of property, be that property little or great, still more careful in protecting their possessions than of relieving distress. Its next effect is to alienate the sympathies of all prudent and peaceful citizens from a cause which is endeavored in such a criminal manner. Consequently, intemperate harangues, whoever conduct of enthusiasm they may kindle for the moment, do much harm and are productive of no good. It may be that the individuals who make use of wild utterances are only led away by the excitement of the occasion and have no evil intentions; nevertheless they are responsible for the effect of their words upon the rash the end outlook up. There are in every city a number of people who are only too ready to create disturbance for the sake of getting a chance to rob and plunder, and very little provocation is necessary to set them at their wicked work. Here in San Francisco we have but too many such desperate characters and no brain some of them closely follow the workingmen's movements with the expectation of being able to take advantage of it. In case tumult did arise from any cause, those are the men who would do most of the damage. Whatever might be the result of their lawlessness the workingmen would get the blame of it. They would be denounced by every paper in the United States as scoundrels, incendiaries or communists, and all the water in the bay would not wash the shame of it from them. But this would not be the worst—the sacrifice of the property destroyed would have legal claim on the city for the amount of their losses, and this would bring about a rate of taxation which would be more burdensome on every man who had a little bit of ground or had a house of his own, and the poorer he was the more keenly he would feel the load and more, comparatively, would he be loser by it. The rich man can pay his taxes easily enough. No matter how high they are, he will not suffer, but to the poor man even increase in taxation means the lessening of some of his few comforts. These things, which cannot be denied, for they are as plain and evident as the light of day, should make every workingman reflect, and decide him to keep away from tumultuous gatherings, and do all in his power to discountenance the use of violent language.

THE DEATH OF VICTOR EMANUEL.

VICTOR EMANUEL, King of Italy, died in Rome on Wednesday afternoon at half-past two o'clock. He had been ill for some time previously, but no danger was apprehended until Monday, when a great change for the worse took place in his condition, and his family were summoned to be beside. The King, who, notwithstanding his many faults, was at heart a sincere Catholic, received all the consolations of religion before he died. He was attended by one of the domestic chaplains of the Pope, sent expressly from the Vatican to the Quirinal, and his Holiness Pius IX. is said to have declared that but for his own infirmity he would have gone to the dying King himself. This fact proves that VICTOR EMANUEL must have expressed sincere repentance for his past life and a desire for the spoliation of the Holy See, and for all the acts of his Government against the freedom and welfare of the Catholic Church. Without having done this he certainly would never have received the sacraments or died within the pale of the Church. Take since gives great food for thought to Protestants and other adherents of Catholicity. If the King had died without one sign of repentance, and died like an infidel, they would, undoubtedly, have been better pleased; and assuredly the revolutionists of his own country would have been delighted. But his sons at the supreme hour brought a priest to minister to him, and by this act of mercy the Church, he was wrong and the Pope was right, must be regarded by all thinking men as a most important occurrence and as a complete vindication of the conduct of the Sovereign Pontiff. VICTOR EMANUEL was not without faults—and grave ones—but he was, on the whole, a good King and greatly simple hearted. In other circumstances and with other surroundings he might have been a very good man and a truly Catholic sovereign. His was nearly fifty-eight years old when he died, lacking only two months and a few days of that age. His eldest living son, Prince HUMBERT, succeeds him. It is not known whether the new King will make any change in the policy of his father. He has continued the Ministry to power, but he hardly could do otherwise for the present. It remains to be seen what kind of a monarch of United Italy he will turn out. He should learn a lesson from the death-bed of his father.

THE "CHRONICLE" CHANGING FRONT.

Nothing could better illustrate the unreliable character of the Chronicle, as the exponent or defender of any cause, good or bad, than the conduct towards the present labor agitation. At first it encouraged and applauded the demagogues who were directing the agitation. It had no word of rebuke or censure for their wild threats of arson and murder. Its fervent wish was endorsement of the new but not wise leaders of the workingmen. One of the leading demagogues—and the most among the crowd—tiered himself into an advertising agent for the Chronicle and went about stirring to intimidate people into withdrawing their advertisements from the Call and giving them to the journal that had the high warrant of his approval. He did not greatly distinguish himself in this enterprise. He found that people, as a general rule, advertised wherever it pleased them, and were not willing to be dictated to. Perhaps on account of the ill success of this redoubtable champion, perhaps because of considerations of some other kind, the Chronicle has suddenly changed front. Now it loudly denounces intemperate harangues, and has not calls for the arrest of the agitators. It would even like to see its quondam coevaser languishing inside prison bars. Consequently the agitators now cry out against the Chronicle, and declare it is no longer the workingman's friend. They are right. That paper has been ungrateful as well as inconsistent.

SENATOR ROMAN'S just resolution asking Congress to prohibit the occupancy of public lands by others than actual settlers, is a step in the right direction. The State has been, and still is, a great sufferer from the gigantic series of land monopolies. Restoring the land to the people would be quite as fruitful a blessing as getting rid of the Chinese would be. The Senator deserves well of his constituents and of the citizens of the whole State.

RELEASE OF FENIAN PRISONERS.

Telegrams that arrived during the past week informed us of the release, by order of the British Government, of the soldiers who were suffering imprisonment for participation in the Fenian movement. Corporal CRANNERS, the last of them, was set at liberty on Monday. This, however, does not imply that all the Fenians in confinement have been released. There are, if we mistake not, four others, convicted of treason-felony, in the celebrated Manchester rescue, in which the policeman, BRETT, lost his life, who are still in prison. We are of opinion that they, too, will be released before some time. England does not her "clemency" in small instalments in order that it may go as far as possible. She could never make up her mind to do the thing generously and release all the prisoners together. That would be too much to expect from her, and Irishmen must accept her gracious concessions just as she chooses to give them, or not at all. Everything that England does with respect to Ireland is done through motives of policy; nothing is done through considerations of either justice or humanity. There is always some object to be gained lying at the back of her magnanimity.

It is not difficult to see what the Government is aiming at now. England does not like to see discontent, and she wishes to put it to do as far as possible. She is still the power of Irishmen to give her a great deal of trouble, if not to seriously cripple her power, in case she engages in hostilities, and she thinks to placate them, to secure their good-will, by this very small piece of generosity. She knows that small pieces sometimes by downright meanness. She sees what time the amnesty business at all, she should have done it thoroughly. There was no use of putting in the exception clause between the Fenian prisoners, and nobody of them were released all should have been. But whether all or some were set at liberty, England has made a mistake if she imagines that any amount of amnesty will lessen discontent in Ireland, or make the people more loyal to the throne." Whatever may be England's motive, whatever weakness in a good cause is certainly not one of them. No; as they could neither be cajoled or beaten out of their faith, so they will neither be frightened or bribed out of their nationality. A few would-be political leaders may express great gratitude for this clemency towards the Fenians, but the vast bulk of the people know right well what to think about it.

A PAUSE IN THE WAR.

Although we have no decisive intelligence yet, we may regard it as tolerably certain that an armistice of six weeks has been concluded between the Turkish and Russian armies. Since the fall of Plevna the Sultan's cause has been very seriously affected, and he has been very anxious to procure a cessation of hostilities. And England has formally asked to treat for one. England did make overtures, but unofficially, between the Turk and Russia. Lord Derby communicated the answer to the Sultan, and suggested that the armistice be applied for. We can not doubt but that would be the terms upon which Russia would be willing to make peace. What these were known the British government could easily ascertain what course to pursue. Then another difficulty presented itself. The Sultan wanted to arrange the armistice with Russia direct, and not through the intervention of England. The Sultan evidently feared that the application should be made by the Turkish Commander-in-Chief to the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian army, thus making it a purely military affair. This was only right, inasmuch as it would take a military officer to understand exactly how a cessation of hostilities could be arranged without impairing the prospects of the victorious troops. The Sultan yielded, and sent word to his generals in the field to apply for the armistice. Before we hear how they succeed, however, we learn that General ABDUL-RET has gained a most brilliant and important victory over the Russians at the Schipka Pass, capturing forty-one batteries of artillery, 140 batteries and one regiment of cavalry. This success, scarcely less in amount than the capture of Plevna, will make the Russians more exacting in their conditions for the armistice. They will probably demand that the Turks shall relire a specified distance and surrender their artillery as an offset to the advantage gained by the cessation of hostilities. Whether the Turks will consent is, of course, unknown yet. But even should they refuse to do so, they will be under the power of Irishmen to give her a great deal of trouble, if not to seriously cripple her power, in case she engages in hostilities, and she thinks to placate them, to secure their good-will, by this very small piece of generosity. Even that small piece she spoils by downright meanness. As she went into the amnesty business at all, she should have done it thoroughly. England will get no hearing in the matter at all, and if she dislikes the conditions, or thinks her interests are threatened thereby, she is free to declare war as soon as she likes. But it will be too late just about that time. If she wanted to interfere she should have done so while the Turkish armies were in rampant.

The McGarrahan Claim.

The Supreme Court has decided the suit of Mr. McGarrahan against the New Idria Mining Company in a way that has created a great deal of astonishment in legal circles. It has pronounced against him upon one of the very smallest and pettiest of legal technicalities. The merits of the case are left completely untouched. If a man is to lose his property by the action of the Supreme Court of the United States for such a trivial cause as the one alleged, we fear public confidence in the learning and justice of that august judicial body will be an truly destroyed. Mr. McGarrahan, we believe, will bring the question at issue before the Courts in some other shape. The ridiculous decision really tells in his favor.

CHINESE FEROCITY.

The admirers of the Chinese, who, we regret, are rather plentiful in certain circles here, may learn something about the character of their pets by reading the telegraphic dispatches which we publish today. Among them will be found one describing the doings of the Chinese troops in the revolted district of Kashgar. According to official information received in St. Petersburg, they massacred no less than fifteen thousand people, men, women and children, in the town of Manas. This is not the first time, by any means, that the Chinese have been guilty of such atrocities. All their history is full of them. Submissive and spiritless as slaves whenever they are weak, they are arrogant and ferocious where they are the stronger party. In fact, extreme ferocity and inhumanity are their prominent characteristics as a race. We should have a nice time in San Francisco if ever they became more powerful than the white people. Yet there are many individuals who appear to think that they would not be an entirely undesirable state of affairs.

RECEIPT OF TAXES.

Collector Mitchell Gives his strike a Spread After their Hard Work.

TAX Collector Mitchell on Monday last filed a statement with the Treasurer, which makes the following showing of taxes collected from December 31 to December 31st, 1877, inclusive, as per Forms, will make:

The collections made on coin since that time will swell the sum to $1,461,178. This does not include checks to the value of $2,500, 000, which on 1,500 the were received on Saturday. After six o'clock Monday evening the penalty on delinquent taxes was added to every delinquent account. During the past week the clerks in the Tax Collector's office were on duty from 9 A. M. until midnight, or 1 o'clock the next morning.

At the close of the day's work on last Monday evening, Mr. Mitchell invited his clerks to his private office, and thanked them for the hard manner in which they had performed their duties.

Tax books were then thrown from the desks, and a champagne lunch partaken of, the generous donation of Tax Collector Mitchell and his Chief Deputy, Hiram B. Cook, Esq.

A good time generally was had, and the occasion was proposed a success.

In response to a call for a speech, Mr. H. B. Cook, Chief Deputy, complimented the clerks upon their efficiency, though in justice to Mr. Cook it is certainly to add that a great deal is due to him on the personal exertions, and to his thorough familiarity with the workings of the Tax Office in all its departments.

At the Sacred Heart Presentation Convent, Taylor street, on Saturday, 5th inst., Miss Josephine Collins (in religion Sister Mary of Lourdes), made her solemn profession and received the veil from the hands of Rev. John Prendergast, V. G., assisted by Father Collins, S. J., brother to the newly professed. At the conclusion of the ceremony on the Very Rev. Administrator delivered an eloquent and impressive discourse on the privileges of the religious state, and the advantages derived by making from religious institutions. The determination beneditton of the Most Holy Sacrament was given, and the friends of the newly-made lady were entertained to the convent parlor.

A Correction.

BENICIA, January 8, 1878.

EDITOR MONITOR—Dear Sirs: In the Herld of June IX., I described from the New York Freeman's Journal, to the best of my memory, the origin of the phrase, "Solon Shingles Pass, capturing forty-one batteries of infantry, 140 batteries and one regiment of cavalry. This success, scarcely less in amount than the capture of Plevna, will make the Russians more exacting in their conditions for the armistice. Exchange of Pastorate.

At the request of Right Rev. Bishop O'Connell, Rev. Father O'Sullivan, pastor of Smartsville, has gone to Virginia City and is replaced here by Rev. Father Coleman. During the past six years Father O'Sullivan has, by his gentleness, amiability, and, above all, by his faithful discharge of the priest's duty, won for himself the love, esteem and admiration of every member of his congregation, and the announcement of his departure to another sphere of labor cast a "loom over their Christmas festivities. To show their appreciation of the devoted priest, the gentlemen of Smartsville—thanks to the good-will for which they are proverbial—presented him with a handsome purse, the united offerings of genial hearts. No one the children behind their parents in proofs of affection, and it was a touching sight to see the catechism class march in procession through the muddy streets and the drenching rain to say adieu and receive the parting benediction of him who was peculiarly the children's friend, and who had devoted so many laborious hours to their instruction. After reading a short address expressive of their regret at losing him, and the presentation of a small gift in token of their love and esteem, the children, while the tears of the affectionate priest mingled with those of the innocents around, were withdrawn as if their hearts would break. Father O'Sullivan carries with him the sincere wishes of his friends for all-time parishioners.

He has given bonds for his appearance, and was arraigned this morning in the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors. Having been indicted by the last Grand Jury upon four charges involving the integrity of the Police Judge's Court of your city and county, and not having had an opportunity of appearing in the same, I most respectfully ask your Honorable Board to grant me a leave of absence for the purpose of defending myself against the charges preferred by the indictments aforesaid, and to appoint some one to act in my stead during my absence. I do not desire to resign my office, but only ask that I may be allowed the opportunity of defending myself against the charges preferred against me. I am informed that the Grand Jury will not be in session after Saturday next, and therefore request that my leave of absence may commence on that day

NEWS FROM IRELAND.

LEINSTER.

DUBLIN.

John Prendergast Vereker has been appointed High Sheriff of the county of the city of Dublin for the ensuing year.

Colonel Dillon, C. B., C. S. I., an Irishman, Aide-de-Camp and Adjutant and Quartermaster at Gibraltar, has been offered the command at Chatham, which Lieutenant-General G. Erskine is about resigning.

Two Irishmen—Color-Sergeant J. Hogan, 24 Battalion 20th Foot, and Private J. Murphy, 1st Battalion 11th Foot, with Bars—have been announced as the best shots for the year 1876-7 of the troops armed, respectively, with the Martini-Henry and Snider rifle—have each been awarded the prize of £10 and the silver medal.

The first Winter Assize for the county and city of Dublin were opened December 11th, by the Lord Mayor and Baron Fitzgerald. The latter, addressing the City Grand Jury, remarked there were about twenty distinct cases in which bills would be sent before them, including two cases of homicide, in one of which the crime charged would be murder. The number of offences returned, he said, was 270 less than at last October commission. Addressing the County Grand Jury, the Judge stated he had received police returns relating to the county of Dublin. Taking into account offences of all kinds, the number of cases in the Dublin Metropolitan district portion of the county returned, since last commission, was 97 less than the number returned at last commission. In other parts of the county there was also considerable diminution.

A Waterloo veteran, named John Hughes, who served in the 1st Royals, and who had been an inmate of the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, twenty-seven years, was interred in the burial ground of that institution December 12th, with military honors, the band of the 35th Regiment, from Beggars' Bush, being in attendance. He took part in most of the Peninsular actions, and was wounded at Waterloo. The most remarkable thing connected with his history is, that he was sentry in the quarters of the Duke of Wellington the night before the great battle took place, and he it was who admitted into the presence of the Commander-in-Chief the person who brought the intelligence which decided the fighting of the battle the following morning. Hughes was nearly ninety years of age, and to the last took great interest in military matters, more especially in the recent short service system, which he, as well as other old soldiers, most heartily condemned.

The death rate of Dublin during the week ending December 8th was the highest in the United Kingdom, being 37 per 1000 of the population per annum. The average of all the large towns was only 24; London 26 below the average.

The Artisans' Dwellings Committee of the Corporation of Dublin has received a letter from the Local Government Board, conveying an announcement the granting of a sum of £20 000 towards carrying the Artisans' Dwellings Act into effect in Dublin.

The "Steam Tramway Company of Ireland" was registered December 7th in London. Its object is to extend tramways throughout the country, and to make use, in the working of them, of Hughes' tramless locomotive, which has already been tried in Dublin and Belfast, the promoters believing that Parliamentary sanction will be given to their ensuing session to the use of steam power on tramways.

On December 12th the Irish Sunday Closing Association sent a deputation, headed by Sir Dominick Corrigan, to the Chief Secretary, to urge the Government to take up the Sunday Closing Bill next session, and introduce it on their own responsibility. Mr Dunsink presented a memorial signed by two Archbishops and eight Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, and two Archbishops and eight bishops of the Protestant Church, and by a very large number of the clergy of all denominations, and of professional men. Sir M. H. Beach stated that he had no authority to express any decision of the Government on the matter.

WICKLOW.

Mr. Taylor, manager of Glenwilliam slate quarry, was shot at, on December 13th, while in bed. The ball penetrated the roof of the house, and Mr. Taylor narrowly escaped. Several of the employés have recently been dismissed.

A public meeting was held, on December 8th, in Arklow Courthouse for the purpose of arranging preliminaries in order to obtain a Government grant for improving Arklow Harbor. Edward Brooksbill, Esq., manager of Bank of Ireland, presided. There was a large attendance of the ratepayers and shipowners. Resolutions were unanimously passed to the effect that steps be at once taken to place the harbor under the Town Improvement Act, and to bring pressure to bear on the Treasury to secure their offer of assistance to the project. A subscription list was opened, and £20 was contributed in the room.

KING'S COUNTY.

On December 14th a meeting in favor of the Sunday Closing Bill was held at Parsonstown. There was a very large attendance. Very Rev. Father Bayler, V. G., P. P., presided. Messrs. Hosack and Murray attended as a deputation from Dublin, and were warmly received. Resolutions in support of the Sunday Closing movement were carried unanimously. All classes and creeds took part in the proceedings, the local speakers being Rev. Father Brennan, Mr. Corcoran, the County Coroner, Mr. Harding, T. C., and Rev. Dr. McMahon.

MEATH.

On December 11th eight men entered the house of Joseph Cavanagh, Navanh, near Gidleshill, and assaulted him. They presented revolvers at him and took away from the house his double barreled gun, Tarnes of the parties had pistols and black eared faces. The affair appears to have arisen out of party antagonisms. No arrests have been made.

LOUTH.

The Irish Times of December 10 h says: "A few days ago the brigantine, William, of Drogheda (Harris, master), and a crew of seven, left the port of Ardrossan for Ringlands with a cargo of coal. When within about sixteen miles from port it was discovered that the vessel had sprung a leak, and was in a sinking state very fast. Pumping was commenced at once, but it was found necessary to run into some port of safety, and as the wind turned the schooner was brought into the harbor (Drogheda) as soon as possible. Here she was lightened and drawn up on the beach to be repaired.

In the middle of the seam was discovered a fine Chamois, the size of a herring which jammed up the leak in a great extent, and without the interference of which the water would have come through in such quantities as would have defied all efforts of the pump to save the vessel and the crew. The fish was pulled out by the captain and pilot (Lindsay) in the presence of a large number of people. The William has been properly repaired, and is again ready for sea."

On December 10 h, in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, Dublin, Mr. Macbeagh, Q.C., applied that a sum of £40 000, part of the £45 000 to which Miss Lumb, of Drogheda, one of the Masters of the Bench of this Assembly, was entitled, should be forthwith paid to that lady. The money had been paid into court pending the result of the Catherine Murphy (murderess Coffey) Illegitimacy case, which case was now closed. Mr. Kelly, of Drogheda, and Mrs. Stuart were interested. The Vice-Chancellor said that he was astonished to hear that the funeral expenses were unpaid, the alderman having died seven years ago. He could not, however, put a stop on the money, and the person who gave the order for the funeral should be applied to. He would make the order of payment of £10,-000 to Miss Lumb.
